

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2.

At 12 o'clock, the PRESIDENT pro tem., the Hon. HUGH L. WHITE, of Tennessee, in the absence of the Vice President, called the Senate to order.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of ELISHA R. POTTER, elected a Senator from Rhode Island, for which State ASHER ROBBINS had been previously elected, and had, in pursuance of such election, taken his seat in the Senate; and also a certificate that the election of the said ASHER ROBBINS was null and void; which documents were read.

* In the case marked with an (*) the seat was claimed by both of the gentlemen named.

The CHAIR then stated the fact of Mr. ROBBINS having been returned as elected, and his credentials read at the last session, and left it to the Senate to determine on the course to be pursued as to the qualifying of either of those gentlemen.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said, that it was not his intention to offer any opinion on the merits of the course which had been adopted by the State of Rhode Island, but merely to say, that it seemed to him to be a matter of course that the Senator first elected, and whose credentials were presented at the last session of the Senate, should be permitted to approach the Chair and take the oath; and that the other gentleman, who contests the election of Mr. ROBBINS, should present his credentials either to the Committee on Elections or the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the Senate should afterwards receive the report of that committee, and determine which of the gentlemen is duly elected. But he was not prepared at this time to question the election of the gentleman whose credentials were before the Senate at the last session, until a committee of the Senate should have decided that he was not fairly elected. He was not prepared at present to offer an opinion on these points, but he thought that the Senator in his seat should approach and take the oath.

He then moved that Mr. ROBBINS do take the customary oath.

Mr. CLAY suggested the propriety of making the collateral motion, that the credentials of Mr. POTTER be laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, it was then ordered that the credentials of Mr. POTTER do lie on the table.

Mr. KING thought it would be the most proper course to leave both the gentlemen where they were, until it should be determined which was entitled to the seat. He adverted to the practice of the House, in referring cases of contested elections to the Committee on Elections, whose report had sometimes the effect of ousting the sitting member. As this was a novel case, he thought it would be better that neither of the individuals should be qualified until it should be determined who was entitled to the seat. It might happen that an important question would be determined by a single vote; and in that case, if it should be afterwards discovered that a member was illegally admitted to a seat, the decision might be vitiated. He suggested that, for the present, the credentials of Mr. ROBBINS should also lie on the table, and that neither should be qualified.

Rhode Island Election.

Mr. CLAY admitted the delicacy of the question now presented to the Senate, but expressed a hope that it would be examined with a becoming firmness, and a resolution to act justly. At present, Rhode Island stood in the Senate with three representatives; and he was willing to admit that, if he had the power, there was no State in the Union to which he would be more ready to allow a triple representation. But the constitution prescribed a restriction, and she could only have her two Senators. The Senator from Alabama had complained that it would be doing injustice to the State to admit her three Senators, and therefore he desired to limit her to one Senator. That would be a course in opposition to the rights of that State, and of every other State in the Union, because the State of Rhode Island had a right to her two voices on that floor, and on every question, and the Senator could not say that she should have but one.

It was not only the right of Rhode Island, but of every State, to have two voices on every question which could arise; and the first act of the Senate, by which the States could be secured in this right, was the verification of those who composed that body. It was the right, and the imperative duty of the Senate, to say who were to be the Senators, and who were the individuals to be associated in the performance of the important duties which devolved upon them. It was now the time to decide (not conclusively, he admitted) which were the two members from the State of Rhode Island to be admitted to their seats. The question would then come up, as to the ultimate right of either of the contesting members. On this question he was, perhaps, as well prepared to give his opinion now as at any time, having, by examination, made himself acquainted with the whole subject. But the proper course, at this time, was to determine who should have the temporary occupation of the seat which was contested. By the laws of Rhode Island, a time had been appointed for the election of United States' Senators; by the laws, that time had been fixed previous to the expiration of the term of the existing Senators; by the laws, the election of Senator had taken place prior to the 4th of March last; and, in conformity to these laws, Mr. ROBBINS had been elected, his credentials were certified, presented to the Senate, recognised, and recorded. So far, therefore, every thing was conducted in conformity with the constitution and the laws of Rhode Island. In the month of October last, another session of the General Assembly of the State was held, and, without waiting to see if the United States' Senate would pronounce the election of Mr. ROBBINS valid, they pronounced it to be invalid; thus, by their own act, and without any consultation with the United States' Senate, declaring the first election null and void, and electing another Senator, who had now presented his credentials. The gentleman first elected, and who had the prima facie right to his seat, had, in conformity to law, presented his credentials; his was the prior, and therefore the valid deed; and therefore, in compliance with every law and usage, he ought to be admitted. But he desired it to be understood that, in taking this course, he desired to do nothing which would preclude to the other gentleman the privilege of a full investigation of his right. He had used the term prima facie, and he requested the Senate to look at the credentials presented by Mr. PORTER, which admitted on their face the previous election, the validity of which it disputed, on the ground of some non-conformity to forms. He had, however, risen only, without meaning to express any opinion as to the ultimate right of either of the members, to vote for the admission to his seat of the gentleman who was first elected, and for leaving the validity of the right to be afterwards examined by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. KING congratulated the Senator from Kentucky on the knowledge which he had acquired of this case. For his part, he had not made himself so well acquainted with the facts, and he was not so well prepared to argue the question, and to decide who was entitled to the seat under the constitution, laws, and usages of Rhode Island. He wished to act in such manner as would be perfectly fair and respectful to the State, and to the gentlemen claiming the seat. It was his wish that the State should be represented by the Senator she had duly elected—he would not say who that was; it might be this gentleman, or it might be the other. He thought it would be well, as it was a novel case, to refer it to a select committee; and whenever the report of that committee should be submitted, he would be prepared to say which of the gentlemen was, in his opinion, entitled to the seat.

If the State was to be deprived of a Senator, it was the fault of the State herself. He was prepared to give her all she was entitled to, but no more. She was entitled to her representatives on this floor who were constitutionally elected. But who were they? There was no dispute as to one of the Senators of the State. As to the other, whose credentials were presented at the last session, his claims were contested. His credentials were, it was true, presented last session, in the common form, and were received without any examination, as was usual. In this way it was impossible to know the authenticity of any credentials. They were received by the Senate as a matter of course, and no one could be prepared to say whether documents presented in this manner were genuine or forged. He referred to the practice of the House of Representatives in cases of contested elections, and stated that there an individual, whose right was contested, did not take his seat until he had established it. With the gentleman first elected he had the pleasure of an intimate acquaintance, and, if his right to the seat should be declared valid, he should be glad to continue that intercourse. He was not prepared, however, at this moment, to go into an argument on the question whether, under the constitution, laws, and usages of Rhode Island, that gentleman was duly elected or not. If the gentleman from Kentucky was prepared to go into the question, he would confess that he was not ready to say who was the proper person to be qualified. He hoped there would be no precipitancy, but that the subject would be referred to a select committee for examination.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that the Senate was perhaps placed in rather a delicate situation, and should, therefore, do no act to the prejudice of those who, like himself, had not given the subject a sufficient examination to enable them to come to a correct conclusion. The remark was certainly true that the State of Rhode Island was entitled to be at once properly represented on that floor; and a case had been put by the Senator from Alabama, by which she might be prevented from having more than one voice; but this, Mr. C. said, could not be in consequence of any act of the Senate. Other cases might arise which would leave to a State but one Senator to represent her; a death or a resignation would create a vacancy which could only be filled by the constitutional mode of election; but in such cases the Senate of the United States could not in the slightest degree be culpable. Was the Senator from Alabama prepared to say that the State of Rhode Island should not be properly represented on that floor, because the question of right to one of her seats was still undecided? For his part, Mr. C. said he was not prepared to come to any such decision. If there were no parallel case precisely similar to the present, there were certainly some plain landmarks by which their course might be guided. There were analogous cases to be found in the histories of all legislative bodies; and it had been uniformly settled, in all contested elections, that the party having the priority of claim held his seat until his right was contested, and a decision had against him. But the gentleman from Alabama contends, said Mr. C., that in that event the proceedings of that body might be vitiated. If this doctrine could be maintained, Mr. C. admitted that the argument was entitled to some weight.

But could (asked Mr. C.) any measure be carried through the Senate, that could possibly be jeopardized by allowing the Senator first elected to retain his seat? We have no rights, said Mr. C., that we have not in common with the House. Have there not been cases of contested elections, and has any law ever been rendered inoperative because the member first returned, and whose seat had been subsequently vacated, had voted for or against it?

Would the President, in the plenitude of his power, veto a law so passed? It was incident to all legislative bodies similarly constituted with ours, to have such questions before them, and the course of proceeding in them was the only plain and obvious one that had hitherto always been pursued. Without meaning, in the slightest degree, to prejudice the rights of the gentleman who claimed the seat to which Mr. ROBERTS had first been elected, Mr. C. held it to be perfectly right and proper to give to Mr. ROBERTS the contested seat, until a proper investigation should decide to whom it belonged. He had risen, he said, merely to call the attention of the Senate to analogous cases, without intending to express any opinion as to which of the gentlemen had ultimately the strongest claim to the seat. No difficulty could possibly arise by giving the seat to the gentleman first elected, until the decision should be made; and in any event he was satisfied that the State of Rhode Island would be ably and faithfully represented.

Mr. KING said a parallel case had been already before the Senate. In 1825, Mr. Lanman brought his credentials from the Governor of Connecticut, as a Senator from that State. They were read, and, on a motion of Mr. Holmes, of Maine, that he should be qualified and take his seat in the Senate, a debate ensued. On motion of Mr. Van Buren, Mr. Lanman had leave to be heard at the bar of the Senate, in relation to his right to a seat. The question was referred to a committee, and Mr. Eaton made an unfavorable report. The Legislature of Connecticut had adjourned when the appointment was made, and the Governor had no authority to make the appointment. The Senate refused to receive him as a member.

Mr. KANE said that he wanted time for the further consideration of the subject. He did not admit that the question before them was an unimportant one. What was that question? Two individuals had presented certificates, alike valid, claiming seats in that body; and it was for the Senate to decide which party was entitled to admission. No contest of this character had ever arisen in that body. It was not a case where one member had brought a regular certificate of election, entitling him to hold his seat as matter of course until that certificate should be set aside; but it was a case in which two individuals had brought certificates, both claiming to be valid; and it was for the Senate to decide upon the characters of these certificates. The case was a new one, and it was of the utmost importance to the interests of Rhode Island and of the Union that it should be fairly and deliberately met by the Senate.

The main argument of some of the gentlemen who had preceded him had been the right of Rhode Island to be represented in that body. No one questioned this right; but it seemed to him that such right would not be of much value to Rhode Island, if the Senate were to decide, in this summary way, who should be her representative. The certificates of the two members, given under the authority of the State, were both fairly before the Senate. Should the Senate at once proceed to say that the second was of no importance? Should they be so kind to Rhode Island as to take the appointment of her Senator out of her hands, and to say that, when she declared the first election null and void, she had made a false declaration? This was a point involving the sovereignty of the States; and the Senate had been termed "the masters of the States." It became them, then, to consider this point with all the attention and deliberation which its importance demanded. He would not detain the Senate with an argument at that time. The subject was new to him, and, under the circumstances, he asked time. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject. The motion for postponement was lost; yeas 16, nays 17.

Mr. CLAY said he would add but a few words to what he had already said upon the subject. He did not suppose that the opinion he had expressed with regard to the duty of the Senate would subject him to the imputation of improper motive. The subject was one which all knew would come before the Senate. Senators had a right to form their opinions; and he had consequently looked into the subject, and formed one for himself. But he had expressed no opinion with regard to the question between the two individuals claiming seats in that body. He had only expressed his opinion with regard to what he conceived ought to be the course of the Senate at the present time. Nothing was clearer than that the State of Rhode Island, by the constitution, was entitled to two representatives in that body. It was equally clear that, when she had appointed her Senators, her right, for the time being, ceased; her jurisdiction over the Senate passed from her, and she was without power, until the constitutional period for her again to exercise her right of appointment should recur. To illustrate this position, he would ask, who was the representative of Rhode Island from the 4th of March, the date of Mr. ROBERTS's appointment, until October, the date of Mr. POTTER's claim? Supposing the Senate had convened on the 5th of March, as would have been the case had the present Executive lost his election, who then would the Senate have been bound to receive as the Senator from Rhode Island? There could have been no doubt. Again: supposing, at any time between the 4th of March and October, the Senate had been convened on some extraordinary occasion; would there have been any doubt in this case? He would make still another supposition. Supposing Rhode Island had not elected a third Senator; there would then have been no doubt with regard to the validity of the credentials presented by Mr. ROBERTS. Where, then, was the difficulty with regard to the present duty of the Senate? They were, most plainly, bound to act, with reference to the candidate holding the regular certificate, as they would have acted had circumstances permitted him to have presented his certificate earlier.

He admitted that the present was an important case. There had been cases in which Senators had been requested to resign; there had been cases of instruction; and there had been cases where Legislatures had declared that Senators did not express the will of their constituents; but this was the first case where a Legislature, having exhausted its constitutional power to choose a Senator, had attempted, at the expiration of a half or a third of a year, to choose another. It was, indeed, an important question; one involving the constitutional rights of the Senate. The Senators were elected, to remain there during their constitutional terms, and that body was thus removed, in part, from the influence of temporary changes in the popular opinion. But if it were permitted to the Legislature of Rhode Island to disregard the election of Mr. ROBERTS, then, should there be a re-action in that Legislature, a fourth Senator might be sent. It was, indeed, an important question, how far the Senate should lend itself to support changes of this character? But this was not the question before the Senate. The true question was, should the Senate proceed to receive the Senator elect from Rhode Island? Two Senators presented their credentials, both documents duly authenticated, but one possessing priority of date. Was the circumstance of priority of no importance? He considered it a matter decisive. The State had elected—she had fairly chosen her Senator. Afterwards, it appears, some mistake was imputed, and a new election had. Let the Senate take the Senator they would have been bound to receive on the 5th of March, and then inquire into the error, if one it were, subsequently detected. Such was his view, and he had obtained it without resorting to any other medium of investigation than that of common sense.

SENATE.]

Rhode Island Election.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN observed, that he did not feel the embarrassment which had been expressed by the member from Illinois, and he would assign the reason. The gentleman was embarrassed by the fact that two Senators had been presented with conflicting appointments; but it was the business of the Senate to decide on the legality of any and every appointment to a seat among them; and the views of the gentleman were therefore not authorized by the constitution. [Here Mr. KANE explained that he was embarrassed for the want of a knowledge of the constitution of Rhode Island.] Mr. F. said, the Legislature of Rhode Island were not called upon to decide the merits of an appointment. Mr. ROBBINS had appeared at the last session, his credentials were read and filed on the records of the Senate, and the Senate had settled the question of his election; but, in the intermediate time, the Legislature of Rhode Island had assumed the province of the United States' Senate, and had declared the seat vacant. It was the business of each House of Congress to decide on the qualifications of its members; and the Senate having settled the point in the present instance, there could be no vacancy until that decision should be reversed by the same body. The State Legislature had exceeded their functions; it was not in the power of a Legislature to vacate a seat in the United States' Senate; the constitution had taken it out of their reach, and had reserved it to the Senate. The Senate should regard it as a question of qualifications, and, until that should be decided, there could be no doubt that the first elected was entitled to the seat. If it were not so, the constitution was a dead letter. The vacancy could occur only by the action of the Senate; the State Legislature could not step between them and the question; the matter was placed beyond the reach of State political collisions.

Mr. F. had one word to say in regard to Mr. LANMAN. His rejection was made on the Senate's own motion; there was no petition, no representation, no remonstrance, presented on the subject. The appointment was so clearly void, that the Senate saw it at once, and acted accordingly. But the admission of Mr. ROBBINS corresponded with the authority of the State, and his seat could be vacated only by the Senate's authority.

Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, regretted extremely to see such a question as the present before the House. He was almost wholly ignorant of the nature of the case, and of the peculiar laws by which Rhode Island was governed. He wished to know whether he was to be called upon to pronounce upon a preliminary or upon a definitive measure—upon the propriety of electing, or upon the election of either of the contending candidates. He must confess that the conduct of the Legislature of Rhode Island appeared to him a little extraordinary. They send to the Senate of the United States a Senator, whom they declare, by the certificate granted him, to have been duly elected; and, at a subsequent session, they send another, declaring their previous election to be null and void. Had the Legislature of Rhode Island the power to do this—to decide at all upon this question? Had they not, on the contrary, by the election of Mr. ROBBINS, referred the matter to a higher tribunal than themselves, that of the Senate of the United States, which was now alone able to decide upon the case? He again expressed himself to be ignorant of the entire merits of the question; he had never seen the statute of Rhode Island, and hoped he should not be called upon to give his vote until he had acquired the necessary information. He would conclude by moving that they be referred to a committee of inquiry.

Mr. EWING said, the question was an important one; and the true question was, whether the vacancy was filled prima facie, not whether it was filled properly. And if it was filled, what was the evidence? It was nothing short of a certificate from the Governor of the State, forwarded to the Senate, at the proper time and in the usual manner, and now placed among its records. If, then, this evidence was received in the proper time and manner, what was the objection? Who was to determine on the constitutionality of an act not subject to the decision of the Legislature? A Legislature could repeal and modify its own acts; but one Legislature had no right to pronounce on the constitutionality of the acts of a preceding Legislature, except when the whole power was conferred upon it, which was not the case in any State, nor in the United States. The acts of the Legislature were binding; and courts only, or the Senate of the United States, could declare them void. The gentleman from New York had said that the latter choice of a Senator was of more force than the former; but if their power to act had expired, it was of no force at all. The mere fact that a legal choice had been made, which gentlemen had not denied, took it from the power of a subsequent Legislature to elect another; and such an election would, of course, be nugatory. The subject was indeed worthy of investigation, and he was ready to investigate.

Mr. BIBB could not have believed that such a case would ever have been brought before that House—could ever, from the very constitution of the United States, have arisen. He felt surprised at the astuteness of the human mind, and at the aptitude which it at the same time possessed of creating difficulties where none existed. The constitution declared that two Senators should be sent from every State; one Senator from Rhode Island already sat in that House, and Mr. ROBBINS had been appointed by the Legislature of Rhode Island to fill the remaining vacancy. The same Legislature, however, has since sent another candidate—had presented the House with two certificates. He did not here recognise the matter as a contested election; the House had, in the present stage of proceedings, nothing to do with such a subject. Whether Mr. ROBBINS had been duly elected or not, was not here the question. He (Mr. B.) was perfectly unbiassed; he had not been able to bestow much attention upon the subject; would willingly have postponed the consideration of the subject until to-morrow. He was, however, called upon to perform a duty instantly, and, even under such circumstances, he had no hesitation in saying that none other than Mr. ROBBINS could be elected. He had formed no previous judgment upon the subject, excepting as regarded the two certificates, and the light in which such a matter was viewed by the constitution. Mr. ROBBINS's certificate was unexceptionable; but the next certificate told them that the Senate of Rhode Island, in electing that gentleman, had neglected to comply with a certain act, and had in other respects acted prematurely; that Mr. ROBBINS's election was therefore null and void, and that they had subsequently chosen another gentleman. The Legislature of Rhode Island undertook to decide the matter! Did it belong to the Legislature of Rhode Island to do this? The constitution says not; but the right of decision rested with the members of this House. Mr. PORTER's certificate acknowledged that Mr. ROBBINS was elected, but prematurely. Were members to acknowledge the right of Rhode Island to decide upon this subject or not? If they did not, there was nothing to prevent Mr. ROBBINS from taking his seat amongst them. He (Mr. B.) never expected that a contested election could have made its way into the House. Had he to make a rule—to begin again de novo—he would propose that neither gentleman should be elected until the matter had been decided. Mr. LANMAN's case had been cited, but it was totally different from the one before the House. The Governor had thought fit to appoint Mr. LANMAN to a vacancy which would occur, not one which had occurred. His (the Governor's) act was consequently declared void. He (Mr. B.) hoped that those who voted upon the present, should not be considered disqualified to express their opinion upon any subsequent occasion.

Mr. BENTON little expected to hear such a debate as that to which he had just listened. He knew something, it is true, of the matter from current report, but had not looked deeply into it, and did not expect to have been called upon to-day to say a single word upon the subject. Yet the whole had been gone into, and members had refused to permit the matter to lie over even for a few days. He had little regard for precedents; no man, in fact, despised them more than himself; he considered that they were the bane of this country and England; but that if ever there was a precedent, the case of Mr. LANMAN was one as connected with the subject before the House.

Mr. B. continued, and contended that from the circumstances attending this election, they were called upon to suspend their decision until the facts of the case were more fully explained and known. The Legislature had several times refused to go into an election, and yet, at last, with the knowledge that there would be a change of parties, had gone into the election. Putting, then, these decisions against their own power, together with the solemn decision against it, which they had heard, were they not to wait one day—would there not another sun rise upon them—would they not wait until to-morrow, to find out what were really the facts of the case? He hoped that he knew his place too well to read as authority what was not properly such to the Senate; but, with that paper which he held in his hand, he would undertake to suppose that the facts were as he had stated. Would they not allow themselves till to-morrow to ascertain if they were so or not? Doubtless, his supposition might be injurious to one or both sides, and he had not had the most remote idea of expressing these opinions; nor should he have done so, had he not been driven into it by the course which things had taken. Mr. B. concluded by moving that a select committee of five be appointed to investigate the matter, and report upon it to the Senate. He would further ask not to be appointed a member of such committee, having expressed the opinions he had done upon the case.

Mr. MANGUM inquired if the motion was in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tem. decided that it was.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished to be informed if the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] included an investigation into the credentials of Mr. PORTER as well as those of Mr. ROBBINS?

Mr. BENTON replied in the affirmative.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he should conceive, then, that the motion was not order, inasmuch as the credentials of Mr. PORTER had already been laid upon the table.

Mr. MANGUM wished briefly to express his opinion on the subject before the Senate. Much had been said as to the disrespect which would be shown to Rhode Island, if either Senator were permitted to sit; or, if they would not permit the Senator who presented his credentials last session to sit. Whenever, on an election, the question had presented itself as to which of two or more had the right to sit, usage had been that he who produced prima facie evidence of having been elected should be permitted to sit; the matter was then referred to a committee, upon whose report the Senate acted and decided. He thought that in this case one of the parties ought to be permitted to sit. It would be immaterial, then, whether the Senate proceeded at once to act on the prima facie evidence itself, or referred the subject, as usual, to a committee; the latter, however, was the customary mode of procedure. The whole question then was, is there any prima facie evidence? That there was such evidence, was, in his opinion, perfectly clear. What was the action in ordinary cases? A certificate was received from a State declaring a certain party duly elected. Why was that certificate received as evidence of the fact? Because there were certain seals appended thereto, expressly designed to authenticate whatever they were attached to. Those seals were appended to the credentials in this case. The election was stated to have taken place in the usual time and manner of elections for Senators in Rhode Island. On the face of the election, it was a good one.

The view taken of the matter by one of the Senators from Kentucky appeared to him unanswerable: that if the Senate had sat after the 5th of March, there would have been no dispute on the subject. What, he would ask, was prima facie evidence? It was evidence being what it purports to be. The credentials in this case were of that character. The Legislature of Rhode Island had endeavored to avoid this. But though he thought that Legislature was not the proper tribunal to adjudicate this matter, he could not agree, if the Senate should think that Mr. ROBBINS had not a right to a seat on that floor, that from thence it must necessarily follow that Mr. PORTER's election was not good. If the Senate, on examination, should be of opinion that the first election was void, he could not see why the Legislature of Rhode Island, who had acted on the same opinion, should not be sustained in their election of Mr. PORTER. As to the question of prima facie evidence, however, there could be no dispute. He believed, from the plain language of the constitution, that Rhode Island had not a right to act definitively on the matter; if she did so, it was at her peril. Her legislation had no weight with them; but if subsequent events should sustain her in the course she had pursued in pronouncing the first election void, he thought it did not follow that the person last elected should not take his seat. Mr. M. said, he regretted that it had been thought necessary then to enter into the subject, with such an imperfect and mangled view of facts before them. He was indifferent whether the matter was referred to the usual committee, or to a select committee. Whatever might be his personal feelings on the subject, they would have no influence on his determination. The whole matter in dispute was as to the organization of the body; and there was high authority for believing that it was properly organized. He thought that they ought to consider the first certificate as good until they had further evidence.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed, that he had a few words to say in regard to the constitution of the United States. It gave the Senate power to judge with regard to the election of its own members. The State Legislatures were incompetent to decide. When testimony had been given that the Legislature had previously elected a Senator, until there was some action of the Senate on the certificate there was nothing further subject to the Legislature; their power was spent, and to resuscitate it required the action of the Senate of the United States. He concurred with the Senator from Kentucky, that any act of the Legislatures, till the United States' Senate had decided, was nugatory. Two gentlemen had been presented for a seat in the Senate; one had been chosen; his credentials had been received and put on the journals of the Senate; a change of politics had taken place in the State; a new trial had been made, and a verdict obtained to set aside the preceding election. If such a course of things were permitted, there would be no end to the mischief it would occasion; every fluctuation in the state of parties might produce a new Senator: if we receive one, the Legislature may vacate his seat, and another, and another, without end. The rule was founded on common sense, that when a Legislature had acted, its power was spent, and not re-suscitated till the Senate had declared that act null and void. [Here Mr. P. read the constitution on the subject.] He made a supposition, that a Senator had been elected under thirty years of age, contrary to the constitution; and asked whether in that case it would be competent for the Legislature to vacate the seat? The proper course would be to memorialize the United States' Senate, stating that the member elect was in his political minority; and when the Senate had determined the question, let them declare so, and notify the Legislature to make a new appointment. Or, if the Senator elect had not been nine years a citizen of the United States, or was not a citizen of the State, but should present his credentials in due form of law, could the Senate refuse to administer the oath, because a subsequent Legislature had determined that he was not qualified? The member whose credentials had been brought forward and accepted was the sitting member, even admitting that he were under thirty, or not a citizen of the State, till the Senate had determined these points; they were subjects of investigation, and it was right that they should be investigated; but, till that was done, there was no power to deprive him of his seat; it was not even in the power of the Senate to take his seat from him. He thought it unnecessary to inquire into his legal right to his seat, till a committee should report; and then, if it appeared that the member was improperly chosen, he should vote that his seat should be vacated.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to lay the motion on the table; but, after remarks and inquiries by several Senators, he withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON's motion to refer the whole subject to a special committee, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tip-ton, White, Wilkins, Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Silsbee, Smith, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler—19.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ROBBINS then took the oath.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, submitted a resolution proposing the usual mourning in honor of the memory of Hon. R. A. BUCKNER, late a Senator from Missouri; which was read and agreed to.

Mr. CLAY then rose and said, that the adoption of this resolution reminded him of a severe loss which the public and he himself had sustained since the last session, and concerning which he did not now deem himself qualified to speak. He felt regret that the gentleman had not been able yet to take his seat, on whom it would more properly have devolved to submit the motion which he now proposed to offer. He desired to call the attention of the Senate to the melancholy death of a member of this body, who had been summoned away since they last met together, under circumstances of the most distressing nature. He was a man who possessed the rare quality of making a favorable impression on all persons who knew him, and who never failed, on acquaintance, to conciliate the esteem both of friends and of opponents; for whenever he fought, he fought manfully, but always afterwards cherished the kindest feelings towards those who had been his adversaries. During the last summer, perhaps all the members of the Senate had had reason to regret some bereavements, and none more than himself. In the course of it, a pestilential disease had traversed his neighborhood, and swept off many valuable citizens, among whom he numbered some of his oldest friends and acquaintances. So it had been in other parts of the country; but, amidst all this desolation, there had occurred no instance of individual loss more afflicting to him, nor more to be lamented on the public account, than that of the Senator from Louisiana.

With feelings oppressed with pain, he rose to ask the Senate to adopt a resolution similar to that which had just been agreed to, in reference to the late Senator JOHNSON. No man in the country had attended more ardently and more faithfully to his public duties, or had brought to their discharge a more clear, enlightened, and determined judgment. No man ever more happily united blandness and affability with firmness and decision. None could be more true and faithful to friends, nor more courteous and respectful towards opponents. This expression, he hoped, would be permitted from a heart which had bled profusely when the tidings of this afflicting event reached him, amidst the wrecks which the pestilence had scattered around him.

He had not expected to be called on to offer this resolution, but he trusted that it would be received, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. C. then submitted his resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KING,

Resolved, That a message be sent to the House of Representatives to inform that body that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that they are ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress have assembled, and are ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the usual resolution ordering the Senators to be furnished with the customary supply of newspapers was adopted.

Adjourned till 12 to-morrow.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3.

The annual message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. J. Donelson, his Secretary; which having been read, 5,000 extra copies of the message, and 1,500 of the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank and its branches. [See Appendix.]

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 5,000 copies of the report, and 1,500 copies of the documents, were ordered to be printed.

RHODE ISLAND SENATORS.

Mr. S. WRIGHT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, now upon the table of the Senate, showing the appointment of ELISHA R. POTTER as a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, be referred to a select committee of five Senators, to inquire and report upon the claim of the said ELISHA R. POTTER to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. ASHER ROBBINS.

Veto of the Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WRIGHT said he was not sufficiently conversant with the rules of the Senate to determine if the resolution was required to lie for a day on the table, or whether it would now be taken up for consideration.

The CHAIR replied that it was the usual practice of the Senate for resolutions to lie over for a day; but, as this resolution had reference to papers which were lying on the table of the Senate, he considered that it did not come within the rule, and that it would come up now for consideration.

Mr. CLAY then expressed a hope that the resolution should lie on the table until to-morrow. He adverted to the rule of the Senate which required that the appointment of committees should be made by the President of the Senate. That officer was not now in the chair. He had no doubt that good reasons could be shown for his absence. But a time might come when the Senate might be deprived of the proper appointment of their committees, by the intentional absence of the Vice President, and the devolution of this important duty on his temporary substitute. He did not know that there was any such intention in the present instance; but, if it were permitted to grow into a practice to appoint the committees in the absence of the Vice President, the exception might become the rule, and the rule the exception. Unless the President of the Senate should arrive shortly, the duty of appointing the standing committees would devolve on the gentleman who is the temporary occupant of the chair. This was a consideration of great importance; and although he had as much confidence in that gentleman as in any other who would fill the chair, there might be some cases in which his fitness for the duties imposed on him might not be equal to that of the Vice President himself. But, in the present case, he thought that the Senate ought to appoint the committees themselves. This was due to the dignity of the State of Rhode Island herself, as well as to the intrinsic importance of a case involving a contested election. Some reflection on the subject was certainly necessary, and he wished the resolution to lie on the table until to-morrow, till the proper course of proceeding should be determined.

He then moved to lay the resolution on the table, but withdrew the motion at the instance of

Mr. KING, of Alabama, who stated that the Senator from Kentucky had mistaken the operation of the rule. The select committees were not appointed by the presiding officer, but were elected by the Senate, unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent. In reference to the appointment of the standing committees, if any evil was likely to arise from the absence of the Vice President, the Senator from Kentucky could hereafter take any course he pleased. In this instance, however, the committee would be created by election of the Senate, and therefore the objection of the gentleman would not apply. It was important that the Senate should act immediately in reference to the State of South Carolina—he begged pardon, he meant Rhode Island.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked for the reading of the rule of the Senate which prescribes that the appointment of the committees shall be made by the President, and remarked that, as the language was general, unless the rule had been altered by some subsequent action of the Senate, the appointment of this committee would be made by the presiding officer. He knew that it had been a practice for the Senate to elect select committees when the President was in the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. stated that it had been the practice, since he had occupied the chair, to make no distinction between the modes of appointing the standing and the select committees. Both had been appointed by the Chair.

Mr. KING made a brief reply concerning the practice of the Senate, with a view to sustain his former view.

Mr. CLAY rejoined. He was a matter-of-fact man; and he preferred to guide himself by facts, rather than by mere speculative lights. The Chair had stated that it had been customary for him to appoint both the standing and the select committees. He was unwilling to protract discussion; and if the gentleman who had submitted the resolution would agree so to modify its phraseology, as to make it requisite that the committee should be elected by the Senate, he would withdraw his objection to its immediate consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that when he had offered his resolution, he expected that the committee would be appointed by the Senate; and, if the gentleman from Kentucky would make an insertion of the amendment to that effect, he would pledge himself to make no objection to it. He had no desire to be a member of the committee, for it must be obvious to every gentleman that the investigation would be of a very unpleasant character.

Mr. CLAY declined putting his suggestion in the shape of an amendment; but, if the mover would modify his resolution, he would no longer object to its being taken up and acted on.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had no objection to make the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. corrected the construction of the rule made by the Senator from Alabama. The rule had been changed, and no distinction was made between the appointment of the standing and the select committees. On this principle the Chair had acted during the last session.

Mr. WRIGHT then again rose, and said he desired it to be understood that he had not intended to change the form of the resolution himself; but if an amendment should be moved, he would not object to it.

Mr. CLAY then moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was agreed to without a division.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5.

VETO OF THE LAND BILL.

A message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing a communication of the reasons which had induced him to refuse his assent to the bill of the last session, authorizing an appropriation, for a limited time, of the proceeds of the public lands. [See Appendix.] The message having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose and stated that this measure had been first introduced into Congress at the session before the last, under circumstances which must be within the recollection of every member of the Senate. Its object was to dispose of the proceeds of the public lands for a limited time. The subject had been greatly discussed, not only in Congress, but throughout the country. The principles and provisions of the bill were well and generally understood. The subject had attracted the attention of the Chief Magistrate himself, and this bill was made the subject of commentary in his message at the commencement of the last session of Congress. It must, therefore, be considered as a subject perfectly well understood by the President; for it was not to be supposed that he would have commented upon it, and recommended it to the attention of Congress, if it had not been understood. During the last session, this bill, which had previously been before the House, was introduced in this body, and was passed, and sent to the other House, whence it was returned with a slight amendment, taking away the discretion which had been vested in the State Legislatures as to the disposal of the proceeds. This bill, which had been before Congress the session before the last, which had passed at the last session, having been before the country for a whole year when it passed the two Houses, was placed before the Executive, with a number of other measures, just before the close of the last Congress. As the subject had been before the President for consideration so long previous to the passage of the bill, and he had reflected upon it, it was not to have been expected that he would take advantage of the shortness of the session to retain the bill until this time. Yet such had been the fact, and, a proceeding had taken place which was unprecedented and alarming, and which, unless the people of this country were lost to all sense of what was due to the legislative branch of the Government, to themselves, and to those principles of liberty which had been transmitted to them from the revolution, they would not tolerate. It was at least due to the Legislature that the President should have sent a few lines, courteously informing them that, when his own mind was made up, he would communicate the result. But, without deigning to make known his intention, or to impart the reasons which influenced him, he despotically kept silence, and retained the bill. Mr. C. begged leave to congratulate the Senate on the return of the bill. The question which now presented itself was, whether the bill was dead, in consequence of the non-action of the President, or whether it had become an existing law. He was not now about to discuss that question; but he had felt himself called on to make a few observations on this extraordinary course, and to say that it was due to Congress, to the people, and to the Executive himself, to have informed the last Congress in reference to this subject, concerning which he must have made up his mind. He would now move to lay this bill on the table, and would afterwards give notice of a day when he should ask leave to bring in a bill in order to submit it again to the action of the Senate.

Mr. KANE wished to know if it was the intention of the Senator from Kentucky that the bill should lie permanently on the table, or only to be called up at an early day.

Mr. CLAY replied that the only alternative was to consider the bill as defunct, or as an existing law. If the gentleman from Illinois could point out any other course, he had read some clause in the constitution which he (Mr. C.) had never yet been so fortunate as to find.

Mr. BENTON said he would wish to make a remark; and, if he was precluded by the pressing of this question, he would find some other opportunity of making it.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and decided in the affirmative—Ayes 19.

Mr. BENTON then moved to take up the message for consideration.

Mr. MOORE said he thought that the Senator from Missouri would have another opportunity of offering what he wished to say; and he was himself desirous to move the printing of an extra number of the Message.

Mr. BENTON said that a shameful and unfounded attack had been made on the President, and he wished to repel it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he should have no objection to vote for the motion, if he knew what was to be considered. If the gentleman would show that there could be any action on the subject, he would agree. This was one of the acts of the Executive which was out of order. He had sent to the Senate his constitutional objections to a bill which had become defunct by the expiration of the last Congress. It was a document intended not for the Senate, but through that body to give to the people the reasons by which he had been influenced. There could be no action on the subject by the Senate. The constitution prescribes that, when a bill was returned by the President, the ayes and noes should be taken, and if two-thirds of both Houses should vote for its passage, it should become a law, the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. But it was necessary that the bill should be returned to the Congress by which it was passed. There could now be no action on the subject; and the President had sent his reasons here without intending that there should be any reply to them. The paper, therefore, was sent out of time, like many other papers which had been sent to the Senate from the same quarter, since he (Mr. P.) had been there; and it was not competent to the Senate to take any course respecting it. It was a message to the people, through the Senate; and that he presumed was the impression of the gentleman from Alabama, when he expressed a wish for the printing of an extraordinary number. If the bill had become a law, no action of the Senate could annul it; if not, they could do nothing to make it so. He was against considering it now, or at any time.

Mr. BENTON expressed a hope that he might be permitted to take as wide a range as the gentleman from Mississippi. He wished to ask the Secretary to turn to the journal, and inform him on what day of the last session the bill was sent to the President. [The Secretary, having referred to the journal, replied, that it was sent to him on the 2d of March.] He wished the Senate to bear in mind that, as the 3d of March fell on a Sunday, the 2d was, in fact, the last day of the session. He then asked if there was not an ancient rule of Congress that prohibited the sending a bill to the President on the last day of the session? [Mr. KING answered that there was.] He then inquired if the sending of the bill on the 2d of March, last session, was not a violation of this rule? There was a precipitation and haste at the close of the session, which prevented not only the President, but the members themselves, from knowing precisely what they were doing. The rule to which he had adverted was set aside last session, and all the evils which accompany precipitation were the consequence. There were 142 acts put on the statute book last session. The 53d of these acts was signed on the 2d of March. So that there were about 90 acts signed on the last day of the session, and thus a mass of business was thrown on the President, which it was almost impossible to perform. And now the people were called on to revolt, and denunciations had gone forth that, if the people would put up with this, they would put up with any thing, because the President, in addition to all this mass of business, did not, on that day, write the paper which had now been read, and send the bill back. And this declaration was made in the presence of members who knew that it sometimes took them months to prepare a speech for the press, with the help of the note-takers and the speakers themselves, and all that were concerned. Yet the people were called on to revolt against the President for not preparing this paper in addition to all the legislative and executive business which pressed on him in the last few hours of the session. He had risen not only to defend the President, but to claim for him the approbation of all reflecting persons, for retaining the bill until he could have sufficient time to examine it, and prepare his reasons for objecting to it. Certainly, as far as he knew, the President had made up his mind at once in opposition to the bill, but no human hands could have written out the document itself. It had been found necessary to make several hundred references, all requiring extensive examination; but, leaving out all these, there was not time left even for the writing. He could not have gone through the mere manual labor. A great state paper was to be laid before the people; and the President was right to take time for reflection, and not throw back the bill instantly, as if he kicked it back in their faces, as much as to say that they had acted precipitately in their legislation. He repeated, that the President had acted in the manner most respectful to the Legislature. He had examined the subject, and had now, as explicitly as possible, said that he had weighed all the reasons which had been advanced in favor of the bill, and all the counteracting reasons which had operated upon him.

Dec. 5, 1833.]

Veto of the Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

He had risen to defend the President from what he considered an unjustifiable and violent assault made upon him for doing what was his duty. As to the bill itself, seeing the manner in which the Western elections had terminated, he was ready to meet it in any form. He entirely concurred in the suggestion for the printing of an extra number of the message.

Mr. CLAY said he did not rise to reply to any one who had felt himself called upon to rise in the Senate to vindicate the President. If there were any such member, he did not wish to disturb him in his office of vindicator of the President, or to affect the complacency with which he might regard his vindication. But he (Mr. C.) stood here to sustain his own course, to vindicate the constitution, and to vindicate the rights of Congress under it. And he must repeat, that the withholding of the land bill, at the last session, under all the circumstances of the case, was a violation of the constitution, and disrespectful to the Senate. What were the circumstances?

At two different sessions of Congress, the land subject was before it. At that which preceded the last, a bill had been introduced to distribute among the States the proceeds of the public lands. The whole subject, by the bill and by reports of committees, was laid before Congress and spread before the country. A copy of the bill, when it was first introduced, according to the constant practice of Congress, was sent to the President. He was thus, as well as the country generally, put in entire possession of the matter. It attracted great public attention. It engaged that of the President. And, accordingly, at the commencement of the last session, in his annual message, he adverted to it, in a manner which evidently showed that the writer of the message fully understood it, and all the views which had been developed about it.

[Here Mr. C. read the message of the last session, so far as it related to the public lands, to show that the President had himself invited the attention of Congress to it, as one of urgent and pressing importance; that the discretion of Congress to make any disposition of the public lands, which they might deem best for the harmony, union, and interest of the United States, was uncontrolled; that the question ought speedily to be settled; and that the President had considered, but objected to the bill of the previous session, proposing, as a substitute, a plan of his own, which, whilst the message on the table argued that the public lands belonged to all the States, proposed to give the unsold lands to some of them.]

Thus was Congress, at the commencement of the last session, officially invited to act, and to act speedily, respecting the public lands; and thus did the President manifest his knowledge of the provisions of the bill of the previous session. Well, sir, (said Mr. C.) Congress again took up the question. The identical bill of the previous session was again introduced, and again, prior to its passage, placed before the President, along with the other printed documents, according to standing usage. And it was passed by both Houses, substantially in the shape in which at the previous session it was passed by the Senate, except that the restriction as to the power of the States to apply the sum to be distributed among the several States, after deduction of the twelve and a half per cent. first set apart for the new States, was stricken out.

In this form the bill was laid before the President on the 2d day of March last. It was no stranger, but an old acquaintance. He had seen it repeatedly before; and he must have been well informed as to its progress in Congress. He had commented on the very project contained in the bill, when he had brought forward his own, in his message, at the opening of the session. Without deigning to communicate to Congress what disposition he had made, or meant to make, of it, he permitted the body to rise in utter ignorance of his intentions.

It may be true that there was a great press of business on the President on the 2d of March, and that he may have acted upon some ninety or one hundred bills. But this is what occurs with every President on the day before the termination of the short session of Congress. With most of those bills the President must have been less acquainted than he was with the land bill. Of some of them he probably had never heard at all. Not one of them possessed the importance of the land bill. How did it happen that the President could find time to decide on so many new bills, and yet had not time to examine and dispose of one which had long been before him and the public; one embracing a subject which he thought the union, harmony, and interest of the States required should be speedily adjusted; one which he himself had pronounced his judgment upon at the commencement of this session? By withholding the bill, the President took upon himself a responsibility beyond the exercise of the veto. He deprived Congress altogether of its constitutional right to act upon the bill, and to pass it, his negative notwithstanding.

The President is, by the constitution, secured time to consider bills which shall have passed both branches of Congress. But so is Congress equally secured the right to act upon bills which they have passed, and which the President may have thought proper to reject. If he exercises his veto, and returns the bill, two-thirds may pass it. But if he withholds the bill, it cannot become a law, even although the two Houses should be unanimously in its favor.

Mr. C. denied that the constitution gave to the President ten days to consider bills, except at the long session. At that session, the period of its termination is uncertain, and dependent upon the will of Congress. To guard against a sudden adjournment, by which the President might be deprived of due time to deliberate on an important bill, the constitution provides for ten days at that session. But, at the short session, it is not an adjournment, but a dissolution of Congress, on the 3d of March; and the day of that dissolution is fixed in the constitution itself, and known to all.

Mr. C. contended, therefore, that the act of withholding the bill was arbitrary and unconstitutional; by which Congress, and the Senate especially, in which the bill originated, were deprived of their constitutional right of passing on the bill, after the President had exercised his powers. Respect to Congress required of the President, if he really had not time to form a judgment on the bill, or, having formed it, had not time to lay his reasons before the body, a communication to that effect. But, without condescending to transmit one word upon the subject to Congress, he suffered the session to terminate, and the members to go home destitute of all information, until this day, of his intentions.

Mr. BENTON said that no quorum sat, in either House, on the evening after the day on which the bill was sent to the President.

The message was then laid on the table, when

Mr. MOORE moved that 5,000 extra copies of the message be printed for the use of the Senate; which motion was adopted.

Mr. CLAY gave notice that he should ask leave, on Tuesday, to introduce a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for a limited time, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALHOUN gave notice that he should, on Tuesday, ask leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the act of last session in amendment to the several acts providing for the collection of the public revenue, (commonly called the force bill.)

SENATE.]

Rhode Island Senators.—Appointment of Committees.

[Dec. 9, 1833.]

RHODE ISLAND SENATORS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution offered by him yesterday.

Some conversation took place on the propriety of changing the language of the resolution from the ordinary form, in consequence of the novelty of the case, and the possibility that the present proceeding might be drawn into a precedent. Mr. CLAY, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. KING participated; and Mr. CLAY moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "five Senators," the words "to be elected by the Senate;" which was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER then signified his impression that the whole proceeding was irregular and improper, and that the true course would have been to refer the credentials of Mr. ROBBINS, in the first instance; and if his election should be reported constitutional and proper, then to refer the credentials of Mr. POTTER to the same committee for their inspection.

At the suggestion of Mr. KNIGHT, however, who, while he admitted that the course indicated by Mr. POINDEXTER would have been the more correct, expressed a hope that no fastidiousness as to forms would be suffered to delay the proceeding on the subject, the question on the adoption of the resolution, as amended, was put, and carried in the affirmative.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the select committee, when the Chair announced that the following gentlemen composed the committee:

MEARS, POINDEXTER, RIVES, FRELINGHUYSEN, WRIGHT, and SPRAGUE.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9.

The Senate proceeded to the election of its officers, and, having balloted first for a Secretary, Walter Lowrie received 39 ballots, being all that were given, and was accordingly declared to be unanimously re-elected Secretary of the Senate.

A balloting next took place for Sergeant-at-arms, when it appeared that J. Shackford had received 25 votes out of 40, and was elected.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of an Assistant Doorkeeper, and, after six ballotings, Stephen Haight received 20 votes out of 39, and was accordingly elected.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. took this occasion to remark that he should have announced the standing committees this morning, according to the usual practice, had it not been that a resolution was offered by a Senator from Maine on Thursday, which proposed to take away from the presiding officer the power of appointing any committees whatsoever. As this proposition had placed him in a somewhat delicate position, he thought that he should best discharge his duty by waiting the result of this motion, especially as the inconvenience to the Senate of waiting a few days would be very trifling.

Mr. CLAY expressed a hope that the Senate would take up the resolution to which the Chair referred; and the Senate proceeded to the resolutions, the first of which was the following, submitted by Mr. BENTON on Thursday last:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate—

1. A statement of the amount of public moneys in the Bank of the United States at the end of each month for each year, from the establishment of the bank to the present time.

2. The average amount of the same for each year.

3. The average of the same for the whole time.

Mr. CLAY hoped that this resolution would be suffered to lie on the table until another day. He had wished himself to make a call on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the actual condition, not only of the United States Bank, but of all the other banks in which the public money had been deposited. He had no objection to urge against the resolution which had been offered; but, as he wished to obtain at a single view the condition of the whole of the public treasury, he would move that the resolution, for the present, lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to introduce a bill to repeal an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, approved March 2, 1832; and leave being granted, he introduced the bill, which was then read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON, on leave, introduced a joint resolution to amend the constitution of the United States in relation to the election of President and Vice President, which was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. BIBB, who stated that he had prepared a motion on the same subject, which he would submit on Wednesday, and wished both to be considered at the same time.

Mr. BENTON assented.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The Senate then took up the resolution submitted by Mr. SPRAGUE on Thursday, proposing to amend the rules as to restore to the Senate itself the appointment of its committees, instead of their appointment by the presiding officer.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that the resolution proposed to alter the rule of the Senate, on the appointment of their standing committees; and its object was to restore to the Senate the appointment of their own committees. It implied no disrespect whatever to the present presiding officer. The Senate had the appointment of their own committees before he had occupied the chair. It was a fundamental republican principle, that power should never be unnecessarily delegated. The appointment of committees he considered very important, and thought it should be executed by the Senate, unless in particular cases the appointment should be given to the presiding officer. He deemed it unnecessary to suggest to the Senate the importance of having proper committees. The information which they might collect and embody, and send forth to the world, would have a great effect in the formation of public opinion. The resolution proposed no novelty. It was only a recurrence to an old rule. If he was correct in the history of the rule, the method which he now proposed was adopted first after the formation of the Government. He was not aware of any change in that method of appointment by a vote of the Senate, till in 1823, when it was given to the presiding officer, and remained in his gift till 1826. In 1829 there was a change to the rule as it now stands, giving the power of appointment to the President pro tem. The reason assigned for this change was, that the Vice President was an officer not appointed by the suffrages of the Senate; and being thus not amenable to that body, his appointments might not be agreeable to the majority of that body. He presented these remarks for the consideration of the Senate, under a full conviction himself of their propriety; but he should be perfectly content with the determination of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. GRUNDY was not prepared to vote in favor of the alteration. He wished to be satisfied, before the change took place, of the benefit which would result from its adoption. There had been a great diversity of practice. Originally the Senate appointed all their own committees; but difficulties interposed, and induced a change of the rules, so as to give the appointment to the presiding officer. There was afterwards a change, that the appointments should be made by the Vice President, which remained the rule for a considerable length of time, till a Senator from Virginia expressed the belief that there was not such a political relation between the Vice President and the Senate as to justify the practice of his appointing the committees. The power was not given him by the constitution, and he was not responsible to the Senate. The old order was adopted, that the Senate should elect their committees, which continued in force till the fall of 1828. Mr. G. wished to be informed by those members who had had experience in this method, whether it was the occasion of any serious difficulties. A plurality of five or ten votes might place members on important committees, perhaps not improperly; but one thing was certain, that members might have experience to qualify them better than other members without such experience, even if the latter had the greater talents. Since the alteration of the rule to its present form, Mr. G. had been sensible of no inconvenience; and he doubted whether there had been any sufficient to authorize a change, because it had been the instrument of harmony and despatch in their proceedings. He was glad to hear that the proposed change was not predicated on any deficiency in the presiding officer; and unless there was some stronger reason for the change than had been urged, he should vote in opposition to the resolution, and in favor of the old rule. He repeated his wish to hear the opinions of those members of long standing, who had had experience in the various changes.

Mr. KING said it was evident that the practice of balloting for each member of a committee would occupy too much time; such a system was bad enough when applied to the election of a chairman, but would be almost impracticable as at present recommended. The fact is, that the evils arising from this method of appointment had formerly induced the Senate to run into the opposite extreme, and to vest too much power in the hands of the Vice President; but that, having afterwards discovered their error, they had taken it from the Vice President, and conferred it upon their presiding officer pro tem. In this procedure, he (Mr. K.) was of opinion that the Senate had acted most properly. They had placed the matter in the hands of an individual well calculated to fulfil the important duty which devolved upon him; one who knew the separate capabilities of each member—some gentlemen had talents for one description of business, others for another; one who would be able to parcel out the labor in a proper manner; one who was of, and amenable to, their own body; and one who had hitherto, in every respect, fulfilled his duties to their satisfaction. The matter is at present, he (Mr. K.) believed, settled in the manner most conducive to the general good; he saw no necessity for a change. By balloting for each member, four or five gentlemen might be chosen for the same committee. Arrangements might be made out of doors, and members might be influenced, for the moment, by popular individuals. He felt himself compelled to vote against any change in the present system, and could not see why any alteration should be wished for, unless gentlemen intended to appoint committees which should act just as they (gentlemen) happened to think proper.

Mr. BIBB wished to know what rule of the Senate would be altered by the adoption of the preceding resolution; he believed it would be the 34th rule, which declared "that, in the absence of the Vice President, the President pro tem. should have the power of appointing committees." He was certainly opposed to that rule; for, under its action, he had seen five or six votes elect a committee. Such committees were consequently not elected by a majority of the Senate; they were, in some cases, perfectly accidental: he had known an election influenced and decided by the simple fact of some of the members of that House sitting near each other. He was hostile to the resolution as it then stood, and must say, that if the rule were to be changed at all, he would desire to see it so altered that the appointment of committees should be decided upon only by a majority of the members of that House. He would, therefore, conclude by moving, as an amendment, "that the above-mentioned rule be so changed, as to render a majority of votes necessary to the election of each member of a committee."

Mr. SPRAGUE said he had no particular objection to the amendment, and should be pleased to see it acted upon, if it were practicable: he was himself in favor of a majority.

The amendment was then put and carried.

Mr. CHAMBERS argued in favor of the resolution, and against the postponement. He thought that the most proper mode of appointing the committees would be by the votes of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT said that, having sat so short a time in that House, he was unable to speak from experience of the advantages or disadvantages of the present system. He had, however, reflected upon the subject, and, setting all party feeling aside, it did appear to him that the question resolved itself into two points: either that the House should be contented to undergo the immense labor of balloting, or suffer the election of committees to be decided by a few votes. He did not pretend to decide upon this important question, but certainly was inclined to think that the Senate should not change its present system in this matter. It appeared that a controversy had formerly arisen upon this subject; that at one time the committees had been appointed by the Vice President; but that the Senate having become convinced of the impropriety of vesting this right in an individual not amenable to their body, had afterwards passed a rule permitting the committees to be chosen by the President pro tem. He had heard that if the Vice President had taken his seat at the commencement of this session, the present debate could not have arisen, as, by the existing laws of the Senate, he (the Vice President) would have preserved the power of choosing the committees. He had also learned, and from authority which he could not doubt, that the rule adopted in the fall of 1828 was considered as a distinct intimation to the Vice President that his presence would not be agreeable until the Senate had been organized. Mr. W. then referred to the journals of 1829 and 1830, and those of a subsequent date, and continued that he did this to show that the Vice President had not assumed his seat until after the organization of the Senate. He believed that the Vice President, in absenting himself, had only been influenced by natural and respectful feelings towards the Senate, and to give that body an opportunity of electing their presiding officer. Mr. W. concluded by saying that he believed there was a gentleman upon the floor of the House who could confirm what he (Mr. W.) had said, and give the House further information upon the subject.

Mr. CLAY said that he was, and he regretted to be obliged to acknowledge it, the oldest member of the Senate, having taken his seat here for the first time twenty-seven years ago, this month. He served out the session, and was then absent for some years; but, on his return, he found the Senate in the practice of appointing their own committees. He could not recollect that any particular inconvenience attended that mode of appointment. It took some time, but that time happened to be when the Senate had always a great deal of leisure, during the few first weeks of the session. He expressed his regret that his colleague had thought it necessary to introduce his amendment, but, since it had been adopted, he should vote for the resolution as it was amended. It would be easy to apply a remedy hereafter, if the necessity of having a majority to elect the members of a committee should be found productive of inconvenience.

Something had been said as to the absence of a high officer, and that absence had been justified on the ground of usage. It had been said that, since the rule was altered, an intimation had been given to the Vice President that it would be more agreeable to the Senate that he should be absent until the committees were appointed. He recollected a circumstance which occurred in the British House of Commons when he happened to be present. The ministers had been charged with neglect in not placing a squadron at the island of Elba, so as to prevent Napoleon from going back to France, and Lord Castlereagh was questioned concerning it. No man was more happy than his lordship in eluding a question when he did not desire to answer it, although it was equally due to him to state that no man was more fearless in meeting the consequences of his measures whenever he thought it proper to avow them. On this occasion, the ministers had been certainly guilty of great negligence; but it would not do for Lord Castlereagh to admit it. He therefore gave a response, which was somewhat like the intimation alluded to by the Senator from New York. He said that there was an understanding between the Government and a certain high officer, that, in "the event of contingencies," which he did not specify, a squadron was to be placed near the island of Elba. If any of the opposition could make any thing out of this reply, they were left to do so. If the Vice President viewed the adoption of the present system of appointment as an intimation, he must be very ready to take a hint. He (Mr. C.) always went directly to the place where the people put him, as a public servant ought to do, and there performed his duty, no matter what it was. As to the former Vice President, and the time when he appeared in his place, something ought to be allowed on the score of the distance he had to travel. There was a great difference between coming from Albany, especially with the present facilities of travelling, and a long journey from South Carolina, perhaps partly by water, and the residue over the bad roads of the Ancient Dominion. He thought it was an invidious distinction, that an officer appointed by themselves might with propriety appoint the committees, while an officer elected by the people was not permitted to do so.

He disclaimed any desire to throw an imputation on the presiding officer in his character as President pro tem. He had already, on a former occasion, testified to his entire fitness, and he was not now disposed to retract that testimony; and he would add, that the delicate manner in which that officer had this morning announced the course he had taken in refraining from the appointment of the committees, had given him a stronger claim to confidence. But he thought the Senate owed it to themselves to appoint their own committees.

Mr. BIBB said he did not wish to interfere with the sense of the majority of the Senate; but he thought that without the proposed amendment, to appoint each committeeman by a majority instead of a plurality, the resolution was highly objectionable; and even if it were so amended, it did not comport with his ideas of convenience. But if the committees were to be appointed by the Senate, he should insist on its being done by a majority. But he favored the rule in its present form, that the presiding officer appoint the standing committees, and all others, unless the practice should be dispensed with, by a special order of the Senate. The presiding officer could know how to make a distinction of labor and qualifications better than a majority. Mr. B. was strengthened in his views of the subject, from the belief that it was the practice in most deliberative bodies in Great Britain and America to appoint the committees by the presiding officer. He had not been heretofore sensible of any inconvenience resulting from the practice. It was one objection to the proposed mode of appointment by the Senate, that one-third of that body goes out every two years.

He therefore preferred the existing rule to that proposed, even with the amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE remarked, that as the Senator was willing to have the amendment reconsidered, he wished it might be done.

Mr. BIBB then moved to reconsider the amendment, which motion prevailed.

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. GRUNDY, on the original resolution, called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT, from motives of delicacy, asked to be excused from giving his vote on the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the resolution had no reference to the present presiding officer, and he hoped he would feel no delicacy in giving his vote. A single consideration ought to govern the vote; the committees should represent the Senate. It was of great importance that their reports should express to the public the sense of the Senate on all important measures. He thought, therefore, that when reports were thrown on the public, it should be done by committees who would truly represent the Senate. It was a delicate and difficult duty; but it should be done without regard to personal considerations; and when the committees throw upon the nation the vast volume of their reports, it should be conducted by the action of the Senate. He had learned that lists of the names of committees had been sent into the departments, to see if they were acceptable. He thought such a proceeding improper. If the Senate should act in the case for themselves, he thought it would be most likely to be acceptable to the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he should be glad of an opportunity for the further consideration of the subject, and, as the time was far advanced, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 10.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAY, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the public lands, and granting lands to certain States. He explained that the bill was the same as that which passed at the last session, without material alteration, excepting the removal of the restriction of the States in the application of the proceeds, which he considered as unnecessary.

The bill was then read a first time, and ordered to the second reading.

CONDITION OF THE BANKS.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the following resolution, offered by Mr. BENTON, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate—

1. A statement of the amount of public moneys in the Bank of the United States at the end of each month, for each year, from the establishment of the bank to the present time.

2. The average amount of the same for each year.

3. The average of the same for the whole time."

Mr. CLAY then moved to amend the resolution by adding as follows:

"And resolved also, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the names of all banks, and where they are respectively situated, which have been selected by him, in place of the Bank of the United States, as depositories of the public money; the amount of the capital of the said banks respectively, distinguishing between what has been actually paid in by the stockholders, and what has not been paid; the amount of public moneys in each of the said banks on the 1st of October, the 1st of November, and the 1st of December, 1833, distinguishing between the same standing to the credit of the United States, and those standing to the credit of any public officer, or other disbursing agent of the Government; the amount of debts due from each of the said banks on each of the days aforesaid, the amount of notes in circulation, and the amount of specie in their vaults, respectively; the names of the stockholders in each of the said banks on the 1st day of September and the 1st day of October last, distinguishing between foreigners and citizens of the United States; the mode in which transfers of the public money were made from the Bank of the United States to the said banks respectively, whether by warrant or otherwise; if by warrant, whether they were issued in pursuance of appropriations previously made by law, and whether any such transfers were requested by the said banks, or either of them, or made by the Treasury, to sustain the credit of the said banks, or any of them; and a copy of all correspondence between the Department of the Treasury and the said banks, or either of them, relating to the said transfers, or any of them; at what periods the several charters of the banks so designated as depositories of the public money expire; copies of the said charters; and whether the Secretary of the Treasury has been able to obtain, at all parts of the United States at which banks are established, the consent of banks to receive, as depositories, the public money, upon such conditions as he approves; and, if not, at what parts has he been unable to obtain such consent."

Mr. CLAY said that the amendment he had offered embraced a great variety of information; perhaps not all, however, which might be required by every Senator. In order to afford time for examination, and for making any additions to the call, he would move to lay the resolution on the table, and print the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he desired to call the attention of the Senate to a subject, perhaps exceeding in importance any other question likely to come before the present Congress. He adverted to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the deposits. He then moved to take up this report for consideration.

The motion having been agreed to,

Mr. C. then said that the charter granted to the Bank of the United States provided for the deposit of the money of the United States in that bank and its branches. It vested in the Secretary of the Treasury the power to remove those deposits, whenever such removal should be required by the public interests; but it is further required that whenever he does remove the deposits, he shall submit to Congress his reasons for the act at their next session. A removal of the public deposits had been determined on. How this was to be effected, or at whose instance, was not at present the question to be considered. But a removal had taken place; and the Secretary had stated that this was done by his order, and he had laid before Congress his reasons. When Congress, at the time of the passage of the charter of the bank, made it necessary that these reasons should be submitted, they must have had some purpose in their mind. It must have been intended that Congress should look into these reasons, determine as to their validity, and approve or disapprove them, as might be thought proper. The reasons had now been submitted, and it was the duty of Congress to decide whether or not they were sufficient to justify the act. If there was a subject which, more than any other, seemed to require the prompt action of Congress, it certainly was that which had reference to the custody and care of the public treasury. The Senate, therefore, could not, at too early a period, enter on the question—what was the actual condition of the treasury? A high officer of the Government, who ought to be in the chair, now so honorably filled by the President pro tem., and whose absence he (Mr. C.) sincerely regretted, had once told the Senate to see where the lost rights of the States were. Now he (Mr. C.) wished to discover where was the public treasury, and whether the public money was in safe custody.

It was not his purpose to go into a discussion, but he had risen to state that it appeared to him to be his duty as a Senator, and he hoped that other Senators took similar views of their duty, to look into this subject, and to see what was to be done. As the report of the Secretary of the Treasury had declared the reasons which had led to the removal of the public deposits, and as the Senate had to judge whether, on investigation of these reasons, the act was a wise one or not, he considered that it would not be right to refer the subject to any committee, but that the Senate should at once act on it, not taking it up in the form of a report of a committee, but going into an examination of the reasons as they had been submitted.

He wished to make the report of the Secretary the order for some particular day, in the belief that the requisition made by the act of Congress on the Secretary of the Treasury for his reasons on the removal of the deposits, was doubtless intended to place the whole matter before Congress for consideration.

Mr. C. then moved to postpone the consideration of the report until Monday next, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. BENTON admitted that Congress had full power to go into the examination of the report. But he requested the Senate to bear in mind that the Secretary had announced, among other reasons which he had assigned for the removal of the deposits, that it had been caused by the misconduct of the bank, and he had gone into a variety of specifications, charging the bank with interfering with the liberties of the people in their most vital elements—the liberty of the press, and the purity of elections. The Secretary had also charged the bank with dishonoring its own paper on several occasions, and that it became necessary to compel it to receive paper of its own branches. Here, then, were grave charges of misconduct, and he wished to know whether, in the face of such charges, this Congress was to go at once, without the previous examination of a committee, into action upon the subject?

He desired to know whether the Senate were now about to proceed to the consideration of this document as it stood, and, without receiving any evidence of the charges, or taking any course to establish their truth, to give back the money to this institution? He thought it would be only becoming in the bank itself to ask for a committee of scrutiny into its conduct, and that the subject ought to be taken up by the House of Representatives, which, on account of its members, its character as the popular branch, and the fact that all money bills originated there, was the most proper tribunal for the hearing of this case. He did not mean to deny that the Senate had the power to go into the examination. But to fix a day now for the trial of so important a case, he considered as premature. Were the whole of the charges to be blown out of the paper by the breath of the Senate? Were they to decide on the question, each Senator sitting there as witness and juror in the case? He did not wish to stand there in the character of a witness, unless he was to be examined on oath either at the bar of the Senate, or before a committee of that body, where the evidence would be taken down. He wished to know the manner in which the examination was to be conducted; for he regarded this motion as an admission of the truth of every charge which had been made in the report, and as a flight from investigation.

SENATE.]

Election of Chaplain.—Appointment of Committees.

[DEC. 10, 1833.]

The motion was then agreed to, and the report was made the special order for Monday next.

Mr. CLAY then offered the following resolution. He believed that, by the rule of the Senate, it would have to lie one day. His object was to discover who it was that had made the removal of the deposits.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether a paper, under date of the 18th day of September, 1833, purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the several departments, relating to the deposits of the public money in the treasury of the United States, and alleged to have been published by his authority, be genuine or not; and, if it be genuine, that he be also requested to cause a copy of the said paper to be laid before the Senate.

The resolution lies on the table.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

The Senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, being the election of a chaplain.

On the first ballot it appeared that there were 39 ballots given in, of which Mr. Post had 13, Mr. Pise 10, Mr. Smith 8, Mr. Hatch 6, and 2 scattering.

On the second trial 41 ballots were given in, viz: Mr. Post 14, Mr. Smith 11, Mr. Hatch 10, Mr. Pise 6.

On the third trial 40 ballots were given in, viz: Mr. Post 16, Mr. Smith 11, Mr. Hatch 12, Mr. Pise 1.

On the fourth trial there were 40 ballots given in, viz: Mr. Post 15, Mr. Smith 11, Mr. Hatch 13, Mr. Pise 1.

On the fifth trial there were 40 votes given in, of which there were for Mr. Post 14, Mr. Smith 8, Mr. Hatch 17, Mr. Pise 1.

On the sixth ballot Mr. Hatch received 23 votes out of 41, and was declared elected.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the following resolution offered by Mr. SPRAGUE:

Resolved, That the 35th rule of the Senate shall be amended so as to read and stand as it did prior to the 24th day of December, 1828.

The CHAIR having again requested to be excused from voting on the question,

Mr. CLAY moved that the Chair be excused.

Mr. GRUNDY said the question was first started by the Chair, and he believed that it arose from a misunderstanding on the subject. When the honorable Senator was appointed Chairman, the appointment of the committees devolved upon him in virtue of his office. He now asked to be excused from voting; and why? because of the delicacy of the case; because his vote would go to retain power, or divest himself of it. He asked what was the difference between the President and himself (Mr. G.) in voting on the resolution. Mr. G. would vote to take away power from the President, and give a part to himself; there was, therefore, the same ground for delicacy in both cases.

There were still other considerations adverse to his being excused. The power of the President was now temporary; to-morrow at 12 o'clock the Vice President might arrive, and the present presiding officer might, by being excused, divest himself of an important right to vote on the resolution, when he should stand on a level with the other Senators; and so, by declining to vote, or by being exempted from voting, an entirely different direction and decision might be given to the measure. Mr. G.'s sense of duty would not permit him to consent that the President should be excused. It was a sufficient reason why he should vote against his request, that it was due to his constituents to have them represented by a full vote.

Mr. CLAY said he had made the motion to excuse the President, not from any opinion or feeling of his own, but from an expression of delicacy on the part of the President. That feeling had been expressed by him yesterday; and, after a night's reflection, he had again suggested the same delicate consideration. The Senator from Tennessee had said that he and the President might both be excused on the same ground of delicacy. Mr. C. thought the questions were very different; they related to the investment of power in one man or many; to a concentration or distribution of power, of which the Senator would have 1-41 of the whole; the difference was as 41 to 1. Mr. C. was always disposed to applaud the motives which had for their object the avoidance of power, rather than those which would often suggest the declaration, "I am ready to take the responsibility."

The question was, whether the power of the Senate should be resumed by that body. The Senator supposed the Vice President might soon be here, and it was desirable that he should be; for, until he arrived, the Senate could not be properly organized. If he should arrive to-morrow by 12 o'clock, the Senate would then have all discretion, and would elect their entire committees by ballot. He should, however, insist on the restitution of the power to the Senate. Whenever the President should announce the conviction expressed by the Senator from Tennessee, he should yield the point at once; but, while his feelings of delicacy prevailed, he should persevere in the proposition to excuse him.

Mr. GRUNDY said he did not know the movements of the Vice President; he was not informed whether he would arrive to-morrow; but he did know that, for years, the Vice President never did arrive for a week after the session commenced, or at any rate till after the committees were appointed. If the Vice President had now done exactly as his predecessors had done without complaint, he saw no reason why complaints should now be made. He asked if the President had expressed an unwillingness to appoint the committees; he had not heard him; on the contrary, he had signified his wish to exercise the power of appointment. Of the propriety of his doing so, each individual must judge for himself; each had his own different ideas of propriety; but he would not consent to vote that a State should have but a single voice, when it had two Senators; and if the President's opinions accorded with his own, he would be against relinquishing his sense of public duty.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to say that he had never understood that the Vice President was not to take his seat till the appointment of committees had been made. He remarked that in all cases he had been unable to arrive earlier, and the reason why he did not must be attributed to domestic and private considerations; he was incapable of getting here in time. He had not intended to participate in the debate, but he would say that he entirely concurred with the Senator from Mississippi, that the committees should truly represent the Senate, and should therefore be chosen by their suffrage.

Mr. FORSYTH endeavored, in a few words, to vindicate the Vice President against the allusions which had been thrown out respecting him.

Mr. SPRAGUE thought the rule ought to be amended as proposed; or that the power of the President should not be left, as now, beyond the will and control of the Senate. He now held his power at the will of another man, who might appear at any moment, and, by taking his seat or not, as he pleased, might leave the choice of the committees to the President pro tem., or compel the Senate to elect them by ballot. He asked what inconvenience would be incurred by adopting the resolution? At this period of the session, it was not as great as was incurred by the people, in their primary assemblies, when they chose their own officers. He thought the Senate should not shrink from a labor that was constantly incurred by the people. It had been said that the appointments had better be made by an individual, because it was more simple and convenient; and the same had often been said of all power whatever in civil government. It was the old argument, that all power should be vested in an individual, for the convenience of its exercise and execution. Mr. S. supposed this doctrine had been long exploded, by the very nature of our institutions. He said he stood on the principle that power should never be unnecessarily delegated. For thirty-four years after the foundation of our Government, the practice had continued as it was now proposed; it had since fluctuated; but he was desirous of returning to the practice of our fathers in this instance, and it could not be more inconvenient now than at that time. He was perfectly willing, however, to accord with the determination of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT had one or two words to say. It was the present rule that all the committees should be appointed by the temporary presiding officer; but if the resolution should prevail, the power would be taken from him, and restored to the Senate; and even if the vote for its adoption should take from him the exercise of that power, he must still be governed by principles, however much the consequences might be dreaded. Of all the duties assigned him, none were so unpleasant as the appointment of the standing committees; it was impossible to satisfy all parties; indeed, he could seldom satisfy himself; and he should feel better neither to trust himself, nor be trusted by the Senate. He should, however, be perfectly content with whatever decision might be made by a majority of the Senate.

The President was then excused by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poin-dexter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wehster, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Alabama, Moore, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wilkins, Wright—18.

Mr. SPRAGUE said it was necessary to designate a time when the committees should be appointed, and, on his motion, it was fixed on Thursday next.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 11.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. BIBB, pursuant to notice, presented a joint resolution, proposing certain amendments of the constitution of the United States, on the subject of the election of a President and Vice President; which was read a first time, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. gave notice that he should ask the Senate to take up this resolution, and the one offered by Mr. BEXTON on this subject, on the second Monday in January.

CONDITION OF BANKS.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution offered by Mr. BEXTON:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate—

1. A statement of the amount of public moneys in the Bank of the United States at the end of each month, for each year, from the establishment of the bank to the present time.

2. The average amount of the same for each year.

3. The average of the same for the whole time."

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY,

Mr. CLAY modified his resolution in the 9th line, by inserting the words "treasury of the" before "United States;" and in the 15th line, after the words "United States," the words "the current market value of the stock of each of the said banks on the 1st day of September and the 1st day of November, 1833."

The amendment was then agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was also agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL DOCUMENT.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, was then taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether a paper under date of the — day of September, 1833, purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the several departments, relating to the deposits of the public money in the treasury of the United States, and alleged to have been published by his authority, be genuine or not; and if it be genuine, that he be also requested to cause a copy of the said paper to be laid before the Senate."

The blank was then filled up with the word "eighteenth."

Mr. FORSYTH said that this was an unusual call, and he was desirous to know for what purpose it had been made, and for what uses the paper which had been called for was intended. He presumed that no one had any doubt as to its genuineness. He had none.

Mr. CLAY replied, that the reasons for the call must be obvious, and would readily present themselves to every Senator; and, believing thus, he had not thought it necessary to suggest them. It had been said that the President had issued a particular paper, which he had read to the members of his cabinet, which had been promulgated to the public as his, and which was in the possession of the country as his. But the Senate had had no official declaration of the President, nor any official communication to them of this paper, nor any thing in any form, from him, which affirmed that this paper was his. If the President had merely read a paper to the members of his cabinet, without promulgating that paper to the world, it would have presented a totally different question. Gentlemen would have reasonably doubted if they possessed a right to call for the production of a paper which was confidential between the President and the members of his cabinet. But this paper had been promulgated to the world; and therefore, the Senate, if it was the production of the President, had a right to call for an official copy, that they might thus be assured, from the highest source, that it was genuine. He had himself no doubt that the paper was genuine, but the fact only rested, at present, on the assertion of a newspaper, and it was not every assertion of every newspaper which was fully entitled to credit. The only testimony, now, was the assertion of the editor of a newspaper, and it was only respectful to the President to ask him for a copy; and if a copy was communicated, there could be no right to presume that it was not genuine.

He was influenced by another reason. This was a proceeding altogether unprecedented in the annals of our country. It was the first instance of the publication of a paper read by the President to the heads of the executive departments. The constitution authorized the President to call on the members of the cabinet for their opinions, in writing, on all subjects under deliberation; but this document was a reversal of that constitutional rule; for, instead of going to the heads of departments for their opinions, the President had, by this paper, communicated the reasons which ought to influence their judgment. He would not go into the subject to show that it lay at the bottom of this inquiry by what authority, or for what reasons, the public deposits were removed from the bank, where Congress designed that they should be put, and placed in banks, where Congress designed that they should not be put. That was a part of the subject which would hereafter come up for discussion. He had merely risen to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, and to say that he wished to ascertain the genuineness of this paper, which now only rested on newspaper authority; and because, if it was an official act of the President, he was desirous to have it before the Senate in an official character. If any gentleman objected to the word "genuineness" in his resolution, he had no desire to retain it. It was merely his object to obtain possession of the paper, and he would then be willing to assume its genuineness.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if he understood the honorable Senator from Kentucky correctly, he admitted that with the intercourse between the President and his Secretaries, whether oral or written, the Senate had nothing to do. This view of the subject Mr. F. did not conceive to be affected by the publicity which, whether with or without the consent of the President, had been given to the paper referred to in the resolution. This paper was one said to have been addressed by the President of the United States to his confidential advisers. Mr. F. said he could not see why the honorable gentleman from Kentucky should entertain any particular desire to get at this paper. What official use could he make of it, when he had got it? Why depart from usage by calling for such a paper as this, unless it was intended to make some official use of it? Mr. F. said he could imagine that one branch of the Legislature might, under certain circumstances, have a right to call for it, and, if it were refused when called for, to obtain it by the use of means within its power. But this was not that branch of the Legislature. If the paper in question was to be made the ground of a criminal charge against the President of the United States, it must come from another body, and must be a part of the evidence on which the President of the United States is to be brought to the bar of this body, under a charge of high crime or misdemeanor. The honorable Senator had suggested that the paper referred to might be of vast use in ascertaining by whom the deposits had been removed. As to that, Mr. F. said, there was no question that the deposits have been removed; whether properly or not, would, he presumed, become a subject of inquiry. He presumed, also, that, as to that act, the Senate had already sufficient information to enable the gentleman from Kentucky to form his judgment upon it. Mr. F. concluded by saying he could perceive no use that the Senate had for this paper; the call for it was of a nature entirely unusual; and he should therefore resist it, and require the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to it.

Mr. BENTON said that he had intended to ask for the yeas and nays, if the gentleman from Georgia had not done so, because he considered it due to the Senate that it should appear on the face of the journal who voted for, and who against the resolution. As to the information sought for from the President, it was impossible for the imagination to conceive the uses to which this information could be applied. The President had already communicated his reasons to all America. He might refuse to send a copy to the Senate, in answer to their call; and such a refusal would, in his opinion, be proper, in reference to the effect it might have in cases to arise hereafter. He asked if it was proper to call on the President to say if a document, which appeared in a newspaper as his, was genuine or not? Was it proper that the Senate should call on the President to communicate to them a paper which he had read to the members of his cabinet? Supposing that, instead of a paper, the President had made a speech to his cabinet. What difference could be made between a written paper and a speech? He wished to know whether the Senate could have called on him to communicate a copy of his speech? If the Senate could do this, could they not go still further? and if they could call for this speech delivered to his cabinet, could they not also call for any thing which he had said to his cabinet, while sitting in his chair, and talking to them? And if they could do this, could they not go still further, and call upon him for any thing he might have said in conversation to any single member, and which had, by some means, got into a newspaper? Where, in fact, could a line be drawn? What if the members were lawyers; and he would ask of them what, in law, was the difference between words written and words spoken? Was not the whole of it parole? and the Senate might just as well call for what was spoken as for what was written. He had no doubt that a great many communications were made between the President and his cabinet on that day. The President might object to send a copy to the Senate. He had already given it to the world. Every Senator might take up the Globe, and read the paper, and might consider it the act of the President, and as much to be relied on as such as if he had before him the autograph of the President.

In asking for the yeas and nays, he had no desire to deter any member of the Senate from using this paper. It might be used from the Globe in which it was printed, as well as if a copy were communicated from the President. But his object was to prevent the Senate from putting a question to the President which he might not consider himself bound to answer.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that he considered the paper referred to in this resolution as one intimately connected with the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. If it was merely a correspondence between the President and heads of departments, or one of them, he (Mr. P.) would be one of the last to disturb the President of the United States, by calling for it. But, he said, he regarded it as a public document, and a document, too, of great importance. He regarded it as being in the nature of instructions from the President of the United States to the head of one of the departments, with respect to the manner of the execution of a duty confided to that department by law. The doctrine of the Senators from Missouri and Georgia amounted to this: that, if the President of the United States had written letters directly to public functionaries—to a foreign minister, for example—instructing him how to act upon subjects of great importance to the country, because they were letters from the President, and had not passed through the Department of State to this minister, it would be incompatible with the rights of the Executive and the duties of the Senate to call for these letters, although they had ever so important a bearing on our foreign relations, even to the extent of involving the nation in a war. Such a doctrine was wholly untenable. The paper in question, as Mr. P. understood it, contained nothing more or less than instructions to one of the heads of departments as to the manner in which he should exercise certain functions which by law devolved upon him. It is the business of this branch of the Legislature, said Mr. P., to enlighten the people, as well as they can, as to the manner in which the Government is conducted, and to keep them advised of all encroachments upon the rights of Congress or of the people, from any quarter. The question which now presents itself to Congress is, whether the broad line which the constitution has drawn between the President of the United States and the control of the national chest shall be effaced, and whether, by virtue of the power of appointment, the President of the United States shall not only take command of the army and navy, but shall also assume the unlimited control of the public purse? Upon his construction of his authority, as expounded in practice, and by the document referred to, what was to prevent the President of the United States from drawing ten millions of dollars from the treasury for any purpose he pleased? Nothing at all. He had only to say to the Secretary of the Treasury, I want ten millions of dollars—draw a warrant for it. The Secretary would perhaps reply, there has been no appropriation made by law for any such expenditure of the public money, and I cannot, therefore, draw the warrant. But, sir, the President might say, I will furnish you a paper containing the reasons why I require this ten millions of dollars; I take the responsibility upon myself; I do not mean to control you in the performance of what you believe to be your duty as Secretary of the Treasury, but I respectfully require that you will sign this warrant for ten millions of dollars. The Secretary, perhaps, would rejoin, and say, I have maturely considered your reasons, sir, but I cannot, according to law, and consistently with my sense of duty, sign this warrant. What then, sir? (said Mr. P.) Why, sir, with the promptitude of a Napoleon, or of the Grand Turk, or of the Emperor of Russia, the President might say, Mr. Taney, I appoint you Secretary of the Treasury; and, if Mr. Taney would not comply, he might appoint another, and another, until he found one fit to his purpose. By such an abuse of the power of appointment of the cabinet ministers, the President might assume the absolute control of the national chest, and at any time dip his hands into it, and take out whatever he would. Now, sir, I want this paper because it is in the nature of instructions by the President to the Secretary of the Treasury on this very question concerning the public money. So viewing it, I shall give the resolution my support.

Mr. FORSYTH said that, in his view, the propriety or impropriety of the proposed call depended on the use which the Senate were expected to make of this paper. For the purpose of informing the public it was not wanted by the Senate, for it was already public. We do not call for the paper, said he, in order to have it before us; for it is already before the world. Why do we want to have it officially before us? What official use can we make of it? I see none, sir. The only official use that can be made of it is one that the Senate cannot make; that is, as evidence of the criminality of the President of the United States, to be preferred by the other branch of the Legislature at the bar of this body. Is such use as this of the paper anticipated? And is this not the only course that can be pursued towards the President in case of the allegation of his having violated either the laws or constitution in connexion with that paper? If, under such circumstances, we were to call for this paper, it would only show that we were desirous to prompt the other branch of the Legislature to act in the case. The suggestion of the gentleman concerning letters from the President to foreign ministers, Mr. F. did not consider relevant to this question. But if there were a letter from the President to any officer, containing even treasonable matter, he should deny the right of this branch of the Legislature to call for it, that right belonging to another branch of the Government. Suppose the President were to write to the Secretary of State, you are to give such and such instructions to a foreign minister; Mr. F. asked whether the Senate would have a right to call for such a paper? No. No matter what it contained, even were it the direst treason, it could only come before the Senate in the shape of a charge against the President from the other House. No suggestion having been made of any official use of this paper to be made by the Senate, Mr. F. said he should still oppose the call for it.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that perhaps, after the various admissions which had now been made of the genuineness of the paper, the Senator from Kentucky might be induced to consider his purpose as well answered on that point, as if he retained the original phraseology of his resolution. And, in a modified form, he (Mr. W.) did not feel any objection to its adoption. He looked at the subject in a light somewhat different from that in which it was viewed by the gentleman from Georgia. If this was a letter to the heads of departments, it could hardly be an official document, and the Senate would have a right to call for it. His doubt was, whether it was an official act, which, as such, might come before the Senate without an express call. If it was a document which might come before the Senate in an official form, then the present motion might have been considered premature. But it could not be doubted by any one, that, before the close of the session, and it was impossible to tell how soon, there would be that before the Senate which would render it necessary to show how the removal of the deposits had been effected. That time would necessarily arrive, and he was desirous that all information on the subject should be communicated to the Senate. He was therefore influenced by a twofold motive. In the first place, he was satisfied that this subject must become a topic of discussion; and, secondly, he could not view this document as strictly an official act of the President. It had not been read to the cabinet only, but to the whole people. It appeared to embody instructions. It was a paper which did not essentially differ in its character from a proclamation. There was no existing statute which required of the President to send to the Senate a copy of a proclamation. But, during the last session, a certified copy of a proclamation had been sent to the Senate. And although this was not, in the strictest sense, an official proceeding, it was intended to be a public defence of an official act. If the resolution had been simply a call for that paper, he should feel himself bound to sustain it, as he last year supported a call for the proclamation to which he had alluded. He would therefore suggest that the part of the resolution which inquired as to the genuineness of the paper, and which carried on its face an implication, should be stricken out, and that the genuineness of the paper should be taken as admitted, and that the proposition should be merely a call for the paper. With the consent, therefore, of the Senator from Kentucky, (and certainly not without it,) he would move to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

"That the President be requested to send to the Senate a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the executive departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices."

Mr. CLAY said he believed there was no instance of an official paper emanating from the President having been sent to either House without a call for its production. It was the parliamentary usage, not only here, but in England and France, and in all countries, to make calls for official papers. There was no instance in which Congress had used any paper, purporting to be an official one, without previously calling on the Executive to lay a copy of such paper before them. All this was according to parliamentary usage. All proclamations, from the celebrated proclamation of neutrality of Washington to this time, had been brought before Congress by a call from one branch or the other. Such was the case with all papers emanating from authority. The motion which he had made, therefore, was in conformity to usage, and was the most respectful course to the President himself. A paper might be published surreptitiously, and yet bear on its face the stamp of authority. It was most proper to go at once to the highest source and obtain the fact.

As to the uses which were to be made of this paper, nothing seemed to run in the head of the gentleman from Georgia but the idea of impeachment. This appeared to be the only idea he could connect with the call. But there were many other purposes, and some of them had been named by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and there might still be others. Might it not be important to ascertain who had removed the public deposits? whether they had been removed by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury or not? and whether he was a mere automaton, or acting, as he believed, in the discharge of his duty? He (Mr. C.) had never intended to use the document in the form of impeachment, nor had he even indicated such a design. A great measure had been done, in connexion with the financial condition of the treasury, concerning which the gentleman from Mississippi had made some very apt and very excellent observations; and it was important to know whether the removal of the public funds had been done improperly, in order that, if so, the Senate might consider whether it might not be proper by a joint resolution to restore them.

As to the resolution being premature, he could not comprehend on what ground such a suggestion could be made. It was clearly the duty of Congress, as early as possible after their meeting, to look into the state of the treasury, and, in this case, to see if the transfers had been made, in conformity with the provisions of law, to other banks than that of the United States; to probe the matter thoroughly, and understand how, why, and on what authority it had been done. The reasons were only now given on the authority of the editor of a newspaper. He had said before that it was his object to get at the paper; and so far from intending any imputation on the Chief Magistrate, it was out of respect to him that he had made the motion, not desiring that, in an extraordinary proceeding like this, the facts should be taken on insufficient authority. His object being merely to obtain the paper, he would not object to the modification.

Mr. WEBSTER disclaimed any intention to impute a premature action to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was then modified according to the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. BIBB said he should not have risen in this debate, but for the ground on which the gentleman from Georgia had rested his argument. Believing that the Senate would have to act on this subject, he would not be satisfied to go into such action without evidence that this paper, which was called for by the resolution, was genuine. God forbid that he should take any thing put into that paper, which had polluted this document, and attributed it to the President, as genuine! Although he did believe this paper to be genuine, yet a regard to his public duty would prevent him from acting on it as genuine, because it appeared in that newspaper. He was sure the Senator from Kentucky did not want the paper for the purpose which had been intimated by the gentleman from Georgia. The President had in his message alluded to the removal of the public deposits, and the Secretary of the Treasury had made a report of his reasons for removing them. The paper now asked for was a paper in reference to this public act of the President. It was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, as one of the heads of the departments, and to the other heads, convened in common council, touching the public moneys. If the Senate had not a right of access to such a paper, he knew not what paper they had a right to ask for, until it should be graciously laid before them. He had no desire to found any action of the Senate on the assumption that a certain paper, published in the newspaper which had been named, was an authentic one. He should, therefore, vote for the resolution, in order that he might have the means of forming his own opinion upon the document; and as he had no desire to show any disrespect to the Chief Magistrate, he preferred the resolution in its modified form.

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote for the resolution, although he was far from feeling any disrespect for the President. He considered the official communication of this paper as due to the dignity of the Senate, and to the Chief Magistrate himself. And he submitted it to the good sense of gentlemen, if it would be treating the President with proper respect to predicate any action of the Senate, in reference to so important a subject, on newspaper authority.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to correct an error into which gentlemen had fallen as to what he had said. He did not mean to say that the paper was genuine because it had appeared in a certain newspaper. He knew too much of the newspapers to make such an assertion. But this newspaper was published at the seat of Government, and all the circumstances combined to give it a character of authenticity. It was a defence of his course to the cabinet. He differed from the view of this paper taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts; for he (Mr. F.) regarded it as a confidential paper. He thought that the Senate had quite as much right to call for the correspondence with Mr. Duane as for this paper; and he believed that gentlemen did not make the proper distinction between a confidential and a public act. As to the use which was to be made of the document, gentlemen said that this paper was the cause of the removal of the public deposits, and that these were the reasons which influenced that act. They then desire to go behind this paper—and for what? Was it to ascertain why the deposits were removed? No. It was to ascertain who had been guilty of the criminal act of removing them. He had not intended to say that gentlemen were desirous to criminate the President. He had merely adopted that view, by way of argument; and he believed that the effect of their proceeding would be to urge on the other House, and to show that, if they were neglectful of their duty, the Senate would act as judges in the case.

Mr. KING made a few remarks in opposition to the resolution. He did not see how the Senate were to act on this document; thought that they had no right to call for it; and expressed a belief that the President might, under the same impression, refuse to communicate it.

Mr. CLAY replied to the suggestion that the call for the paper, which was the subject of the depending motion, would be an intervention between the President of the United States and his cabinet. Mr. C. said he certainly did not so regard it. Rumor said that there were certain members of the cabinet who gave their reasons in writing against the removal of the deposits. These it was not proposed to call for; for Mr. C. agreed that the Senate have no right to call for confidential correspondence between the President and the heads of departments so long as it continues confidential. He had placed this call expressly on the ground that the paper in question had been published as by authority of the President, and that such publication remained uncontradicted. Would it not be a strange thing that the whole world should be put in possession of such a paper by the Executive, and that one of the co-ordinate branches of the law-making power should have no right to be in possession of it? In reply to the argument that the genuineness of the paper referred to was undoubted, because it had not been contradicted, Mr. C. said this was but circumstantial evidence of its authenticity; strong evidence, indeed, but not the best within the reach of the Senate. This evidence he should not presume that the President would refuse to furnish if called upon. If he did, it would be time enough then to take the next best evidence of the authenticity of the paper. Suppose, sir, said Mr. C., (in the course of some further observations,) the President were to give an order to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a warrant for money for purposes not required by law; and suppose the Secretary to issue the warrant, and place the order on his files. Or suppose, instead of taking money from the treasury in detail, the President were, by a sweeping act of his, so to exercise his powers as to transfer the whole of the public moneys from the place where the law required them to be kept; should we not have a right, when a paper is published as an appeal to the people justifying such a measure, to ask for a copy of that document? This right, on the part of the Senate, could not surely be questioned.

Mr. KANE gave briefly the reasons which would influence him to oppose the resolution. It was stated as one of the objects that it was to discover who had removed the deposits. If that was the object, the question had been already answered by the President and Secretary of the Treasury. But if the object was to show that the President had made a full statement, then the subject ought to be agitated in the other House, and not here, in the shape of a criminal charge.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Moore, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright—18.

So the resolution was agreed to.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1833.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have attentively considered the resolution of the Senate, of the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate "a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the executive departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices."

The Executive is a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government equally with the Senate; and I have yet to learn under what constitutional authority that branch of the Legislature has a right to require of me an account of any communication, either verbally or in writing, made to the heads of departments acting as a cabinet council. As well might I be required to detail to the Senate the free and private conversation I have held with those officers on any subjects relating to their duties and my own.

Feeling my responsibility to the American people, I am willing, upon all occasions, to explain to them the grounds of my conduct; and I am willing, upon all proper occasions, to give to either branch of the Legislature any information in my possession that can be useful in the execution of the appropriate duties confided to them.

Knowing the constitutional rights of the Senate, I shall be the last man, under any circumstances, to interfere with them. Knowing those of the Executive, I shall, at all times, endeavor to maintain them, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution, and the solemn oath I have taken to support and defend it.

I am constrained, therefore, by a proper sense of my own self-respect, and of the rights secured by the constitution to the executive branch of the Government, to decline a compliance with your request.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that the call, to which this message was a response, had been made upon the President after full deliberation. The right to make it was founded upon the presumed act of the President. It was founded upon the fact of the promulgation of the state paper emanating from the President relating to the deposits of the public money of the people of the United States, with the President's assent and direction. That paper had been published to the world, with the sanction of the President. It was now in the full possession of the people of the United States. It had been published to make an impression, and it had made a deep impression on their minds. But still it had been published on authority alleged by the editor of a newspaper to be derived from the President. Whether the paper was, in fact, genuine, or, if genuine, whether it was promulgated with the President's sanction, were questions respecting which we had no evidence, but that which the assertion of the editor of the paper itself, and concurring circumstances, afforded. In this situation it was, by (Mr. C.) himself, and he supposed by those who voted with him in supporting the call, deemed due and respectful to the President, due to the Senate, and due to the whole country, to appeal to the highest source of information in relation to this subject, and to request an authentic and official copy of the paper itself.

This call was in conformity with established usage, coeval, he (Mr. C.) believed, with the Government. Whenever either branch of Congress desires a public paper in the possession of, or proceeding from, the Executive, it has called for it. Innumerable instances of such calls are to be found in the journals of the two Houses.

In this case the President refuses to comply with the call; and, undertaking to judge of the rights of the Senate, and of the rights of the Executive, pronounces that the call is not one which the Senate can constitutionally make, or with which it is his duty to comply. Whatever sincerity and strength may exist in the opinion of the President, they cannot be greater than those which are entertained by him, (Mr. C.,) and he has no doubt by the majority of the Senate, that they have a right to an official copy of the paper. He had expressly disclaimed all right of intervention between the President and his confidential advisers. Every such purpose was, and is, distinctly disavowed. If the document had remained confidential, it would not and could not have been called for. It is because it has ceased to be confidential, and has been made public by the authority of the President himself; because he has broken the seal of confidence, and published to the world a highly important state paper, affecting the custody and safety of the treasury of the people of the United States, and the immediate if not the sole cause of the most important act ever performed by the Executive of the United States, that the call has been made. And is it come to this, that the whole world, including the people of the United States, may be put in possession of such a paper, and that an official copy of it shall be denied to a co-ordinate branch of the Government?

But, Mr. C. said, it was not necessary, nor was it his purpose, to proceed any further in this matter. He desired the highest and most authentic evidence of the paper in question. It has been applied for, and is refused. And now, by all the dictates of common sense, and according to all the rules of evidence respected here or elsewhere, he was at liberty to use the best evidence in his power; and he should hereafter use, on all fit occasions, a copy of the document referred to, as published in the current newspapers of the day.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he had always himself believed the motion calling for this paper unnecessary, and that no benefit could result from it. It was unnecessary, because evidence of a fact was only required when the fact itself was disputed. There was no dispute in this case. Friends and enemies had considered this paper as an authentic one. Why, then, was it necessary to call on the President for evidence that it was so?

Every body on his side of the House admitted the paper to be genuine, and every body on the other side believed it to be so; no benefit, therefore, was to be expected from the call. He had also another objection to the call, and that objection was now recognised by the Chief Magistrate himself. That was, that the Senate had not, in his opinion, a right to make a call for what had passed between the President and the members of his cabinet. If they had a right to do this, he did not know where they were to stop. He did not intend to question the motives of the Senator with whom this call originated. It had become the act of the majority of the Senate. But the President had said, in a respectful manner, that it was not a matter on which the Senate had a right to be informed. The President had thought, and correctly so, that to send this paper would be to establish a precedent of a dangerous character for those who might come after him. He (Mr. G.) did not know that he should ever have to say any thing on the subject of these deposits; but, if he should, it would be impossible for him to deny the authenticity of this paper. He believed that it was authentic, as firmly as he believed that he was now standing in his place.

He concluded with moving to lay the message on the table; and the motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the various memorials and resolutions transmitted by the States, on the subject of a graduation of the price of public lands, were ordered to be printed; and a tabular statement was directed to be prepared.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES.

The CHAIR having called the special order of the day, viz: the election of the committees,

Mr. GRUNDY rose and said, that, before the Senate proceeded to the election, he desired to make a motion, which he would introduce with two or three prefatory remarks.

The Senate had determined to deprive the presiding officer of the power of appointing the committees; and, although it was an act which did not receive his concurrence, he was not now disposed to question its propriety. The reason which was assigned for the change was, that it was proper for the committees to be strictly, in their reports, the organ of the sentiments of the body, and, therefore, that they ought to be elected by a majority of the Senate. What was now the condition of the Senate? There were now seven absent Senators. He meant Senators who were absent from Washington. Five of the seats had been filled, but the members had not yet arrived, and two of the members are not yet elected. The five elected Senators were expected hourly to arrive in the city. The Senator from Pennsylvania was, perhaps, even now in the city. At any rate, he was informed that that gentleman would be here to-night. The Senator from Georgia was expected to arrive shortly, as also the one from Louisiana, and the one from Delaware. All, with the exception of the two who were not yet elected, might be expected in their places on Monday. He asked if it was possible to procure a fair expression of the sense of the Senate, if they were to go into the election at this time? There must be considerable hazard and risk in the attempt. He wished the postponement, because there would be more members present on Monday; and he presumed that, according to usage, the Senate would to-day adjourn over until Monday.

He had also another reason. Three out of the five Senators who were absent had been appointed by the Governors of their respective States since the last session. They were not yet qualified, nor, in common parlance, could they be considered Senators. They must accept their appointments, and signify it by appearing here and taking the oath. Could the Senate properly appoint any of these on committees, however well qualified they might be? He had put the question as to the practice of the Senate on this point to experienced members, but they were not able to inform him. He knew it was the practice of the other House not to appoint on committees any members who were not on the floor, or who had not shown themselves since the commencement of the session. It was the practice of the Senate to appoint their absent members; but he wished to know whether they had in this manner recognised those who had not yet appeared to take the oath and their seats. Mr. CLAYTON, of Delaware, and Mr. WAGGAMAN, of Louisiana, might be appointed, but one Senator from Georgia and one from Louisiana could not. He was not himself prepared to vote for any Senator until he had appeared here.

He moved to postpone the election of committees until Monday.

Mr. CLAY said he hoped that the proposed postponement would not take place. The Senate was now as full as it usually was throughout the session. It was now nearly the close of the second week of the session; and it was urged that the Senate should still put off the appointment of their committees, respecting which every gentleman must have come into his place with his mind made up. The Senate had on Tuesday appointed this day for the election, and the Senator from Tennessee was then as well advised of the absence of these Senators as he was to-day, but there was then no proposition made to postpone the election to a remoter day. There was a general acquiescence in the order, and gentlemen had now come prepared to give their votes, and the public interests would suffer from any further delay. There are some bills on the table which ought to be referred to committees, and he had himself several memorials, which he had kept back until the committees should be appointed. The last two days of the week are generally those on which committees meet; and, if they are elected to-day, much business might be prepared previous to the meeting of the Senate on Monday.

If the Senate looked to the political character of the absent members, he thought, so far as they were elected, the result would not be changed by delay. As to those who are not yet elected, he could say nothing. It was scarcely possible to say when one of the Senators from Louisiana would arrive, as it depended, perhaps, on winds and waves. It was his impression, although he had not looked over the journals, that the absent members had been invariably appointed on the committees. The qualification must precede the entry or service. He saw no reason for delay, and hoped the Senate would proceed to the election.

He concluded with asking for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that he had voted for the change in the mode of appointing the committees with great reluctance, because it appeared to him that there would be a great difficulty in filling up the committees. There would be no difficulty, perhaps, as to the election of a chairman, but much as to the others, where pluralities are required. Since the Senate had adopted the change in the mode, it seemed to be only proper that time should be given for those who are absent to have an opportunity to be here. The Senate was not full. Their absent brothers had no great reason to expect that their votes would be required in reference to this subject. He had made no inquiry as to the political character of the Senators who were absent, but he thought it was somewhat early to bring forward important business; and, if any Senator asked for delay, he thought the election should not take place. He would, therefore, vote in favor of the postponement.

Mr. CLAY said it had been intimated that it was too early to proceed to the election of committees. He wished the Secretary to refer—

Mr. WEBSTER rose to explain. He had not said it was too early to elect the committees, but that it was early for taking up important business.

Mr. CLAY resumed. There was no important business which was now required to be taken up. The only object was to prepare for business. In no case had the appointment of the committees been put off beyond the second week of the session. If the Vice President had been in his seat at the commencement of the session, the Senate would have elected their committees before this time. And he wished to be informed how the Senator in Louisiana could have been informed that the gentleman from Albany had not arrived and taken his seat? The election could require no great time. A single ballot was sufficient where a plurality could elect.

Mr. GRUNDY said this was a new case. There had never been an election under precisely similar circumstances. The Senate had now changed the generally understood practice. When the Senate formerly elected their committees, it was known to be the practice, and Senators were sure the thing would be done, whether they were present or not. Now, when the Senate had changed the practice, the case was a new one, and the absent Senators could have no right to expect that they would so soon be called on.

The question was then on the motion to postpone, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright.—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Kent, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Preston, Southard, Sprague, Tyler.—13.

So the election was postponed.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The Senate then adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States this day took his seat in the chair of the Senate, and delivered the following address:

SENATORS: On entering on the duties of the station to which I have been called by the people, deference to you and justice to myself require that I should forestall expectations which might otherwise be disappointed. Although for many years heretofore a member of the Senate, I regret that I should not have acquired that knowledge of the particular order of its proceedings which might naturally be expected. Unfortunately for me, in respect to my present condition, I ever found those at hand who had more correctly appreciated this important branch of their duties, and on whose opinions, as to points of order, I could at all times safely rely. This remissness will, doubtless, for a season, cause me no small degree of embarrassment. So far, however, as unremitting exertions on my part, and a proper respect for the advice of those who are better informed than myself, can avail, this deficiency will be remedied as speedily as possible; and I feel persuaded that the Senate, in the mean time, will extend to me a considerate indulgence.

But, however wanting I may be, for the time, in a thorough knowledge of the technical duties of the Chair, I entertain, I humbly hope, a deep and solemn conviction of its high moral obligations. I am well aware that he who occupies it is bound to cherish towards the members of the body over which he presides no other feelings than those of justice and courtesy; to regard them all as standing upon an honorable equality; to apply the rules established by themselves, for their own government, with strict impartiality; and to use whatever authority he possesses in the manner best calculated to protect the rights, to respect the feelings, and to guard the reputations of all who may be affected by its exercise.

It is no disparagement to any other branch of the Government to say that there is none on which the constitution devolves such extensive powers as it does upon the Senate. There is scarcely an exercise of constitutional authority in which it does not mediate or immediately participate; it forms an important, and, in some respects, an indispensable part of each of the three great departments, executive, legislative, and judicial; and is, moreover, the body in which is made effectual that share of power in the federal organization so wisely allowed to the respective State sovereignties.

Invested with such august powers, so judiciously restricted, and so largely adapted to the purposes of good government, it is no wonder that the Senate is regarded by the people of the United States as one of the best features in what they at least consider to be the wisest, the freest, and happiest political system in the world. In fervent wishes that it may long continue to be so regarded, and in a conviction of the importance of order, propriety, and regularity in its proceedings, we must all concur. It shall be an object of my highest ambition, Senators, to join with you, as far as in me lies, in effecting those desirable objects, and in endeavoring to realize the expectation formed of this body at the adoption of the constitution, and ever since confidently cherished, that it would exercise the most efficient influence in upholding the federal system, and in perpetuating what is at once the foundation and the safeguard of our country's welfare—the union of the States.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES.

The Senate then proceeded to choose, by ballot, the several standing committees.

The first balloting was for Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and resulted as follows: Mr. Wilkins 21, Mr. Forsyth 19, scattering 5.

On the second ballot Mr. Wilkins had 26, Mr. Forsyth 18. So Mr. Wilkins was appointed Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAY then said that the rule did not prescribe whether the Senate were immediately to proceed to fill up one committee before they proceeded in the election of the chairmen of the other committees. He thought it might be more convenient to elect all the chairmen of the several committees.

Mr. KING said the practice had been different. It had been usual to elect the whole of a committee before the Senate proceeded to the election of the other chairmen.

Mr. CHAMBERS took a similar view, and suggested to his friend from Kentucky the propriety of withdrawing his motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER renewed the motion, under the impression that it would be the most convenient mode.

The rule having been read, Mr. CLAY remarked that it sustained his view of the subject.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, and decided in the affirmative.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of the chairmen of the other committees.

For Chairman of the Committee on Finance, Mr. Webster received 21 votes, Mr. Wright 18, scattering 5.

On the second ballot Mr. Webster had 22, Mr. Wright 16, scattering 6.

On the third ballot Mr. Webster had 22, Mr. Wright 13, scattering 2. So Mr. Webster was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Mr. Silsbee received 23 votes, Mr. King, of Alabama, 19. Mr. Silsbee was therefore elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, Mr. Frelinghuysen received 23 votes, Mr. Clay 16, scattering 6. So Mr. Frelinghuysen was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. Brown received 42 votes, scattering 3. So Mr. Brown was elected.

[Dec. 17, 18, 1833.]

For Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. Benton received 36 votes, Mr. Forsyth 5, scattering 4. So Mr. Benton was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on the Militia, Mr. Robinson received 43 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. Southard received 23 votes, Mr. Rives 18. So Mr. Southard was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, Mr. Poindexter received 24 votes, Mr. Kane 18, scattering 2. So Mr. Poindexter was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Public Land Claims, Mr. Kane received 41 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, Mr. White received 42 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Claims, Mr. Bell received 29 votes, Mr. Brown 11, scattering 4. So Mr. Bell was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. Clayton received 21 votes, Mr. Forsyth 11, scattering 11.

On the second ballot Mr. Clayton received 22 votes, Mr. Forsyth 16, scattering 2. So Mr. Clayton was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Mr. Grundy received 42 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, Mr. Hendricks received 43 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Mr. Tomlinson received 25 votes, Mr. Sprague 9, scattering 7. So Mr. Tomlinson was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, Mr. Moore received 38 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. Chambers received 28 votes, Mr. Tyler 9. So Mr. Chambers was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on the Contingent Expenditures of the Senate, Mr. Knight received 37 votes, and was elected.

For Chairman of the Committee on Engrossed Bills, Mr. Shepley received 23 votes, Mr. Robbins 11, scattering 6. So Mr. Shepley was elected.

The remainder of the following several committees were then filled up by ballot, as follows:

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Rives, Forsyth, Sprague, and Mangum.

On Finance—Messrs. Tyler, Ewing, Wilkins, and Mangum.

On Commerce—Messrs. King, of Alabama, Wright, Waggaman, and Sprague.

On Manufactures—Messrs. Knight, Morris, Linn, and Prentiss.

On Agriculture—Messrs. Robinson, Kent, Swift, and Wright.

On Military Affairs—Messrs. Tipton, Preston, Clayton, and King, of Alabama.

On the Militia—Messrs. Hendricks, Waggaman, McKean, and Clayton.

On Naval Affairs—Messrs. Bibb, Robbins, Tallmadge, and Chambers.

On Public Lands—Messrs. Moore, Prentiss, McKean, and Clay.

On Private Land Claims—Messrs. Linn, Naudain, Poindexter, and Silsbee.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17.

The Senate resumed the filling up of the committees, &c., as follows:

On Indian Affairs—Messrs. Frelinghuysen, Tipton, Smith, and Swift.

On Claims—Messrs. Brown, Naudain, Wright, and Tipton.

On the Judiciary—Messrs. Bibb, Preston, Smith, and Bell.

On the Post Office and Post Roads—Messrs. Ewing, Rives, Clayton, and Knight.

On Roads and Canals—Messrs. Hill, Southard, Shepley, and Kent.

On Pensions—Messrs. Prentiss, McKean, Tallmadge, and Kane.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Tyler, Southard, Bibb, and Tomlinson.

On Revolutionary Claims—Messrs. Swift, Hill, White, and Shepley.

On the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Tomlinson and Tallmadge.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Morris and Robinson.

TREASURY REPORT.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the report was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Finance, and 1,500 extra copies were then ordered to be printed.

After transacting some executive business, and receiving sundry petitions,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18.

Mr. POINDEXTER laid the following resolution on the table:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to communicate to the Senate—

1. The whole amount of public lands belonging to the United States sold since they were ceded to the United States, exhibiting the nett proceeds, and distinguishing between those which have been sold within the limits of Louisiana, Florida, and other parts of the United States, respectively, and including the latest returns.

2. The whole amount of public lands which have been surveyed and exposed to sale in the several States and Territories, and showing the amount sold, and the amount remaining to be sold, according to the last returns.

3. The amount which have been actually patented in bounties to the army during the late war.

4. The amount granted to each of the several States and Territories, and for what purposes.

5. The amount set apart or reserved for schools in the several States and Territories.

6. The amount granted in donations for the cultivation of the vine and olive to Lafayette, and for all other purposes.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the message of the President of the United States, assigning his reasons for returning the bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, &c., was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY laid the following resolutions on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the entire letter addressed by Mr. Crawford, when Secretary of the Treasury, under date the 13th February, 1817, to the president of the Mechanics' Bank of New York, an extract from which is recited in his report to Congress of the 3d December, 1833; and copies of the other correspondence of Mr. Crawford with the banks about that period, to passages in which the Secretary alludes in the same report.

Resolved, also, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the correspondence between the agent appointed, during the last summer, to inquire upon what terms the State banks would undertake to perform the services to the Government which had been performed by the Bank of the United States, and the said banks; a copy of the report made, if one were made, by the agent, to the Secretary, or to the Executive; the name of the agent, his compensation, and in virtue of what law he was so appointed.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then called the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the depositories, &c.

Mr. CLAY then rose and said that he was still of opinion that this subject required a very early and prompt decision. But some information, which had been called for, and which it was necessary to have before the discussion came on, had not yet been received; and other information equally necessary would probably be asked for to-morrow. This would cause delay, and he, therefore, did not propose at present to go into the discussion. He was also desirous, when the subject should be taken up, to close what he would have to say with some resolutions which he had not yet prepared.

He therefore moved to postpone the consideration of the special order until Monday, which motion was then agreed to.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19.

TREASURY SUITS.

Mr. TYLER asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to repeal the act for the better organization of the treasury, approved May, 1820.

Mr. T. asked the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks explanatory of his views and motives in asking the leave now sought to be obtained. The act of 1820, which he sought to repeal, was an innovation upon the established usage of the treasury from the foundation of the Government. The Government, during that long course of time, rested upon the remedy by suit, contenting itself to prescribe, as it did by the acts of 1795 and 1797, the mode of proceeding at the treasury, in order to ascertain the true balance against a supposed delinquent, giving priority of its own debt over that of others, and prescribing what should be available proof in the suits the agent of the treasury might deem it proper to institute. In this respect it pursued the plain course dictated by ordinary justice, and sanctioned by the high behests of the constitution, whatsoever might be the state of the account. However well ascertained the balance due from the debtor, although his acknowledgment in writing of such balance might be exhibited, yet the high judicial power of issuing compulsory execution was denied to the treasury. The reasoning then employed was doubtless that which he should employ upon the present occasion—that it was far better to incur the short delay of a motion, on ten days' previous notice, or a regular suit, in either of which proceedings the matter would be submitted, under the constitution, to an impartial jury, than invest the subalterns of the treasury with the despotic power of issuing peremptory process, and of seizing with strong hand upon the person and effects of the debtor. Such was the law up to 1820, when the act was passed which he sought to repeal. That act authorizes the Comptroller of the Treasury to certify the balance due from any disbursing officers of the Government to the agent of the treasury, and requires the agent to issue forthwith a distress against the goods and person of such officer, who is thereupon deprived of his property or of his liberty, without a trial by his peers, and upon the arbitrary decision of a mere subaltern of the treasury—the accounting officer. This proceeding does not require even the sanction of the Secretary; it is the work of the Auditor and Comptroller conjoined, who are thus invested with the power of subjecting an officer of the Government to utter ruin in character and fortune. The trial by jury, guarantied by the constitution, is virtually set at naught, and an edict condemnatory and penal usurps its place. He supposed a case, to show the kind of authority with which these officers are invested. A disbursing agent receives all the notices which the law provides as preliminary to this severe process of distress. He appears at the treasury, and presents his vouchers, showing a full disbursement of all moneys which have come to his hands; the vouchers are esteemed insufficient; the party insist upon their sufficiency, while the accounting officer maintains the opposite. If the case were submitted to a jury, they would be held to be sufficient; and yet, sir, the party is placed at the mercy of the Auditor, who certifies to the Comptroller, who certifies to the agent, who is required instantly to proceed to issue his execution against the estate of the unfortunate man and his securities; and if there be no estate, then his and their persons are to be seized and thrown into a loathsome jail. Suppose, then, a nominal debtor to have received of the Government 100,000 dollars, for example, and, by the interruption of his accounts, in the rejection of important items, the settlement is entirely prevented. He may have fair and legitimate vouchers in his possession, greatly to reduce it, and yet he stands, by the books of the treasury, debtor to the whole amount, and his person is liable to seizure for the whole amount. But this may not be the only circumstance which may oppress him. What if the accounting officer shall be his enemy? What if he shall think proper to make his office the means of gratifying a revengeful spirit? This law arms him with power and authority, and his victim stands within his reach. My conviction is, said Mr. T., that this act is subversive of the spirit of our constitution, and despotic in its character, and that it should, therefore, be repealed.

It is but a very poor reply to say that the party may obtain an injunction, upon giving security, by applying to a judge of the Federal Court, and satisfying him that he has discounts. What if the demand be so great that he cannot find security, or some causes interpose to prevent an application to the judge? In either event, his property is seized upon, even down to the minutest article; his family, if he have one, turned adrift upon the charity of the world; or he himself imprisoned, without the hope of relief. It is no answer to say that he may obtain an injunction. So may any debtor, if he can show discounts. But is this any reason why the creditor should have power conferred on him by law to give judgment and issue execution upon his own mere motion?

The severity of this law has prevented a resort to it but in very few cases. If they have been numerous, they have not come to my knowledge. The fact of its non-enforcement is sufficiently manifested by reference to the long catalogue of those who are annually reported to us as public defaulters. Why is not this law enforced in every case? It may be (I know nothing authoritatively) that, under the last section of this act, remedies previously existing are preserved; and this may be so construed as to invest the treasury officer with discretionary power over the remedy. If so, he considered it as forming a still stronger objection to the law. He objected to investing public men with too broad discretion. In order that laws should operate justly, they should operate uniformly and equally. A defaulter was a defaulter, and each and all should be subjected to the same process. If the application of the law be left to the arbitrary discretion of those who administer it, it may be used as an instrument of revenge. For one, he was not disposed to leave the right of the citizen in a situation of so great hazard.

He trusted that, for the reasons he had stated, the leave asked would readily be granted, and an act so despotic be obliterated from the statute book.

The bill was then read a first and second times, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SENATE.]

Post Office.—Presidential Document.

[Dec. 19, 1833.]

POST OFFICE.

Mr. GRUNDY offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1st, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement of all the allowances by him made, beyond the sums stipulated in the original contract, since the 6th of April, 1829; specifying, in every case, the service to be performed by the original contract, and the sums to be paid thereon; the nature and extent of each facility or improvement, and the extra allowance made therefor; and the names of the persons to whom the allowance has been made, and at what time.

2d. A statement of the curtailments of facilities lately made by the department, specifying each route, and the names of the respective contractors, and the amount of the diminution of service and of compensation, in each case; also, what routes, if any, have been discontinued.

3d. The expenses incurred in putting into operation the post routes established by the act of the 15th June, 1832, and cost of transporting the mail on said routes in each year.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. GRUNDY requested their immediate consideration. The question being then on their adoption,

Mr. CLAY said he was happy that the gentleman from Tennessee had offered these resolutions. He would give his vote for them with great pleasure. If what public rumor had said concerning this office was correct, there was no branch of Government, in this or any other country, where there prevailed greater abuses. It was the duty of the Senate not only to correct the past, but to provide a remedy. He wished that the resolution should be so limited as to its call, as not to allow the Postmaster General a pretext for evading it, because he was apprehensive that every delay which could be devised would be interposed to prevent a reply. The Senate might otherwise be told of voluminous contracts, and might be referred to the ancient documents to illustrate the charge of error which he had alleged against the department, even as far back as the days of Habersham.

Mr. GRUNDY informed the Senator from Kentucky that the resolution did limit the call to the year 1829, the period when the present Postmaster General came into office. The gentleman from Kentucky had referred to certain rumors which charged gross abuses on the department. He had supposed that the Senator from Kentucky, and every body else, would not be willing to give very great credit to what public rumor said in reference either to a public department or to a public man. He desired to have the truth; and when he had it, and examined the facts, he would be ready to give his opinion whether any corruption existed in the department or not. It was true that rumor had said a great deal; and he wanted the facts, if it was true, in order that the country might discern them. If nothing censurable had occurred, he desired to see the rumor put down; and that was the only way in which justice could be done to any public man. The people could then form their judgment from the facts, and not from any thing published in a partisan paper. He could not conceive the possibility of any delay being interposed, and he had no doubt that in a few weeks all the information asked by this resolution, and as much more as any Senator might call for, would be furnished.

Mr. CLAY said he had overlooked the limitation in the resolutions, and was satisfied with it.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, rose and said, it was with profound regret that he felt himself impelled by a sense of duty to call the attention of the Senate to a subject involving considerations of a deeply interesting and most delicate nature. He said that he alluded to the message of the President of the 12th instant, responding to a request contained in a resolution of the Senate, in relation to a paper purporting to be published by his authority, in reference to the depositories. Next to the grave and novel occurrence requiring this notice, he said he most regretted that the duty had devolved upon him to invite to it the consideration of the Senate. He had delayed taking this course for several days, hoping that some other Senator would conquer the repugnance so natural and so inevitable in the discharge of a duty so delicate and so painful; that he had hoped that some notice of the subject would have proceeded from a different quarter. But his hopes in this respect not being realized, and as he was one of those who voted for the resolution alluded to, he felt it proper and necessary to take this course.

The subject (said Mr. M.) involves high and grave matter, not in reference to the character of the information sought, for that is comparatively of utter insignificance; but as touching the constitutional rights of the Executive and of the Senate, and what, among gentlemen, can be considered as of but little less consequence, that high courtesy and mutual respect so essential to the harmonious action and efficient co-operation of the different departments in our political system.

That the Senate should, at any time, through inadvertence, or any other cause, attempt an invasion of the constitutional rights of the Executive, or prove deficient in a high and manly courtesy, would present an occasion of the profoundest regret to every lover of our institutions. That the President regarded the resolution alluded to in the light of an invasion of the rights of the Executive, is most manifestly clear and intelligible. That the Senate did not regard their proceeding as in any respect transcending the just and legitimate rights conferred by the constitution upon this body, and sanctioned by a long usage, he supposed equally manifest and unquestionable. For himself, he did not dream that, by his vote, he was encroaching upon the rights of the Executive, or in anywise manifesting the slightest disrespect to that co-ordinate branch of the Government. He should have been, in the simplicity of his heart, at an entire loss to conceive of any very specious ground upon which the application could have been resisted. A due respect, however, to the opinion entertained by the Executive, did, in his judgment, require a prompt review of the whole proceeding, with a calm and dispassionate deliberation. Any exhibition of temper on the part of the Senate would be as incompatible with its dignity, as it would be revolting to the good taste of the country. He trusted the Senate was wholly incapable of feeling any.

If the Senate had erred, it was magnanimous, it was their imperious duty, instantly to retract the error. It was due alike to the Executive, to our institutions, and, above all, to themselves.

If, however, after a calm and deliberate re-examination of our proceeding, we shall find nothing to retract; but if, on the contrary, we shall feel re-assured that we have exercised none but the clear and unquestionable constitutional rights of the Senate, it will be equally our duty, however painful may be the conflict of opinion, to re-assert and maintain, with dignity and with firmness, the constitutional rights of that body.

The framers of our system wisely saw that power must be broken into fragments, or resolved into its simplest elements, and distributed among the different departments with deep sagacity, and a wise caution, to secure the harmonious and successful action of the whole. They foresaw the tendency, deeply impressed upon the nature of every political system, to the accumulation and concentration of power at a single point. They foresaw that a perpetual vigilance over the power assigned to each department was the only condition on which liberty could be preserved. Hence every intelligent friend of our system should be as reluctant to invade the rightful powers of the Executive, as he should be prompt to resist the encroachments of the Executive upon the clear constitutional rights of the Senate. To do the one, or submit to the other, would be equally a breach of that high and sacred trust devolved upon us under the most impressive and solemn sanctions.

All questions of conflict of power between co-ordinate branches of the Government should be treated with the greatest caution and the utmost delicacy. Yet, to define the boundary distinctly and satisfactorily is, in every respect of it, highly desirable. In our political, as in the solar system, when every power is confined to its proper orbit, without tendency to infringe upon any other, order, and beauty, and harmony will be the certain result.

As the Senate can have no ambition to gratify, nor any conceivable motive, in usurping powers not assigned to it by the constitution, so it can never forget, for an instant, the respect and courtesy which are due to the Executive. Even the enemies of the President—personal enemies, he trusted, he had none; but the political enemies of the President—must always feel a pride in being enabled to regard him, while the First Magistrate, as the first gentleman in the country; and most anxiously desire that the whole of his official intercourse with his constitutional advisers shall be marked with “high and noble thought, situate in a heart of courtesy.” The spectacle could not but be gratifying to the pride of every American citizen. The Senate, feeling and appreciating, as he believed, the value of such an example, would, on all occasions, be studious to avoid any exhibition of temper or violation of courtesy.

Entertaining the sentiments to which he had adverted, he regarded it as of the first importance that the Senate should review its whole proceeding with the most calm and dispassionate deliberation; that, if error shall be found, it was honorable, as well as matter of duty, to retract it instantly and promptly. If, on the contrary, the review shall add strength to their first impressions, honorable men would perceive that there was no alternative but to maintain, with dignity and with firmness, the high constitutional rights of the Senate.

He moved to take up the message, and refer it to a select committee, &c.

Mr. M. having stated seven as the number of the committee, the Senate proceeded to ballot for the committee, when the following members were elected: Messrs. MAN-GUM, WHITE, FORSYTH, EWING, BIBB, SOUTHWARD, and RIVES.

Mr. FORSYTH then asked to be excused from serving on the committee.

Mr. GRUNDY objected.

Mr. FORSYTH reminded the Senate of the awkwardness of the position in which he stood. The gentleman from North Carolina had made a motion that the Senate solemnly re-examine their own decision. He did not wish to re-examine his. The majority of the Senate, who had voted for the resolution, might re-examine their proceeding, and determine for themselves. But he had voted against it, and his opinion was unchanged, and, as he believed, unchangeable. He had no desire to sit in judgment on the decisions of others.

Mr. BIBB expressed his hope that the Senator from Georgia would not be excused, and the question being taken, the Senate refused to excuse him.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Tipton yesterday, was then taken up.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for the following objects, viz:

1. An appropriation for constructing a ship channel to connect the waters of the river Raisin with La Plaisance bay, in the Territory of Michigan, under the direction of the War Department.

2. An appropriation for constructing a harbor at the mouth of the Saint Joseph's river on lake Michigan, in the Michigan Territory.

3. An appropriation to defray the expense of surveying the obstructions to the navigation of the St. Joseph's river and its tributaries, as far up as the said streams may be considered navigable.

4. An appropriation for constructing a harbor at the mouth of Trevil creek, on lake Michigan, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. TIPTON observed that he felt it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the subject of the resolution during the present session, and it was proper that he should now state the reasons which had induced him to adopt that course. During the last session a bill passed through all the forms of legislation, in both Houses of Congress, except that of receiving the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses, and the approval and signature of the President of the United States, making appropriations for the purpose of constructing a ship canal to connect La Plaisance bay with the waters of the river Raisin; for surveying the bar at the mouth of the St. Joseph's river, in the Michigan Territory, and for surveying that river; and also for surveying the harbor at the mouth of Trail creek, in the State of Indiana; but, by a mistake of the clerk, whose duty it was to copy bills and present them for signatures to the proper officers, that part of the bill which contained these items of appropriation was omitted, and therefore did not become a law. This was owing to the hurry and confusion produced by the great quantity of business which was thrown upon the hands of the Secretary and his clerks, as well as upon the President of the United States. It would be remembered that between ninety and a hundred bills were signed by the President of the United States on the last day of the late session: all those bills had been copied by the clerks; and he (Mr. T.) was not at all surprised that a few errors were committed. He was only surprised that there were not many more omissions. Indeed, he considered the manner in which the Secretary and his clerks had done their duty was worthy of all praise. When Congress adjourned, and the members returned to their constituents, who were interested with the improvements of the harbors and rivers connected with the lakes, they informed the people that appropriations were made for the objects mentioned, and would be available in due time; but when the laws were published, no such appropriations were found amongst them. This omission, however, was seized upon and urged by men from whom better might have been expected; and also used, with considerable effect, against a gentleman who was a candidate for a seat in another room in that Capitol.

No argument of mine, Mr. T. continued, can be necessary to convince honorable Senators of the propriety of this appropriation, when they reflect that the Government is the principal landholder on the lakes, and that every dollar expended in constructing harbors, improving rivers, or making roads through the public domains, will soon, very soon, be returned to the treasury with interest, arising from the increased sales of the public lands in the neighborhood where the proposed improvements are to be made. The appropriation asked for, continued Mr. T., is but small; and, as it has once met the favorable consideration of both branches of the National Legislature, I cannot entertain a doubt of its again passing without a dissenting voice.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEPOSITES.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY was then taken up, when Mr. BENTON moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

“Also, that the Secretary communicate to the Senate

SENATE.]

the monthly statements of the affairs of the Bank of the United States for the current year, which have not been heretofore communicated.

"Also, the entire correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the Bank of the United States for the first half of the year 1819."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY said that he felt it his duty to submit to the Senate some explanation of the motives which had induced him to ask it to adopt these resolutions. The Secretary, in his report concerning the public deposits, had labored very hard, through two or three of the first pages of it, to prove that he possessed the exclusive power to decide when they should be removed. This power, he contended, was not restricted to any particular contingencies, but "was absolute and unconditional, as far as the interests of the bank were involved." "It is not necessary," says that officer, "that the deposits should be unsafe in order to justify the removal. The authority to remove is not limited to such a contingency. The bank may be perfectly solvent, and prepared to meet promptly all demands upon it; it may have been faithful in the performance of all its duties, and yet the public interest may require the deposits to be withdrawn; and, as that cannot be done without the action of this department, the Secretary of the Treasury would betray the trust confided to him if he did not cause the deposits to be made elsewhere, whenever the change would advance the public interest or the public convenience. The safety of the deposits, the ability of the bank to meet its engagements, its fidelity in the performance of its obligations, are only a part of the considerations by which his judgment must be guided. The general interest and convenience of the people must regulate his conduct."

Here is the assumption of a power analogous to the old exploded doctrine of the general welfare, in a most odious form. According to that doctrine, it was claimed by certain federalists of 1798-99 that the constitution vested in Congress power to legislate on all subjects for the general welfare. But, according to the new version of the heresy, a Secretary of the Treasury, a subordinate officer of the Government, the creature of Congress, arrogates to himself a power to administer the duties of his office, and to regulate the currency of the country, in conformity with his sense of the general interest and convenience of the people! And, at the very moment of setting up this enormous pretension, he denies any such power to Congress!

But this is not all. This modern doctrine assumes for the Secretary not only a power equivalent to its ancient prototype, but it demands that it be respected as absolute and unconditional, and exclusive even of Congress. "For," to quote the language of the Secretary, "although Congress should be satisfied that the public money was not safe in the care of the bank, or should be convinced that the interests of the people of the United States imperiously demanded the removal, yet the passage of a law directing it to be done would be a breach of the agreement into which they have entered."

Is this possible? Can it be true that an official being, brought into existence by the will of Congress, having no authority and charged with no duties but such as that will has conferred, has more power than its creator? Can it be true that the agent may do what the principal cannot do? Can it be true that the Secretary, representing one of the parties to a contract, without a violation of a single stipulation of that contract by the other party, may, upon a general notion of public interest or convenience, violate, at his pleasure, the most essential stipulation of the whole contract for that other party? May he do that, whilst Congress is restrained from ordering a removal of the deposits, under any circumstances, even if the bank had failed to fulfil all the provisions of the charter, and the deposits were unsafe, and the interests of the people of the United States imperiously demanded their removal? May the Secretary remove them, without any breach of the charter on the part of the bank, whilst the hands of Congress are fast tied, although the bank had broken every stipulation of the charter?

The Secretary appears to have been conscious that this most extraordinary doctrine required all the bolstering which he could give it; and he has accordingly retreated behind a precedent which he alleges to have been furnished by Mr. Crawford, one of his predecessors. He says "this principle," [that is, the absolute, unconditional, and exclusive power of the Secretary over the deposits,] "was distinctly asserted by Mr. Crawford." "In a postscript to his letter to the President of the Mechanics' Bank of New York, dated Feb. 13, 1817, he says: The Secretary of the Treasury will always be disposed to support the credit of the State banks, and will invariably direct transfers from the deposits of the public money in aid of their legitimate exertions to maintain their credit."

The Secretary alludes to other passages in the correspondence of Mr. Crawford with the banks about the period of the 13th February, 1817.

Now, Mr. President, what must be your surprise, when I state that Mr. Crawford never, in the correspondence referred to, distinctly asserted any such principle as his successor attributes to him? never did claim for himself, on that occasion, any such extraordinary and exclusive power over the deposits; and that his correspondence was conducted under an authority totally different from that contained in the bank charter?

It will be recollected that, when the Bank of the United States was incorporated, a general suspension of specie payments prevailed throughout the United States, with the exception of New England. The taxes and duties were paid in depreciated paper, of which the million and a half (a sum equal to the bonus paid by the Bank of the United States) of unavailable funds, now annually reported by the treasury, is a part. To produce a restoration of a sound currency was the main object in establishing that bank. About that period a convention of representatives from the State banks was held, and some were, and others were not, willing to resume specie payments. It was feared by Congress that the bank alone might not prove competent to produce the desired effect. An auxiliary measure was deemed necessary; and that was adopted in the following resolution, which passed on the 30th April, 1816:

"Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

The letter of Mr. Crawford, the postscript of which the Secretary has communicated to Congress, bears date the 13th of February, 1817, only one week before the day fixed for the resumption of specie payments by the resolution to which he had called the attention of the Senate. That letter, beyond all doubt, was written under the authority contained in that resolution. What, then, must be thought of the official candor and honor of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has endeavored to palm upon Congress and the country the authority of Mr. Crawford for the enormous power which the Secretary assumes under the charter, when Mr. Crawford was acting under a resolution which, having produced its object, has long since expired?

The object of the first resolution, submitted by him (Mr. C.) yesterday, is to obtain an entire copy of the correspondence of Mr. Crawford. The second resolution carries its own explanation.

Mr. C. begged permission to trespass a few moments longer on the Senate, to make a statement concerning himself personally. He had heard that one high in office had allowed himself to assert that a dishonorable connexion had subsisted between him (Mr. C.) and the Bank of the United States. When the present charter was granted, he voted for it; and, having done so, he did not feel himself at liberty to subscribe, and he did not subscribe, for a single share in the stock of the bank, although he confidently anticipated a great rise in the value of the stock. A few years afterwards, during the presidency of Mr. Jones, it was thought, by some of his friends at Philadelphia, expedient to make him (Mr. C.) a director of the Bank of the United States; and he was made a director without any consultation with him. For that purpose five shares were purchased for him, by a friend, for which he (Mr. C.) afterwards paid. When he ceased to be a director, a short time subsequently, he disposed of those shares. He does not now own, and has not for many years been the proprietor of, a single share.

When Mr. Cheves was appointed president of the bank, its affairs in the States of Kentucky and Ohio were in great disorder; and his (Mr. C.'s) professional services were engaged during several years for the bank in those States. He brought a vast number of suits, and transacted a great amount of professional business for the bank. Among other suits was that for the recovery of the one hundred thousand dollars, seized under the authority of a law of Ohio, which he carried through the inferior and supreme courts. He was paid by the bank the usual compensation for these services, and no more. And he ventured to assert that no professional fees were ever more honestly and fairly earned. He had not, however, been the counsel for the bank for upwards of eight years past. He does not owe the bank, or any one of its branches, a solitary cent. About twelve or fifteen years ago, owing to the failure of a highly estimable (now deceased) friend, a large amount of debt had been, as his endorser, thrown upon him, (Mr. C.) and it was principally due to the Bank of the United States. He (Mr. C.) established for himself a rigid economy, a sinking fund, and worked hard, and paid off the debt long since, without receiving from the bank the slightest favor. Whilst others around him were discharging their debts in property, at high valuations, he periodically renewed his note, paying the discount, until it was wholly extinguished.

Such was a true account of his connexion with that institution, and he defied its disproof in any particular.

He hoped that the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. FORSYTH reminded the Senator from Kentucky that the letter of February, 1817, which was called for by his resolution, was already among the public documents of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY stated his desire to have the whole of the correspondence at one view.

Mr. FORSYTH then briefly defended the Secretary of the Treasury from what he conceived a premature sentence pronounced upon him by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY explained what he had said.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 23.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENTS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. WEBSTER on Thursday, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law for preventing, as far as may be, accidents to vessels employed on the foreign or coastwise commerce of the United States, from explosion by steam.

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate. It was, he believed, the general expectation of the country that Congress would take up the subject to which this resolution referred. The history of the last two or three years, said Mr. W., exhibits a vast amount of property, and a startling list of human lives, lost by the explosion of the boilers and flues of steamboats. These frequent occurrences have occasioned the existence of so much fear and terror, as to be a serious diminution of the convenience and comfort of that mode of conveyance. At present the whole subject is without any regulation whatever, by public authority; and no authority but that of Congress seems competent to establish proper regulations. Of the power of Congress there can be no doubt. Steamboats are, generally, licensed vessels, and they engage extensively in the coastwise commerce of the country. They may be registered vessels also, and may engage in its foreign commerce. On the same ground that laws of Congress regulate the number of passengers in merchant vessels, and make it necessary that such vessels should have medicine chests for the preservation of the lives and health of persons on board, with divers other provisions for the same or similar objects, it is plainly in the power of Congress to adopt any regulations for the government of steam vessels, which security to life and property may appear to require. It is with Congress to make these regulations, or they cannot be effectually made at all.

It is the general opinion, I believe, not only of practical engineers, but of the public also, that nearly all these accidents have arisen from negligence, and some of them from a very highly criminal degree of negligence. Indeed, it may be well doubted whether a still more positive criminal offence has not, in some instances, occasioned the disaster. Steamboat racing, for example, a practice by which the lives of hundreds of persons are put into imminent danger, without the slightest knowledge, on their part, of the existence of any such cause of danger, is such a wanton, intentional, and reckless exposure of human life, as that it may well be regarded as a higher offence than even extreme negligence. But negligence itself is criminal, highly criminal, where such effects to life and property follow from it. Those who carry passengers for hire, by means of such a mighty agent as steam—an agent so useful and powerful when kept under proper management, and so destructive when it is allowed to overcome its just restraints—are bound in duty, and should be bound by law, to apply to their business the strictest attention, and the utmost degree of diligence.

I am not prepared to say, definitely, what legal provisions it may be proper to adopt. It will be the business of the committee to consider and arrange such provisions. They will have the benefit of the legislation of other countries on the same subject, and may readily command the assistance of whatever skill and experience our own country affords, in aid of their labors.

Some general ideas upon the proper remedy, however, have occurred to me, which I will suggest for consideration.

The law, as it seems to me, might be of a two-fold character. It might prescribe certain regulations, the violation of which, whether accidents happened in consequence or not, should incur a penalty; and it might further provide, that, in case of accident, although all prescribed regulations should have been previously complied with, yet, if the accident happened from culpable negligence at the moment, that negligence should be severely punished. As to previous and prescribed regulations, the first and most important, doubtless, should be, that every boiler, intended for a steamboat, should be tried and proved by some public authority, and restrained, in its future use, to one-third, or at most one-half, the degree of pressure or tension which it should have been proved to be capable of bearing. A safety valve, out of the reach of the firemen, a proper apparatus to show at all times the level of the water, and also the intensity or height of the steam, and this apparatus so arranged as that its indications may be seen from without, are among the preventive remedies to which the attention of the committee will probably be called.

Steamboat Accidents.

But I look with more confidence of beneficial results from certain other provisions, which I trust will receive the consideration of the committee. Fully believing that these accidents generally result from negligence, at the time, by those who have the charge of the engine, penalties, I think, ought to be enacted against such negligence, and legal means provided, by which, when lives are lost by such occurrences, an immediate inquisition, investigation, and trial, should be secured, and the culpable negligence, if there be such, adequately punished. And, in the first place, I think the boat itself should be made subject to forfeiture, whenever lives were lost through the negligence of those conducting it. There is nothing unreasonable in this; analogous provisions exist in other cases. The master of a merchant ship, for instance, may forfeit the ship by a violation of law, however innocent the owners may be, even though that law be only a common regulation of trade and customs. There is at least quite as much reason for saying that whoever builds or buys a steamboat, and proposes to carry passengers therein for hire, shall be answerable to the amount of the value of the boat, for the sobriety, diligence, and attention of those whom he appoints his agents to navigate it, as there is, in revenue cases, to impose such liability for smuggling, or illegal landing of goods. To enforce this liability, I should propose, that whenever an explosion takes place, causing the loss of the lives of passengers, the boat should be immediately seized by the collector of the district, and the persons navigating her detained for examination; a trial should be had, and, unless it should appear, on such trial, that all legal requirements had been previously complied with, and were observed at the time, and, further, that the accident was one which no degree of attention could have foreseen or prevented, the boat should be forfeited, and the persons having charge at the time should be punished. It is no unreasonable hardship, in such cases, to throw the burden of proof on those who are intrusted with the navigation and management of the boat. They should be able to make out a clear case of actual attention, skill, and vigilance, or else forfeiture ought to follow. It is a very high trust to have charge of that which is so potent to destroy life, and which, when negligently treated, is so likely to destroy it. Of course, all unnecessary delay, expense, or trouble, should be avoided. The property seized might be restored, on bonds, as in other cases of seizure, pending preparation and trial; and every indulgence allowed, in the forms and modes of proceeding, compatible with the great end of an immediate investigation and a prompt decision.

It is evident that, for many reasons, a judicial investigation will seldom be had, in these cases, unless it be instituted by public authority; and I do not think any provisions will be adequate which do not secure such investigation, whenever the loss of life happens.

As to steamboat racing, it is an enormity that demands no tolerance. Doubtless, the committee will see the propriety of providing that all such racing, on any wager, or for any stakes, whether it be between boat and boat, both or either having passengers on board, or whether the wager be on any boat, with passengers on board, running against time, shall be punished, with forfeiture of the boat, and severe personal penalties on those concerned, whether any accident happen from such racing or not.

This, sir, is a rough sketch of those enactments which, I think, may deserve the consideration of the committee. Others, and perhaps better than these, will doubtless occur to the members of the committee. I have the fullest confidence that it is in the power of Congress to put an end, in a very great degree, to these disastrous occurrences. I believe that a wise and efficient law, such as may be easily framed and put in practice, would prevent three-fourths of them. At any rate, I trust we shall meet the public expectation, and try the experiment.

There are, sir, one or two other subjects belonging to the safe navigation of steamboats, though not immediately connected with the explosion of steam, which the committee will probably think worthy of attention. The first is, the collision of these vessels. It has happened more than once that steamboats have run foul of each other, not by means of darkness, or fog, but simply because the one did not know on which side the other meant to pass. Something like a law of the road, by which each should know on which hand to keep her course, with the obligation of being well lighted at night, would probably prevent some of these occurrences.

The other subject is the carrying gunpowder, in large quantities, in boats having passengers. As there are boats used exclusively for freight, there can hardly be a necessity of transporting gunpowder in passenger boats. This transportation in such boats augments the danger, and, when known, still more augments the terror of the passengers. And it is probably in consequence of this, and because some captains on that account are not willing to receive gunpowder on board, that the article is sometimes shipped in disguise, the boxes being marked as containing other goods. This highly objectionable and criminal practice ought to be severely punished.

Mr. BENTON then rose, and said that he entirely agreed in the justice of the views which had been thrown out by the Senator from Massachusetts. He was fully aware of the injury which had resulted to the community from the accidents which had occurred in the steamboat navigation, estimating (if he was heard correctly) the number of persons injured by these accidents at four or five thousand. He stated that he was in New Orleans at the time of the explosion of the steamboat on the Red river, which had caused the loss of an honorable member of that body, and he had been assured that there was a quantity of gunpowder among the cargo on board. It had been stated to him, as a practice, that powder was frequently taken on board these boats, put up and marked as coffee; and he adverted to an instance in which some hogheads, which had been shipped under a different designation, had been discovered, at the end of the voyage, to contain kegs of gunpowder. But there was another class of offences perpetrated on board the steamboats on the Western waters, to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate, namely, the assaults, batteries, and homicides, which had become of such frequent occurrence. Crimes of this character were committed; the boat passed rapidly on from the point; a man perhaps was killed, and nothing more was heard of it.

He had not risen to throw any obstruction in the way of this resolution, or against a reference of it to some committee, because the resolution had his most hearty concurrence. But he had thought that, instead of the Committee on Naval Affairs, it ought to be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. The question would necessarily involve points connected with the jurisdiction of the States themselves over the public waters within their limits. That was a subject which he thought would be more properly examined by the Judiciary Committee than by any other. These Western waters were to be found in the back creeks running up to the heads of streams, and through farms and plantations, and were, therefore, properly to be regarded as private waters.

He had another word to add. Notwithstanding all which had been said on the subject of the calamities in the Western steamboats, he was very well assured, from an experience of twelve years, during which he had been in the regular practice of travelling on all these waters, that the captains of the Western steamboats were men of high professional character and of great skill. There were doubtless exceptions to this general character, but he had thought it right to make this statement in favor of that highly respectable body of individuals. During twelve years that he had travelled these waters, he had witnessed no accident; a result which he did not attribute to chance, but to the character of the captains, as it had been his practice never to trust himself on board one of these boats, of which the captain was not either well known to him, or whose reputation for skill and discretion was not established.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that the regulations proposed by him would apply to all boats navigating on the coast and in the rivers of the United States, carrying persons and goods, being licensed in the usual manner. He contemplated no interference with State authority; but simply to provide that, while navigating on the waters of the United States, and while engaged in any part of the commerce of the United States, all steamboats should be subject to regulations by Congress.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "naval affairs," and inserting "the judiciary."

The amendment was negatived, and the original resolution was then agreed to.

THE FORCE BILL.

The CHAIR then called the special order, viz: The bill to repeal the "act to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports."

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and moved to postpone the consideration of the bill until Monday, the 6th of January, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. FORSYTH said he understood that it was the intention of the Senator from South Carolina to press this bill through the Senate without going through a committee. In that case, it was his wish that the Senator from South Carolina would lay before the Senate a copy of the ordinance of the State of South Carolina relating to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that he had not the document.

The motion to postpone was then agreed to.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having called the second special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the public deposits,

Mr. CLAY rose, and expressed his regret that he was under the necessity of asking a postponement of a subject on which the unexampled pressure upon the pecuniary interests of the country rendered prompt action and early decision so important. He had made a call last week for some papers, which he considered to be indispensable; and he had hoped that the information asked for then, and under a previous call, would have been furnished before to-day, especially as the documents had been commented on by the Secretary of the Treasury, and must, therefore, be in his possession. The information, however, had not yet reached the Senate, although the road from the department to the Capitol had been so much improved. Regarding the correspondence of Mr.

Crawford as necessary to a full elucidation of the subject, he was compelled to make a further postponement.

Mr. FORSYTH said he thought the Senator from Kentucky would find all he required in the printed documents, and adverted to the great space covered by the call as an excuse for the delay in furnishing the information.

Mr. CLAY stated that he had looked through a great deal of the correspondence which was printed, without finding any passages to bear out the constructions of the Secretary. On the contrary, he had found much bearing a totally opposite construction; and he thought it but fair that the Secretary should have an opportunity to communicate the letters to which he had referred. He wished to proceed to-morrow, or Christmas day, if the information should be furnished; but as the Senate would not sit on Christmas day, he would fix on the day after Christmas.

The order to postpone until Thursday was then agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 24.

Mr. KENT, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following joint resolution; which was read a first time, ordered to a second reading, and directed to be printed:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the constitution:

When a bill, which having passed the Senate and House of Representatives, shall be returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, and, upon the reconsideration thereof, a majority of all the members elected to each House shall again pass such bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President, it shall become a law; and the requisition of two-thirds in such case, according to the existing constitution, is revoked.

A joint resolution was received from the House of Representatives to adjourn until Monday.

Mr. KANE moved to concur in this resolution.

Mr. CLAY opposed the motion, urging, as a reason, the distressed condition of the country, and the necessity of prompt legislation, in order to relieve the public distresses.

The question was then taken on the motion to concur, and decided in the negative. Yeas 17, nays 18.

After disposing of a number of petitions, &c.,

Adjourned to Thursday.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having announced the special order of the day, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States,

Mr. CLAY rose, and offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That, by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion; and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

2. Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the

Removal of the Deposites.

[DEC. 26, 1833.]

United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate as follows: We are, said he, in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless, but rapidly tending towards a total change of the pure republican character of the Government, and to the concentration of all power in the hands of one man. The powers of Congress are paralyzed, except when exerted in conformity with his will, by frequent and an extraordinary exercise of the executive veto, not anticipated by the founders of the constitution, and not practised by any of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate. And, to cramp them still more, a new expedient is springing into use, of withholding altogether bills which have received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, thereby cutting off all opportunity of passing them, even if, after their return, the members should be unanimous in their favor. The constitutional participation of the Senate in the appointing power is virtually abolished, by the constant use of the power of removal from office without any known cause, and by the appointment of the same individual to the same office, after his rejection by the Senate. How often have we, Senators, felt that the check of the Senate, instead of being, as the constitution intended, a salutary control, was an idle ceremony? How often, when acting on the case of the nominated successor, have we felt the injustice of the removal? How often have we said to each other, well, what can we do? the office cannot remain vacant without prejudice to the public interests; and, if we reject the proposed substitute, we cannot restore the displaced, and perhaps some more unworthy man may be nominated?

The Judiciary has not been exempted from the prevailing rage for innovation. Decisions of the tribunals, deliberately pronounced, have been contemptuously disregarded, and the sanctity of numerous treaties openly violated. Our Indian relations, coeval with the existence of the Government, and recognised and established by numerous laws and treaties, have been subverted; the rights of the helpless and unfortunate aborigines trampled in the dust, and they brought under subjection to unknown laws, in which they have no voice, promulgated in an unknown language. The most extensive and most valuable public domain that ever fell to the lot of one nation is threatened with a total sacrifice. The general currency of the country, the life-blood of all its business, is in the most imminent danger of universal disorder and confusion. The power of internal improvement lies crushed beneath the veto. The system of protection of American industry was snatched from impending destruction at the last session; but we are now coolly told by the Secretary of the Treasury, without a blush, "that it is understood to be conceded on all hands that a tariff for protection merely is to be finally abandoned." By the 3d of March, 1837, if the progress of innovation continue, there will be scarcely a vestige remaining of the Government and its policy, as they existed prior to the 3d of March, 1829. In a term of years, a little more than equal to that which was required to establish our liberties, the Government will have been transformed into an elective monarchy—the worst of all forms of government.

Such is a melancholy but faithful picture of the present condition of our public affairs. It is not sketched or exhibited to excite, here or elsewhere, irritated feeling: I have no such purpose. I would, on the contrary, implore the Senate and the people to discard all passion and prejudice, and to look calmly but resolutely upon the actual state of the constitution and the country. Although I bring into the Senate the same unabated spirit, and the same firm determination, which have ever guided me in the support of civil liberty, and the defence of our constitution, I contemplate the prospect before us with feelings of deep humiliation and profound mortification.

It is not among the least unfortunate symptoms of the times, that a large proportion of the good and enlightened men of the Union, of all parties, are yielding to sentiments of despondency. There is, unhappily, a feeling of distrust and insecurity pervading the community. Many of our best citizens entertain serious apprehensions that our Union and our institutions are destined to a speedy overthrow. Sir, I trust that the hopes and confidence of the country will revive. There is much occasion for manly independence and patriotic vigor, but none for despair. Thank God, we are yet free; and, if we put on the chains which are forging for us, it will be because we deserve to wear them. We should never despair of the republic. If our ancestors had been capable of surrendering themselves to such ignoble sentiments, our independence and our liberties would never have been achieved. The winter of 1776-'7, was one of the gloomiest periods of our revolution; but on this day, fifty-seven years ago, the father of his country achieved a glorious victory, which diffused joy, and gladness, and animation throughout the States. Let us cherish the hope that, since he has gone from among us, Providence, in the dispensation of his mercies, has near at hand, in reserve for us, though yet unseen by us, some sure and happy deliverance from all impending dangers.

When we assembled here last year, we were full of dreadful forebodings. On the one hand, we were menaced with a civil war, which, lighting up in a single State, might spread its flames throughout one of the largest sections of the Union. On the other, a cherished system of policy, essential to the successful prosecution of the industry of our countrymen, was exposed to imminent danger of destruction. Means were happily applied by Congress to avert both calamities, the country was reconciled, and our Union once more became a band of friends and brothers. And I shall be greatly disappointed, if we do not find those who were denounced as being unfriendly to the continuance of our confederacy, among the foremost to fly to its preservation, and to resist all executive encroachments.

Mr. President, when Congress adjourned at the termination of the last session, there was one remnant of its powers—that over the purse—left untouched. The two most important powers of civil government are those of the sword and purse; the first, with some restrictions, is confided by the constitution to the executive, and the last to the legislative department. If they are separate, and exercised by different responsible departments, civil liberty is safe; but if they are united in the hands of the same individual, it is gone. That clear-sighted and revolutionary orator and patriot Patrick Henry justly said, in the Virginia convention, in reply to one of his opponents, "Let him candidly tell me where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs interposed, no nation ever retained its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse. Can you prove, by any argumentative deduction, that it is possible to be safe without one of them? If you give them up, you are gone."

Up to the period of the termination of the last session of Congress, the exclusive constitutional power of Congress over the treasury of the United States had never been contested. Among its earliest acts was one to establish the Treasury Department, which provided for the appointment of a Treasurer, who was required to give bond and security, in a very large amount, "to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, recorded by the Register, and not otherwise." Prior to the establishment of the present Bank of the United States, no treasury or place had been provided or designated by law for the safe keeping of the public moneys, but the Treasurer was left to his own discretion and responsibility. When the existing bank was established, it was provided that the public moneys should be deposited with it, and consequently that bank became the treasury of the United States; for, whatever place is designated by law for the keeping of the public money of the United States, under the care of the Treasurer of the United States, is, for the time being, the treasury. Its safety was drawn in question by the Chief Magistrate, and an agent was appointed a little more than a year ago to investigate its ability. He reported to the Executive that it was perfectly safe. His apprehensions of its solidity were communicated by the President to Congress, and a committee was appointed to examine the subject: they, also, reported in favor of its security. And, finally, among the last acts of the House of Representatives, prior to the close of the last session, was the adoption of a resolution, manifesting its entire confidence in the ability and solidity of the bank.

After all these testimonies to the perfect safety of the public moneys in the place appointed by Congress, who could have supposed that the place would have been changed? Who could have imagined that, within sixty days of the meeting of Congress, and, as it were, in utter contempt of its authority, the change should have been ordered? Who would have dreamed that the Treasurer should have thrown away the single key to the treasury, over which Congress held ample control, and accepted, in lieu of it, some dozens of keys, over which neither Congress nor he has any adequate control? Yet, sir, all this has been done; and it is now our solemn duty to inquire, 1st, by whose authority it has been ordered; and 2d, whether the order has been given in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States.

I agree, sir, and I am very happy whenever I can agree with the President, as to the immense importance of these questions. He says, in the paper which I hold in my hand, that he looks upon the pending question as involving higher considerations than the "mere transfer of a sum of money from one bank to another. Its decision may affect the character of our Government for ages to come." And, with him, I view it as "of transcendent importance, both in the principles and the consequences it involves." It is a question of all time, for posterity as well as for us—of constitutional government or monarchy—of liberty or slavery. As I regard it, I hold the bank as nothing, as perfectly insignificant, faithful as it has been in the performance of all its duties. I hold a sound currency as nothing, essential as it is to the prosperity of every branch of business, and to all conditions of society, and efficient as the agency of the bank has been in providing the country with a currency as sound as ever existed, and unsurpassed by any in christendom. I consider even the public faith, sacred and inviolable as it ever should be, as comparatively nothing. All these questions are merged in the greater and mightier question of the constitutional distribution of the powers of the Government, as affected by the recent executive innovation. The real inquiry is, shall all the barriers which have been erected by the caution and wisdom of our ancestors, for the preservation of civil liberty, be prostrated and trodden under foot, and the sword and the purse be at once united in the hands of one man? Shall the power of Congress over the treasury of the United States, hitherto never contested, be wrested from its possession, and be henceforward wielded by the Chief Magistrate? Entertaining these views of the magnitude of the question before us, I shall not, at least to-day, examine the reasons which the President has assigned for his act. If he has no power to perform it, no reasons, however cogent, can justify the deed. None can sanctify an illegal or unconstitutional act.

The first question which I have intimated it to be my purpose to consider is, by whose authority, power, or direction, was the change of the depositories made? Now, is there any Senator who hears me that requires proof on this point? Is there an intelligent man in the Union who does not know who it was that decided the removal of the depositories? Is it not a matter of universal notoriety? Does any one, and who, doubt that it was the act of the President?—that it was done by his express command? The President, on this subject, has himself furnished perfectly conclusive evidence, in the paper read by him to his cabinet. It is, indeed, a most extraordinary document, without precedent in the executive annals of this or any other civilized country. If the proceeding were not unconstitutional, it was certainly such as was not contemplated by the constitution. That instrument confers on the President the right to require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officers of the executive departments, separately, on subjects appertaining to their respective offices. Instead of conforming to this provision, the President reads to those officers, collectively, his opinion and decision, in writing, upon an important matter which related only to one of them, and to him exclusively. This paper is afterwards formally promulgated to the world, with the President's authority. And why? Can it be doubted that it was done under the vain expectation that a name would quash all inquiry, and secure the general approbation of the people? Those who now exercise power in this country appear to regard all the practices and usages of their predecessors as wrong. They look upon all precedents with contempt, and, casting them scornfully aside, appear to be resolved upon a new era in administration. Yet, when hard pressed, they display a readiness to take shelter under any precedent, however ill adapted it may be to their condition. Although the President has denied to the Senate an official copy of that singular paper, as a part of the people of the United States, for whose special benefit it was published, we have a right to use it.

The question is, by virtue of whose will, power, dictation, was the removal of the depositories effected? By whose authority and determination were they transferred from the Bank of the United States, where they were required by the law to be placed, and put in banks which the law had never designated? And I tell gentlemen opposed to me that I am not to be answered by the exhibition of a formal order bearing the signature of R. B. Taney, or any one else. I want to know, not the amanuensis or clerk who prepared or signed the official form, but the authority or the individual who dictated or commanded it; not the hangman who executes the culprit, but the tribunal which pronounced the sentence. I want to know that power in the Government, that original and controlling authority, which required and commanded the removal of the depositories. And, I repeat the question, is there a Senator, or intelligent man in the whole country, who entertains a solitary doubt?

Hear what the President himself says in his manifesto read to his cabinet: "The President deems it his duty to communicate in this manner to his cabinet the final conclusions of his own mind, and the reasons on which they are founded." And, at the conclusion of this paper, what does he say? "The President again repeats that he begs his cabinet to consider the proposed measure as his own, in the support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsibility has been assumed, after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and the purity of the elective franchise, without which all will unite in saying that the blood and treasure expended by our forefathers, in the establishment of our happy system of government, will have been vain and fruitless. Under these convictions, he feels that a measure so important to the American people cannot be commenced too soon; and he therefore names the 1st day of October next as a period proper for the change of the depositories, or sooner, provided the necessary arrangements with the State banks can be made." Sir, is there a Senator here who will now tell me that the removal was not the measure and the act of the President? I know, indeed, that there are in this document many of those most mild, most gracious, most condescending expressions, in which power so well knows how to clothe its mandates. The President flatters, and coaxes, and soothes Secretary Duane, in the most gentle, bland, and conciliating language. "In the remarks," says the President, "he has made on this all-important question, he trusts the Secretary of the Treasury will see only the frank and respectful declaration of the opinions which the President has formed on a measure of great national interest, deeply affecting the character and usefulness of his administration; and not a spirit of dictation, which the President would be as careful to avoid as ready to resist. Happy will he be if the facts now disclosed produce uniformity of opinion and unity of action among the members of the administration." How kind! how gentle! and how very gracious all these civil and loving expressions must have sounded in the gratified ear of Mr. Duane! They remind me of an historical anecdote related of one of the most remarkable characters which our species has produced. When Oliver Cromwell was contending for the mastery in Great Britain or Ireland, (I do not remember which,) he besieged a certain Catholic town. The place made a brave and stout resistance; but, at length, being likely to be taken, the poor Catholics proposed terms of capitulation, among which was one stipulating for the toleration of their religion. The paper containing the conditions being presented to Oliver, he put on his spectacles, and, after deliberately examining them, cried out, "Oh, yes, granted, granted, certainly;" but he added, with stern determination, "if one of them shall dare to be found attending mass, he shall be instantly hanged," (under what section—whether the second or some other, I believe the historian does not relate.)

Thus the Secretary was told by the President that he had not the slightest wish to dictate—Oh! no; nothing was further from his intention; that he would carefully avoid; the President desired only to convince his judgment, but not at all to interfere with his free exercise of an authority exclusively confided to him. But what was the refractory Duane told in the sequel? If you do not conform to my wishes; if you do not surrender your own judgment, and act upon mine; if you do not effect the removal of these depositories within the short period prescribed by me, you shall quit your office. And what was the fact? This cabinet paper bears date the 18th September last. In the official paper, published at the seat of Government, through which the Executive promulgates its acts, intentions, and wishes to the people of the United States, on the 20th of the same month, two days only after the cabinet had been indoctrinated, it was stated, "We are authorized to state"—"authorized!"—this is the term which gave credit to the annunciation—"We are authorized to state, that the depositories of the public money will be changed from the Bank of the United States to the State banks, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made for that purpose, and it is believed they can be completed in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, in time to make the change by the 1st of October, and perhaps sooner, if circumstances should render an earlier action necessary on the part of the Government." We see, between the cabinet paper and this official article, not merely a coincidence of time, but of language, as if the same head had dictated, and the same pen had written both. The President names the 1st day of October, or sooner if the necessary arrangements can be made; and the gazette announces the same 1st day of October, and perhaps sooner, if circumstances should render it necessary. Mr. Duane remained in office until the 23d of September, on which day he was dismissed. Is this not conclusive testimony that the measure was the President's; that he, not the Secretary of the Treasury, decided upon it; that it was resolved on whilst Mr. Duane was yet in office; and that it was formally announced to the world before his dismissal? As to the day of his dismissal, we have incontestable evidence in the letter addressed to him on the 23d of September by the President, in which, notwithstanding all the amicable, gracious, and affectionate language of the cabinet paper, the President says, "I feel constrained to notify you that your further services as Secretary of the Treasury are no longer required." On that same day, (the 23d,) Mr. Taney was appointed; and on the 26th, in conformity with the will of the President, he performed the clerical act of affixing his signature to the order for the removal of the depositories, and thus made himself a willing instrument to consummate what the sterner integrity of his predecessor disdained to execute. Such is the testimony, on one side, to sustain the proposition that the removal of the depositories was the President's own measure, determined on whilst the late Secretary was still in office, and against his will; and establishing, beyond contradiction, that the subsequent act of the present Secretary was in form ministerial, in substance the work of another. Can more satisfactory testimony be ever needed? Yet it is even still more complete. We have that of Mr. Duane, as if no single link in the chain should be left unsupplied. In a late publication from that gentleman, addressed to the American people, after giving a history of the circumstances which preceded and accompanied his appointment, and those which attended his expulsion from office, he says: "Thus was I thrust from office—not because I had neglected any duty; not because I had differed with the President on any other point of public policy; not because I had differed with him about the Bank of the United States; but because I refused, without further inquiry for action by Congress, to remove the depositories."

Is it possible that evidence can be more complete? Will any one, after this exhibition of concurring proof, derived directly from the President on one side, and from the late Secretary on the other, that the removal of the depositories was not only the President's own act, but was contrary to the will and judgment of the Secretary, who was himself removed because he would not remove them, for a single instant doubt on the subject? Can any one rise here, in his place, and assert that the removal was not accomplished by the President's authority or command?

And now, sir, having distinctly seen whose measure this is, I shall proceed to inquire whether it has been adopted in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States. I repeat that it is not my purpose now to examine the reasons assigned for the act, further than as they may tend to show a right in the President to perform it. For if the President had no power over the subject; if the constitution and laws, instead of conveying to him an authority to act as he has done, required him to keep his hands off the public treasury, and confided its care and custody to other hands, no reasons can justify the usurpation. What power has the President over the public treasury? Is it in the bank charter? That gives him but two clearly defined powers: one to appoint, with the concurrence of the Senate, and to remove the Government directors; and the other, to order a scire facias when the charter shall be violated by the bank. There is no other power conferred on him by it. The clause of the charter relating to the public depositories declares, "that the depositories of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction." Can language, as to the officer who is charged with the duty of removing the depositories, be more explicit? The Secretary of the Treasury alone is designated. The President is not, by the remotest allusion, referred to. And, to put the matter beyond all controversy, whenever the Secretary gives an order or direction for the removal, he is to report his reasons—to whom? To the President? No! directly to Congress. Nor is the bank itself required to report its periodical condition to the President, but to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to Congress, through the organ of a committee. The whole scheme of the charter seems to have been cautiously framed with the deliberate purpose of excluding all intervention of the President, except in the two cases which have been specified. And this power, given exclusively to the Secretary, and these relations maintained between him and Congress, are in strict conformity with the act of September, 1789, creating and establishing the Treasury Department. Congress reserved to itself the control over that department. It refused to make it an executive department. Its whole structure manifests cautious jealousy and experienced wisdom. The constitution had ordained that no money should be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. It remained for Congress to provide how it should be drawn. And that duty is performed by the act constituting the Treasury Department. According to that act, the Secretary of the Treasury is to prepare and sign, the Comptroller to countersign, the Register to record, and, finally, the Treasurer to pay a warrant issued, and only issued, in virtue of a prior act of appropriation. Each is referred to the law as the guide of his duty; each acts on his own separate responsibility; each is a check upon every other; and all are placed under the control of Congress. The Secretary is to report to Congress, and to each branch of Congress. The great principle of division of duty, and of control and responsibility—that principle which lies at the bottom of all free government—that principle, without which there can be no free government—is upheld throughout. So, in the bank charter, Congress did not choose to refer the reasons of the Secretary to the President; but, whenever he changed the depositories, the Secretary was commanded to report his reasons directly to Congress, that they might weigh, judge, and pronounce upon their validity.

Thus is it evident that the President, neither by the act creating the Treasury Department, nor by the bank charter, has any power over the public treasury. Has he any by the constitution? None, none. We have already seen that the constitution positively forbids any money from being drawn from the treasury but in virtue of a previous act of appropriation. But the President himself says that "upon him has been devolved, by the constitution, and the suffrages of the American people, the duty of superintending the operation of the executive departments of the Government, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed." If there existed any such double source of executive power, it has been seen that the Treasury Department is not an executive department; but that, in all that concerns the public treasury, the Secretary is the agent or representative of Congress, acting in obedience to their will, and maintaining a direct intercourse with them. By what authority does the President derive power from the mere result of an election? In another part of this same cabinet paper he refers to the suffrages of the people as a source of power independent of the constitution, if not overruling it. At all events, he seems to regard the issue of the election as an approbation of all constitutional opinions previously expressed by him, no matter in what ambiguous language. I differ, sir, entirely from the President. No such conclusions can be legitimately drawn from his re-election. He was re-elected from his presumed merits generally, and from the attachment and confidence of the people, and also from the unworthiness of his competitor. The people had no idea, by that exercise of their suffrage, of expressing their approbation of all the opinions which the President held. Can it be believed that Pennsylvania, so justly denominated the keystone of our federal arch, which has been so steadfast in her adherence to certain great national interests, and, among others, to that of the Bank of the United States, intended, by supporting the re-election of the President, to reverse all her own judgments, and to demolish all that she had built up? The truth is, that the re-election of the President no more proves that the people had sanctioned all the opinions previously expressed by him, than, if he had had the king's evil or a carbuncle, it would demonstrate that they intended to sanction his physical infirmity.

But the President infers his duty to remove the depositories from the constitution and the suffrages of the American people. As to the latter source of authority, I think it confers none. The election of a President, in itself, gives no power, but merely designates the person who, as an officer of the Government, is to exercise power granted by the constitution and laws. In this sense, and in this sense only, does an election confer power. The President alleges a right in himself to superintend the operations of the executive departments from the constitution and the suffrages of the people. Now, neither grants any such right. The constitution gives him the power, and no other power, than to call upon the heads of each of the executive departments to give his opinion, in writing, as to any matter connected with his department. The issue of the election simply puts him in a condition to exercise that right. By the laws, not by the constitution, all the departments, with the exception of that of the treasury, are placed under the direction of the President. And, by various laws, specific duties of the Secretary of the Treasury (such as contracting for loans, &c.) are required to be performed under the direction of the President. This is done from greater precaution; but his power, in these respects, is derived from the laws, and not from the constitution. Even in regard to those departments other than that of the treasury, in relation to which by law, and not by the constitution, a control is assigned to the Chief Magistrate, duties may be required of them, by the law, beyond his control, and for the performance of which their heads are responsible. This is true of the State Department, that which, above all others, is most under the immediate direction of the President. And this principle, more than thirty years ago, was established in the case of Marbury against Madison. The Supreme Court, in that case, expressed itself in the following language:

"By the constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority, and in conformity with his orders.

"In such cases their acts are his acts; and, whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the nation, not individual rights; and, being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the act of Congress for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that act, is to conform precisely to the will of the President. He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts.

"But when the Legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties, when he is directed peremptorily to perform certain acts, [that is, when he is not placed under the direction of the President,] when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts, he is so far the officer of the law, is amenable to the laws for his conduct, and cannot, at his discretion, sport away the vested rights of others.

"The conclusion from this reasoning is, that where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the Executive, merely to execute the will of the President, or rather to act in cases in which the Executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that their acts are only politically examinable. But where a specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured has a right to resort to the laws of his country for a remedy."

Although I am constrained to believe that the President has been mistaken in asserting that the duty has been devolved upon him by the constitution and by the suffrages of the American people to superintend the operation of the executive departments, and consequently to order the removal of the public depositories, if he deemed such removal was expedient, he is charged by the constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." And the question is, what does this injunction really import? It has been contended, under it, that the executive aid or co-operation ought not, in any case, to be given, but when the Chief Magistrate himself is persuaded that it is to be lent to the execution of a law of the United States; and that, in all instances where he believes that the law is otherwise than it has been settled or adjudicated, he may withhold the means of execution with which he is invested. In other words, this enormous pretension of the Executive claims that if a treaty or law exists, contrary to the constitution, in the President's opinion; or if a judicial opinion be pronounced, in his opinion repugnant to the constitution, to a treaty, or to a law, he is not bound to afford the executive aid in the execution of any such treaty, law, or decision. If this be sound doctrine, it is evident that every thing resolves itself into the President's opinion. There is an end to all constitutional government, and a sole functionary engrosses the whole power supposed hitherto to have been assigned to various responsible officers, checking and checked by each other. Can this be true? Is it possible that there is any one so insensible to the guaranties of civil liberty as to subscribe to this monstrous pretension? In respect even to affairs of ordinary administration, how enormous would it be! Various officers of Government are charged with the liquidation of most important accounts of contractors and others concerned in the disbursement, annually, of large sums of the public revenue. The rejection or allowance of a single item of these accounts may fix the fate of the contractor or disbursing agent. Hitherto this matter was supposed to be judicial in its nature, and beyond executive control; but let this new heresy be sanctioned, and the President may say to an Auditor or Comptroller, pass this, or reject that item in the account, (such is my opinion of the law;) and if you do not, I will remove you from office. Let this doctrine be once established, and there is an end to all regulated government, to all civil liberty. It will become a machine, simple enough. There will be but one will in the State; but one bed, and that will be the bed of Procrustes! All the departments, legislative, judicial, and executive, and all subordinate functionaries, must lie quietly on it; but it will be the repose of despotism and death.

Sir, such an enormous and extravagant pretension cannot be sanctioned. It must be put alongside of its exploded compeer, the power once asserted for Congress to pass any and all laws called for by "the general welfare."

Allow me, in a few words, to present to the Senate my ideas of the structure of our Federal Government. It has no power but granted power; and the power granted must be found in the constitution, the instrument granting it. If the question arise, is a specific power granted? the grant must be shown, or the power must be proven to be necessary and proper to carry into effect a granted power. Our executive power, such as it is, must be looked for in the constitution, which has created and modified it, and not in the forms in which executive power practically exists in other countries, nor in the nature which is supposed to belong to it in the writings of Montesquieu, or any other speculative author. And so of our legislative and judicial powers. With respect to each of the three great departments into which Government is divided, we are to look for their respective powers into the constitution itself, and not into the theories of abstract or speculative philosophers. They have neither more nor less power than what is given. As to each, the constitution uses general language, which is to be interpreted not so much by its terms, as by the specific delineations of authority which are subsequently made. In reference to the general duty assigned to the President to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," what does that mean? According to the exposition which I am considering, the President would absorb all the powers of Government. For, in each particular case of the execution of a law, if his judgment was not satisfied that it was law, he might withhold the requisite executive agency. If a treaty were to be carried into effect; if a law to be executed; or a judicial decision to be enforced, denying that the treaty was valid, the law constitutional, or the decision agreeable to law, he might refuse the necessary means to enforce the execution of them respectively; and the practical result of the whole would be, that nothing under Government could be done but what was agreeable to the President. Such a view of our Government must be rejected. In my opinion, when the constitution enjoined the President "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," it required nothing more than this, to employ the means intrusted to him to overcome resistance whenever it might be offered to the laws. Congress, by the fourteenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, is invested with power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. It might as well be contended that Congress, under this power, deciding what was and what was not law, could direct, by the militia, that only to be executed which Congress deemed to be law. By the second section of the second article of the constitution, the President is made commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia when called into actual service; and, by a subsequent clause, the injunction in question is given to him. Thus invested with the command and employment of the physical force of the Union, can a doubt remain that the purpose of the direction which the constitution gives to him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, was that he should, when properly called on by the civil authority, employ that force to subdue unlawful resistance? Understood in any other sense, those few words become a vortex, into which the whole powers of Government are irresistibly drawn. We have established a system, in which power has been most carefully separated and distributed between three separate and independent departments. We have been told a thousand times, and all experience assures us, that such a division is indispensable to the existence and preservation of freedom. We have established and designated offices, and appointed officers in each of those departments, to execute the duties respectively allotted to them. The President, it is true, presides over the whole; specific duties are often assigned by particular laws to him alone, or to other officers under his superintendence. His parental eye is presumed to survey the whole extent of the system in all its movements: but has he power to come into Congress, and to say such laws only shall you pass; to go into the court; and prescribe the decisions which they may pronounce; or even to enter the offices of administration, and, where duties are specifically confided to those officers, to substitute his will to their duty? Or, has he a right, when those functionaries, deliberating upon their own solemn obligations to the people, have moved forward in their assigned spheres, to arrest their lawful progress, because they have dared to act contrary to his pleasure? No, sir; no, sir. His is a high and glorious station, but it is one of observation and superintendence. It is to see that obstructions in the forward movement of Government, unlawfully interposed, shall be abated by legitimate and competent means.

That this is the true interpretation of the constitutional clause on which I am commenting, is fairly to be inferred from the total silence as to any opposite construction of all cotemporaneous expositions. If the clause were susceptible of the construction which I am now combating; if it had been deemed possible that it could have been interpreted to embrace in the Chief Magistrate all the powers of Government, would no one of the thousand wise and patriotic men, to whom the constitution was submitted, have detected and exposed the lurking danger? I have myself made, or, when I could not, I have got others to make, researches in the Federalist, the Debates of Conventions, and other cotemporaneous publications, and not the slightest countenance has been discovered in any of them for this sweeping executive pretension. If the pretension be well founded, then it is most evident that there is no longer any control over our public affairs than that exerted by the President. If it be true that when a duty, by law, is specifically assigned to a particular officer, the President may go into his office and control him in the performance of it, then it is most manifest that the will of the President is the supreme law, and every barrier between him and the public treasury is annihilated; and that union of the purse and the sword in one man's hands, which the patriotic Henry so much denounced, and which constitutes the best description of despotism, is completely realized.

The charter of the bank requires that the public deposits be made in its vaults. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to remove them; and why? Because he is placed by Congress at the head of the finances of the Government. Weekly reports of the condition of the bank are made to him; he is the sentinel of Congress, the agent of Congress, the representative of Congress, created by Congress; his duties are prescribed and defined by Congress. To them, and not to the President, he is to report. His vigilance is presumed to anticipate or promptly to perceive the existence of danger, and, when he discovers it, his duty is to provide for the safety of the public treasure, and forthwith to report to his principal. Standing in this responsible attitude to Congress, and to Congress alone, if the President may go to that officer, and tell him to do as he bids or he shall be removed from office, what security remains to the people of this country?

But let me suppose that I am totally mistaken in this construction of the constitutional injunction, and that its true meaning is that the President has the power to superintend the execution of every particular law exactly as Congress intended it, what was it his duty to do in this case, under that interpretation of the constitution? The law authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, on his own responsibility, to remove the deposits. It commanded him, if he removed them, to report his reasons to Congress. The duty was confided to his judgment and discretion exclusively, and his judgment was to be guided by his own reasons, not those of any other; and they, and no other, were to be reported to Congress. Now, if the President was bound to take care that that law should be faithfully executed, then his duty exacted of him to see that the Secretary of the Treasury was allowed the exercise of his free, unbiassed, and uncontrolled judgment in removing or not removing the deposits. That was the faithful execution of the law. Congress had not said that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy should remove them, but the Secretary of the Treasury. The President had no right, either by the constitution or the law, to go to the other Secretaries, and ask them how a service should be performed, which was confided exclusively to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. He might as well have asked the Secretary of the Treasury how a movement of the army should be made by the Secretary of War, as to have consulted this latter officer how a financial operation should be executed, not only not committed to him, but assigned exclusively to another. It was not to the President and all the Secretaries combined that the power was given to change the disposition of the public deposits. If the change were made, it was not their reasons for it which were to be reported to Congress. It was to the Secretary of the Treasury alone, exclusive of every other functionary of the Government, that the duty was specifically confided, and the measure was to be judged by Congress upon his, and not their reasons. Can it be said, then, in the language of the constitution, that the President "took care that the law was faithfully executed," when he took it altogether out of hands to which the law had confided it, and substituted another's will for the will of him who was expressly charged with the execution of the law?

Mr. C. asked the Secretary of the Senate to get him the sedition law. It is not very certain, said he, since the Executive is resolved to act in its spirit, how soon we shall be called upon to re-enact its provisions.

Now, sir, said Mr. C., let us examine some of the other sources or motives for the exercise of this power assumed by the President over the public treasury, as described by himself. He says, in the cabinet paper: "The President repeats that he begs the cabinet to consider the proposed measure as his own, in the support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsibility has been assumed, after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and the purity of the elective franchise." The morals of the people! What part of the constitution has given to the President any authority over the morals of the people? None. It grants no such power, but expressly denies all power over religion, the genial and presiding influence which prevails in every true system of morals. Tolerate to-day an assumption of authority in regard to morals, and what is the next step in the progress of usurpation? It will be to exercise a control over religion; and then to cherish some particular sect, as the only one that is orthodox, to the exclusion of all others. And the President might as well, in this case, have gone into the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and controlled him in the performance of a service, exclusively confided to his care and judgment, because it was necessary to preserve the religion of the people! I ask for the authority. Will any one of the gentlemen here, who consider themselves as the vindicators of the President, point to any clause of the constitution which gives to the present President, or any other, power to preserve the morals of the people?

But "the freedom of the press" constituted another object with the President. I am not surprised that the present Secretary of the Treasury should be desirous of reviving a power and control over the press. He was a member of that party which passed the famous sedition law under pretexts precisely similar to those which are now put forward. I recollect that it was then said that the purpose of the sedition law was not to repress the freedom of the press, but to prevent its abuses; to preserve, not to destroy it; to punish its excesses and calumnies; and to aid the cause of truth and virtue. It was to introduce salutary restraints, and to discountenance grossness and indecency. It is sometimes useful to refer back to these old things—to the motives—the pleas of state necessity, which induced arbitrary power, in former times, to surround itself with a shield against all impertinent investigation and searching inquiry. That memorable act was passed in 1798, and, among other provisions, it contained the following section:

Sec. 3. "That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall, knowingly and willingly, assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing, or writings, against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them, or either of them, into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the United States; or to excite any unlawful combinations therein, for opposing or resisting any law of the United States, or any act of the President of the United States, done in pursuance of any such law, or of the powers in him vested by the constitution of the United States; or to resist, oppose, or defeat any such law or act; or to aid, encourage, or abet any hostile designs of any foreign nation against the United States, their people, or Government; then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years."

We perceive that the law was only directed against false, scandalous, and malicious writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of Congress, or the President of the United States; and then only when the publication was intended to defame them, and to bring them into contempt or disrepute! It was only when the libeller intended to deprive high functionaries of public confidence, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, that he was subjected to punishment. It was only for the sake of truth and of justice that the sedition law was passed. That was all, sir. We now find the same motives avowed; the same purpose of protecting the abused President and injured Secretary of the Treasury. How uniform in all ages are the workings of tyranny! How plausible its pretexts! How detestable its real aims!

By the sedition law, abominable and unconstitutional as it was, the semblance of justice at least was preserved. Its victims were allowed the benefit of witnesses and of counsel to prove the truth of the alleged libel, and, above all, the inestimable privilege of trial by jury. It expressly declared, "That if any person shall be prosecuted under this act for the writing or publishing any libel aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the defendant, upon the trial of the cause, to give in evidence in his defence the truth of the matter contained in the publication charged as a libel; and the jury who shall try the cause shall have a right to determine the law and the fact, under the direction of the court, as in other cases."

But, under this new sedition law, which the President revives and promulgates in his cabinet paper, the offender is stripped of all privileges. The tribunals are dispensed with as useless ceremonies, and he stands condemned, unheard and untried. The impartial President takes the whole matter into his own hands, and, constituting himself the law, the judge, the jury, and the executioner, pronounces absolutely the guilt of the accused.

The President has also very much at heart "the purity of the elective franchise." And here again I ask, what part of the constitution of this country confers on him any power over that subject? Look at the nature and the consequences of the executive exercise of this power! If it were really necessary that steps should be taken to preserve the freedom of the press and the purity of elections, what ought the President to have done? Taken the matter into his own hands? No, no. It was his duty to recommend to Congress the passage of laws which the courts of the United States could execute. Congress could have re-examined the constitution, reviewed the existing state of legislation, and, if they possessed the requisite power, passed suitable laws, with appropriate sanctions. By undertaking himself to do that for which he has not the shadow of authority in the constitution or laws, his acts must necessarily be inefficient, and altogether incompetent to the purposes he professes. Suppose this contumacious institution, which committed, in the year 1829, the unpardonable sin of not appointing, in conformity with the President's wishes, a new president to one of its eastern branches, should dare to go on and vindicate itself against the calumnies constantly poured out upon it; that it should audaciously continue to stand upon its defence; how impotent will the power of the President be to restrain it! How inadequate will his authority prove to prevent the bank from resorting to the public press! Why, sir, if Congress possessed the power, and the President had come to us, we could have laid Mr. Nicholas Biddle by the heels, if he should be again guilty of the presumption of publishing another report of Gen. Smith or Mr. McDuffie, another speech of the eloquent gentleman [Mr. WEBSTER] near me, or any other such libels, tending to bring the President, his administration, or his Secretary of the Treasury, into disrepute. But the President of the United States, who thought he had the bank in his power; who thought he could destroy it; who was induced to believe, by that "influence behind the throne, greater than the throne itself," that he could bankrupt the institution by his fiat, has only demonstrated his total incompetency to regulate the press, and preserve it from contamination. The bank has openly avowed, and yet avows, its settled purpose to defend itself on all proper occasions. And, what is still more provoking, instead of becoming bankrupt, with its doors closed, and its vaults inaccessible, it has, it seems, got more specie than it knows what to do with, and, cruelly and unfeelingly hoarding it, refuses to let a dollar of its ten millions pass out to the relief of the local banks to which the public deposits have been transferred!

The President of the United States had officially nothing to do with the morals of the community. No, sir, for the preservation of our morals, and the free enjoyment of our religion, we are responsible to no earthly tribunal. We are responsible to God only, and I trust that this responsibility will ever remain to Him, and to His mercy alone. Neither had he any thing to do with the freedom of the press. Any power over it is expressly denied even to Congress. It was justly said by one of those few able men and bright luminaries whom Providence has yet spared to us, in answer to complaints about its alleged abuses, from the French Government, during the French revolution, that the press was one of those delicate concerns which admitted of no regulation by Government; and that its abuses must be tolerated, lest its freedom should be abridged, and its utility be destroyed. Such is the condition of the American press, as secured and recognised by the constitution; and so it has been regarded ever since the expiration of the odious seditious law, until the detestable principles of that law have been reasserted in the cabinet paper to which I have so often referred.

Such are the powers on which the President relies to justify his seizure of the treasury of the United States. I have examined them, one by one, and they all fail, utterly fail, to bear out the act. We are brought irresistibly to the conclusions, 1st, That the invasion of the public treasury has been perpetrated by the removal of one Secretary of the Treasury, who would not violate his conscientious obligations, and by the appointment of another, who stood ready to subscribe his name to the orders of the President; and, 2dly, That the President has no color of authority in the constitution or laws for the act which he has thus caused to be performed.

And now let us glance at some of the tremendous consequences which may ensue from this high-handed measure. If the President may, in a case in which the law has assigned a specific duty exclusively to a designated officer, command it to be executed, contrary to his own judgment, under the penalty of an expulsion from office, and, upon his refusal, may appoint some obsequious tool to perform the required act, where is the limit to his authority? Has he not the same right to interfere in every other case, and remove from office all that he can remove, who hesitate or refuse to do his bidding contrary to their own solemn convictions of their duty? There is no resisting this inevitable conclusion. Well, then, how stands the matter of the public treasury? It has been seen that the issue of warrants upon the treasury is guarded by four independent and hitherto responsible checks, each controlling every other, and all bound by the law, but all holding their offices, according to the existing practice of the Government, at the pleasure of the President. The Secretary signs, the Comptroller countersigns, the Register records, and the Treasurer pays the warrant. We have seen that the President has gone to the first and highest link in the chain, and coerced a conformity to his will. What is to prevent, whenever he desires to draw money from the public treasury, his applying the same penalty of expulsion, under which Mr. Duane suffered, to every link of the chain, from the Secretary of the Treasury down, and thus to obtain whatever he demands? What is to prevent a more compendious accomplishment of his object, by the agency of transfer drafts, drawn on the sole authority of the Secretary, and placing the money at once wherever, or in whatsoever hands, the President pleases?

What security have the people against the lawless conduct of any President? Where is the boundary to the tremendous power which he has assumed? Sir, every barrier around the public treasury is broken down and annihilated. From the moment that the President pronounced the words, "This measure is my own; I take upon myself the responsibility of it," every safeguard around the treasury was prostrated, and henceforward it might as well be at the Hermitage. The measure adopted by the President is without precedent. I beg pardon—there is one; but we must go down for it to the commencement of the Christian era. It will be recollected, by those who are conversant with Roman history, that, after Pompey was compelled to retire to Brundisium, Cæsar, who had been anxious to give him battle, returned to Rome, "having reduced Italy," says the venerable biographer, "in sixty days—[the exact period between the day of the removal of the deposits and that of the commencement of the present session of Congress, without the usual allowance of any days of grace]—in sixty days, without bloodshed." The biographer proceeds:

"Finding the city in a more settled condition than he expected, and many Senators there, he addressed them in a mild and gracious manner, [as the President addressed his late Secretary of the Treasury,] and desired them to send deputies to Pompey with an offer of honorable terms of peace, &c. As Metellus, the tribune, opposed his taking money out of the public treasury, and cited some laws against it—[such, sir, I suppose, as I have endeavored to cite on this occasion]—Cæsar said, 'Arms and laws do not flourish together. If you are not pleased at what I am about, you have only to withdraw. [Leave the office, Mr. Duane!] War, indeed, will not tolerate much liberty of speech. When I say this, I am renouncing my own right; for you, and all those whom I have found exciting a spirit of faction against me, are at my disposal.' Having said this, he approached the doors of the treasury, and, as the keys were not produced, he sent for workmen to break them open. Metellus again opposed him, and gained credit with some for his firmness; but Cæsar, with an elevated voice, threatened to put him to death if he gave him any further trouble. 'And you know very well, young man,' said he, 'that this is harder for me to say than to do.' Metellus, terrified by the menace, retired; and Cæsar was afterwards easily and readily supplied with every thing necessary for the war."

And where now is the public treasury? Who can tell? It is certainly without a local habitation, if it has a name. Where is the money of the people of the United States? Floating about on treasury drafts or checks, to the amount of millions, placed in the hands of tottering banks to enable them to pay their own just debts, instead of being applied to the service of the people. These checks are scattered to the winds by the Secretary of the Treasury, in defiance of a positive law, by which the Treasurer is forbidden expressly to pay any money out of the treasury but under the authority of warrants, legally issued and authenticated, in virtue of previous appropriations by law. [Mr. C. here read parts of a published correspondence between the Treasurer and the cashier of the Bank of the United States, in which the latter complained of these checks, as being issued without any notice to the bank, and contrary to an express arrangement, and in which the Treasurer says they were only to be used in the event of certain contingencies.] Thus, sir, the people's money is put into a bank here, and a bank there, in regard to the solvency of which we have no satisfactory knowledge, to be employed by them in the event of certain contingencies. The event of certain contingencies! And we know nothing of the event, nor of the contingencies!

Where was the oath of office of the Treasurer when he thus dared to suffer the people's money to be sported with? Where was the constitution, which expressly prohibits money to be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of previous appropriation by law? Where was the law establishing the Treasury Department, which enjoins that no money be paid out of the treasury but upon valid warrants legally issued? Where was the Treasurer's bond and surety, when he thus cast about the public money? I do not pretend to any great knowledge of the law, but, give me an intelligent and unpacked jury, and I undertake to prove to them that he has forfeited the penalty of his bond.

Mr. President, said Mr. C., the people of the United States are indebted to the President for the boldness of this movement; and, as one among the humblest of them, I profess my obligations to him. He has told the Senate, in his message refusing an official copy of his cabinet paper, that it has been published for the information of the people. As a part of the people, the Senate, if not in their official character, have a right to its use. In that extraordinary paper he has proclaimed that the measure is his own; and that he has taken upon himself the responsibility of it. In plain English, he has proclaimed an open, palpable, and daring usurpation!

For more than fifteen years, Mr. President, I have been struggling to avoid the present state of things. I thought I perceived, in some proceedings during the conduct of the Seminole war, a spirit of defiance to the constitution and to all law. With what sincerity and truth, with what earnestness and devotion to civil liberty, I have struggled, the Searcher of all human hearts best knows. With what fortune, the bleeding constitution of my country now fatally attests.

I have, nevertheless, persevered; and, under every discouragement, during the short time that I expect to remain in the public councils, I will persevere. And if a bountiful Providence would allow an unworthy sinner to approach the throne of grace, I would beseech Him, as the greatest favor He could grant to me here below, to spare me until I live to behold the people rising in their majesty, with a peaceful and constitutional exercise of their power, to expel the Goths from Rome; to rescue the public treasury from pillage; to preserve the constitution of the United States; to uphold the Union against the danger of the concentration and consolidation of all power in the hands of the Executive; and to sustain the liberties of the people of this country against the imminent perils to which they now stand exposed.

Here Mr. C., who was understood to have gone through the first part of his speech only, gave way, and

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next; which was ordered accordingly.

And then the Senate adjourned until Monday.

On Monday, Mr. CLAY resumed his speech.

Before I proceed, said Mr. C., to a consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the second resolution, I wish to anticipate and answer an objection which may be made to the adoption of the first. It may be urged that the Senate, being, in a certain contingency, a court of impeachment, ought not to prejudge a question which it may be called upon to decide judicially. But, by the constitution, the Senate has three characters, legislative, executive, and judicial. Its ordinary, and by far its most important character, is that of its being a component part of the legislative department. Only three or four cases, since the establishment of the Government, (that is, during a period of near half a century,) have occurred, in which it was necessary that the Senate should act as a judicial tribunal, the least important of all its characters. Now, it would be most strange, if, when its constitutional powers were assailed, it could not assert and vindicate them, because, by possibility, it might be required to act as a court of justice. The first resolution asserts only that the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the public treasury not granted by the constitution and laws. It is silent as to motive; and, without the quo animo—the deliberate purpose of usurpation—the President would not be liable to impeachment. But if a concurrence of all the elements be necessary to make out a charge of wilful violation of the constitution, does any one believe that the President will now be impeached? And shall we silently sit by, and see ourselves stripped of one of the most essential of our legislative powers, and the exercise of it assumed by the President, to whom it is not delegated, without effort to maintain it, because, against all human probability, he may be hereafter impeached?

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the first paragraph, commences with a misstatement of the fact. He says: "I have directed that the depositories of the money of the United States shall not be made in the Bank of the United States." If this assertion is regarded in any other than a mere formal sense, it is not true. The Secretary may have been the instrument, the clerk, the automaton, in whose name the order was issued; but the measure was that of the President, by whose authority or command the order was given; and of this we have the highest and most authentic evidence. The President has told the world that the measure was his own, and that he took it upon his own responsibility. And he has exonerated his cabinet from all responsibility about it. The Secretary ought to have frankly disclosed all the circumstances of the case, and told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. If he had done so, he would have informed Congress that the removal had been decided by the President on the 18th of September last; that it had been announced to the public on the 20th; and that Mr. Duane remained in office until the 23d. He would have informed Congress that this important measure was decided on before he entered into his new office, and was the cause of his appointment. Yes, sir, the present Secretary stood by, a witness to the struggle in the mind of his predecessor, between his attachment to the President and his duty to the country; saw him dismissed from office because he would not violate his conscientious obligations, and came into Mr. Duane's place to do what he could not honorably, and would not perform. A son of one of the fathers of democracy, by an administration professing to be democratic, was expelled from office, and his place supplied by a gentleman who, throughout his whole career, has been uniformly opposed to democracy! A gentleman who, at another epoch of the republic, when it was threatened with civil war, and a dissolution of the Union, voted (although a resident of a slave State) in the Legislature of Maryland against the admission of Missouri into the Union, without a restriction incompatible with her rights as a member of the confederacy.* Mr. Duane was dismissed because the solemn convictions of his duty would not allow him to conform to the President's will; because his logic did not bring his mind to the same conclusions with those of the logic of a venerable old gentleman inhabiting a white house not distant from the Capitol; because his watch [here Mr. C. held up his own] did not keep time with that of the President. He was dismissed under that detestable system of proscription for opinion's sake, which has finally dared to intrude itself into the halls of Congress; a system under which three unoffending clerks, the fathers of families, the husbands of wives, dependent on them for support, without the slightest imputation of delinquency, have been recently unceremoniously discharged, and driven out to beggary, by a man himself the substitute of a meritorious officer, who has not been in this city a period equal to one monthly revolution of the moon! I tell our Secretary, (said Mr. C., raising his voice,) that, if he touch a single hair of the head of any one of the clerks of the Senate—I am sure he is not disposed to do it—on account of his opinions, political or religious, if no other member of the Senate does it, I will instantly submit a resolution for his own dismissal.

The Secretary ought to have communicated all these things; he ought to have stated that the cabinet was divided two and two, and one of the members equally divided with himself on the question, willing to be put into either scale. He ought to have given a full account of this, the most important act of executive authority since

* The following is the proceeding to which Mr. C. referred:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Senators and Representatives from this State in Congress be requested to use their utmost endeavors, in the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, to prevent the prohibition of slavery from being required of that State as a condition of its admission." It passed January, 1820, in the affirmative. Among the names of those in the negative is that of Mr. Taney.

the origin of the Government; he should have stated with what unsullied honor his predecessor retired from office, and on what degrading conditions he accepted his vacant place. When a momentous proceeding like this, varying the constitutional distribution of the powers of the legislative and executive departments, was resolved on, the ministers, against whose advice it was determined, should have resigned their stations. No ministers of any monarch in Europe, under similar circumstances, would have retained the seals of office. And if, as nobody doubts, there is a cabal behind the curtain, without character and without responsibility, feeding the passions, stimulating the prejudices, and moulding the actions of the incumbent of the presidential office, it was an additional reason for their resignations. There is not a maitre d'hôtel in christendom, who, if the scullions were put into command in the parlor and dining room, would not scorn to hold his place, and fling it up in disgust with indignant pride!

I shall examine the report before us, 1st, As to the power of the Secretary over the deposits; 2dly, His reasons for the exercise of it; and, 3dly, The manner of its exercise.

I. The Secretary asserts that the power of removal is exclusively reserved to him; that it is absolute and unconditional, so far as the interests of the bank are concerned; that it is not restricted to any particular contingencies; that the reservation of the power to the Secretary of the Treasury exclusively is a part of the compact; that he may exercise it, if the public convenience or interest would, in any degree, be promoted; that this exclusive power thus reserved is so absolute, that the Secretary is not restrained by the considerations that the public deposits in the bank are perfectly safe, that the bank promptly meets all demands upon it, and that it faithfully performs all its duties; and that the power of Congress, on the contrary, is so totally excluded, that it could not, without a breach of the compact, order the deposits to be changed, even if Congress were satisfied that they were not safe, or should be convinced that the interests of the people of the United States imperiously demanded the removal.

Such is the statement which this unassuming Secretary makes of his own authority! He expands his own power to the most extravagant dimensions; and he undertakes to circumscribe that of Congress in the narrowest and most restricted limits! Who would have expected that, after having so confidently maintained for himself such absolute, exclusive, unqualified, and uncontrollable power, he would have let in any body else to share with him its exercise? Yet he says, "As the Secretary of the Treasury presides over one of the executive departments of the Government, and his power over this subject forms a part of the executive duties of his office, the manner in which it is exercised must be subject to the supervision of the officer [meaning the President, whose official name his modesty would not allow him to pronounce] to whom the constitution has confided the whole executive power, and has required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." If the clause in the compact exclusively vests the power of removal in the Secretary of the Treasury, what has the President to do with it? What part of the charter conveys to him any power? If, as the Secretary contends, the clause of removal, being part of the compact, restricts its exercise to the Secretary, to the entire exclusion of Congress, how does it embrace the President, especially since both the President and Secretary conceive that "the power over the place of deposit for the public money would seem properly to belong to the legislative department of the Government?" If the Secretary be correct in asserting that the power of removal is confined to the Secretary of the Treasury, then Mr. Duane, while in office, possessed it; and his dismissal, because he would not exercise a power which belonged to him exclusively, was itself a violation of the charter.

But by what authority does the Secretary assert that the Treasury Department is one of the executive departments of the Government? He has none in the act which creates the department; he has none in the constitution. The Treasury Department is placed, by law, on a different footing from all the other departments, which are, in the acts creating them, denominated executive, and placed under the direction of the President. The Treasury Department, on the contrary, is organized on totally different principles. Except the appointment of the officers, with the co-operation of the Senate, and the power which is exercised of removing them, the President has not, either by the constitution, or the law creating the department, any thing to do with it. The Secretary's reports and responsibility are directly to Congress. The whole scheme of the department is one of checks, each officer acting as a control upon his associates. The Secretary is required by the law to report, not to the President, but directly to Congress. Either House may require any report from him, or command his personal attendance before it. It is not, therefore, true that the Treasury is one of the executive departments, subject to the supervision of the President. And the inference drawn from that erroneous assumption entirely fails. The Secretary appears to have no precise ideas either of the constitution or duties of the department over which he presides. He says, "the Treasury Department being intrusted with the administration of the finances of the country, it was always the duty of the Secretary, in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, to take care that the public money was deposited in safe keeping, in the hands of faithful agents," &c. The premises of the Secretary are only partially correct, and his conclusion is directly repugnant to law. It never was the duty of the Secretary to take care that the public money was deposited in safe keeping, in the hands of faithful agents, &c. That duty is expressly, by the act organizing the department, assigned to the Treasurer of the United States, who is placed under oath, and under bond, with a large penalty, not to issue a dollar out of the public treasury, but in virtue of warrants granted in pursuance of acts of appropriation, "and not otherwise." When the Secretary treats of the power of the President, he puts on corsets, and contracts and prostrates himself before the Executive, in the most graceful, courteous, and lady-like form; but, when he treats of that of Congress and of the Treasurer, he swells and expands himself, and flirts about with all the airs of high authority.

But I cannot assent to the Secretary's interpretation of his power of removal contained in the charter. Congress has not given up its control over the treasury, or the public deposits, to either the Secretary or the Executive. Congress could not have done so without a treacherous renunciation of its constitutional powers, and a faithless abandonment of its duties. And now let us see what is the true state of the matter. Congress has reserved to itself, exclusively, the right to judge of the reasons for the removal of the deposits, by requiring the report of them to be made to it; and, consequently, the power to ratify or invalidate the act. The Secretary of the Treasury is the fiscal sentinel of Congress, to whom the bank makes weekly reports, and who is presumed constantly to be well acquainted with its actual condition. He may, consequently, discover the urgent necessity of prompt action, to save the public treasure, before it is known to Congress, and when it is not in session. But he is immediately to report—to whom? To the Executive? No, to Congress. For what purpose? That Congress may sanction or disapprove the act.

The power of removal is a reservation for the benefit of the people, not of the bank. It may be waived. Congress, being a legislative party to the compact, did not thereby deprive itself of ordinary powers of legislation. It cannot, without a breach of the national faith, repeal privileges or stipulations intended for the benefit of the bank. But it may repeal, modify, or waive the exercise altogether of those parts of the charter which were intended exclusively for the public. Could not Congress repeal altogether the clause of removal? Such a repeal would not injure, but add to the security of the bank. Could not Congress modify the clause, by revoking the agency of the Secretary of the Treasury, and substituting that of the Treasurer, or any other officer of Government? Could not Congress, at any time during the twenty years' duration of the charter, abolish the office altogether of Secretary of the Treasury, and assign all his present duties to some newly constituted department? The right and the security of the bank do not consist in the form of the agency, nor in the name of the agent, but in this: that, whatever may be its form or his denomination, the removal shall only be made upon urgent and satisfactory reasons. The power of supplemental legislation was exercised by Congress both under the new and old bank. Three years after the establishment of the existing bank, an act passed better to regulate the election of directors, and to punish any one who should attempt, by bribes or presents in any form, to influence the operations of the institution.

The denial of the Secretary to Congress of the power to remove the deposites, under any circumstances, is most extraordinary. Why, sir, suppose a corrupt collusion between the Secretary and the bank to divide the spoils of the treasury; suppose a total non-fulfilment of all the stipulations on the part of the bank; is Congress to remain bound and tied, whilst the bank should be free from all the obligations of the charter? The obligation of one party to observe faithfully his stipulations in a contract, rests upon the corresponding obligation of the other party to observe his stipulations. If one party is released, both are free. If one party fail to comply with his contract, that releases the other. This is the fundamental principle of all contracts, applicable to treaties, charters, and private agreements. If it were a mere private agreement, and one party, who had bound himself to deposit, from time to time, his money with the other, to be redrawn at his pleasure, saw that it was wasting and squandered away, he would have a clear right to discontinue the deposites. It is true that a party has no right to excuse himself from the fulfilment of his contract, by imputing a breach to the other which has never been made. And it is fortunate for the peace and justice of society, that neither party to any contract, whether public or private, can decide conclusively the question of fulfilment by the other, but must always act under subjection to the ultimate decision, in case of controversy, of an impartial arbiter, provided in the judicial tribunals of civilized communities.

As to the absolute, unconditional, and exclusive power which the Secretary claims to be vested in himself, it is in direct hostility with the principles of our Government, and adverse to the genius of all free institutions. The Secretary was made, by the charter, the mere representative or agent of Congress; its temporary substitute, acting in subordination to it, and bound, whenever he did act, to report to his principal his reasons, that they might be judged of and sanctioned, or overruled. Is it not absurd to say that the agent can possess more power than the principal? The power of revocation is incident to all agency, unless, in express terms, by the instrument creating it, a different provision is made. The powers, whether of the principal or the agent, in relation to any contract, must be expounded by the principles which govern all contracts. It is true that the language of the clause of removal, in the charter, is general; but it is not, therefore, to be torn from the context. It is a part only of an entire compact, and is to be interpreted in connexion with every part, and with the whole. Upon surveying the entire compact, we perceive that the bank has come under various duties to the public; has undertaken to perform important financial operations for the Government; and has paid a bonus into the public treasury of a million and a half of dollars. We perceive that, in consideration of the assumption of these heavy engagements, and the payment of that large sum of money, on the part of the bank, the public has stipulated that the public deposites shall remain with the bank during the continuation of the charter, and that its notes shall be received by the Government in payment of all debts, dues, and taxes. Except the corporate character conferred, there is none but those two stipulations of any great importance to the bank. Each of the two parties to the compact must stand bound to the performance of his engagements, whilst the other is honestly and faithfully fulfilling his. It is not to be conceived, in the formation of the compact, that either party could have anticipated that, whilst he was fairly and honestly executing every obligation which he had contracted, the other party might arbitrarily or capriciously exonerate himself from the discharge of his obligations. Suppose, when citizens of the United States were invited by the Government to subscribe to the stock of this bank, that they had been told that, although the bank performs all its covenants with perfect fidelity, the Secretary of the Treasury may, arbitrarily or capriciously, upon his speculative notions of any degree of public interest or convenience to be advanced, withdraw the public deposites; would they have ever subscribed? Would they have been guilty of the folly of binding themselves to the performance of burdensome duties, whilst the Government was left at liberty to violate at pleasure that stipulation of the compact which by far was the most essential to them?

On this part of the subject, I conclude that Congress has not parted from, but retains, its legitimate power over the deposites; that it might modify or repeal altogether the clause of removal in the charter; that a breach of material stipulations on the part of the bank would authorize Congress to change the place of the deposites; that a corrupt collusion to defraud the public, between the bank and a Secretary of the Treasury, would be a clear justification to Congress to direct a transfer of the public deposites; that the Secretary of the Treasury is the mere agent of Congress, in respect to the deposites, acting in subordination to his principal; that it results from the nature of all agency that it may be revoked, unless otherwise expressly provided; and, finally, that the principal, and much less the agent, of one party cannot justly or lawfully violate the compact, or any of its essential provisions, whilst the other party is in the progressive and faithful performance of all his engagements.

If I am right in this view of the subject, there is an end of the argument. There was perfect equality and reciprocity between the two parties to the compact. Neither could exonerate himself from the performance of his obligations, whilst the other was honestly proceeding fairly to fulfil all his engagements. But the Secretary of the Treasury concedes that the public deposites were perfectly safe in the hands of the bank; that the bank promptly met every demand upon it; and that it faithfully performed all its duties. By these concessions, he surrenders the whole argument, admits the complete obligation of the public to perform their part of the compact, and demonstrates that no reasons, however plausible or strong, can justify an open breach of a solemn national compact.

II. But he has brought forward various reasons to palliate or justify his violation of the national faith; and it is now my purpose to proceed, in the second place, to examine and consider them. Before I proceed to do this, I hope to be allowed again to call the attention of the Senate to the nature of the office of Secretary of the Treasury. It is altogether financial and administrative. His duties relate to the finances, their condition and improvement, and to them exclusively. The act creating the Treasury Department, and defining the duties of the Secretary, demonstrates this. He has no legislative powers; and Congress neither has nor could delegate any to him. His powers, wherever given, and in whatever language expressed, must be interpreted by his defined duties. Neither is the Treasury Department an executive department. It was expressly created not to be an executive department. It is administrative, but not executive. His relations are positive and direct to Congress, by the act of his creation, and not to the President. Whenever he is put under the direction of the President, (as he is by various subsequent acts, especially those relating to public loans,) it is done by express provision of law, and for specified purposes.

[SENATE.]

With this key to the nature of the office and the duties of the officer, I will now briefly examine the various reasons which he assigns for the removal of the public deposits. The first is the near approach of the expiration of the charter. But the charter had yet to run about two and a half of the twenty years to which it was limited. During the whole term, the public deposits were to continue to be made with the bank. It was clearly foreseen, at the commencement of the term, as now, that it would expire; and yet Congress did not then, and has never since, thought proper to provide for the withdrawal of the deposits prior to the expiration of the charter. Whence does the Secretary derive an authority to do what Congress had never done? Whence his power to abridge in effect the period of the charter, and to limit it to seventeen and a half years, instead of twenty? Was the urgency for the removal of the deposits so great that he could not wait sixty days, until the assembling of Congress? He admits that they were perfectly safe in the bank; that it promptly met every demand upon it; and that it faithfully performed all its duties. Why not, then, wait the arrival of Congress? The last time the House of Representatives had spoken, among the very last acts of the last session, that House had declared its full confidence in the safety of the deposits. Why not wait until it could review the subject, with all the new light which the Secretary could throw upon it, and again proclaim its opinion? He comes into office on the 23d September, 1833, and, in three days, with intuitive celerity, he comprehends the whole of the operations of the complex department of the treasury; perceives that the Government, from its origin, had been in uniform error; and denounces the opinions of all his predecessors! And, hastening to rectify universal wrong, in defiance and in contempt of the resolution of the House, he signs an order for the removal of the deposits! It was of no consequence to him whether places of safety, in substitution of the Bank of the United States, could be obtained or not; without making essential precautionary arrangements, he commands the removal almost instantly to be made.

Why, sir, if the Secretary were right in contending that he alone could order the removal, even he admits that Congress has power to provide for the security of the public money in the new places to which it might be transferred. If he did not deign to consult the representatives of the people as to the propriety of the first step, did not a decent respect to their authority and judgment exact from him a delay, for the brief term of sixty days, that they might consider what was fitting to be done? The truth is, that the Secretary, by law, has nothing to do with the care and safe keeping of the public money. As has been already shown, that duty is specifically assigned, by law, to the Treasurer of the United States. And, in assuming upon himself the authority to provide other depositories than the Bank of the United States, he alike trampled upon the duties of the Treasurer, and what was due to Congress. Can any one doubt the motive of this precipitancy? Does any one doubt that it was to preclude the action of Congress, or to bring it under the influence of the executive veto? Let the two Houses, or either of them, perform their duty to the country, and we shall hereafter see whether, in that respect, at least, Mr. Secretary will not fail to consummate his purpose.

The next reason assigned for this offensive proceeding is, the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate. "I have always (says the Secretary) regarded the result of the last election of President of the United States as the declaration of a majority of the people that the charter ought not to be renewed." "Its voluntary application to Congress for the renewal of its charter four years before it expired, and upon the eve of the election of President, was understood on all sides as bringing forward that question for incidental decision at the then approaching election. It was accordingly argued on both sides before the tribunal of the people, and their verdict pronounced against the bank," &c. What has the Secretary to do with elections? Do they belong to the financial concerns of his department? Why this constant reference to the result of the last presidential election? Ought not the President to be content with the triumphant issue of it? Did he want still more votes? The winners ought to forbear making any complaints, and be satisfied, whatever the losers may be. After an election is fairly terminated, I have always thought that the best way was to forget all the incidents of the preceding canvass, and especially the manner in which votes had been cast. If one has been successful, that ought to be sufficient for him; if defeated, regrets are unavailing. Our fellow-citizens have a right freely to exercise their elective franchise as they please; and no one, certainly no candidate, has any right to complain about it.

But the argument of the Secretary is, that the question of the bank was fairly submitted to the people, by the consent of all parties, fully discussed before them, and their verdict pronounced against the institution in the re-election of the President. His statement of the case requires that we should examine carefully the various messages of the President to ascertain whether the bank question was fairly and frankly (to use a favorite expression of the President) submitted by him to the people of the United States.

In his message of 1829, the President says: "The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberative consideration of the Legislature and the people." The charter had then upwards of six years to run. Upon this solemn invitation of the Chief Magistrate, two years afterwards the bank came forward with an application for renewal. Then it was discovered that the application was premature. And the bank was denounced for accepting the very invitation which had been formally given. The President proceeds: "Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens." This message was a non-committal. The President does not announce clearly his own opinion, but states that of a large portion of our fellow-citizens. Now we all know that a large and highly respectable number of the people of the United States have always entertained an opinion adverse to the bank on both grounds. The President continues: "If such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its resources, might not be devised." Here, again, the President, so far from expressing an explicit opinion against all national banks, makes a hypothetical admission of the utility of a bank, and distinctly intimates the practicability of devising one on the basis of the credit and resources of the Government.

In his message of 1830, speaking of the bank, the President says: "Nothing has occurred to lessen, in any degree, the dangers which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections." Here, again, the President recites the apprehensions of "many of our citizens" rather than avows his opinion. Again his message is a non-committal. He admits, indeed, "the advantages afforded by the present bank," but suggests an inquiry whether it be possible (of course, doubting) to secure them by a bank differently constructed. And towards the conclusion of that part of the message, his language fully justifies the implication that it was not to the bank itself, but to "its present form," that he objected.

The message of 1831, when treating of the bank, was very brief. "Entertaining the opinions (says the President) heretofore expressed in relation to the Bank of the United States, as at present organized,"—[non-committal once more; and what that means, Mr. President, nobody better knows than you and I],—"I felt it my duty, in my former messages, frankly to disclose them." Frank disclosures! Now, sir, I recollect perfectly well the impressions made on my mind, and on those of other Senators with whom I conversed, immediately after that message was read. We thought, and said to each other, the President has left a door open to pass out. It is not the bank, it is not any Bank of the United States, to which he is opposed, but it is to the particular organization of the existing bank. And we all concluded that, if amendments could be made to the charter satisfactory to the President, he would approve a bill for its renewal.

We come now to the famous message of July, 1832, negating the bill to recharter the bank. Here it might be expected we should certainly find clear opinions, unequivocally expressed. The President cannot elude the question. He must now be perfectly frank. We shall presently see. He says: "A Bank of the United States is in many respects convenient to the Government, and useful to the people. Entertaining this opinion, and deeply impressed with the belief that some of the powers and privileges possessed by the existing bank are unauthorized by the constitution," &c., "I felt it my duty, at an early period of my administration, to call the attention of Congress to the practicability of organizing an institution, combining all its advantages, and obviating these objections. I sincerely regret that, in the act before me, I can perceive none of those modifications," &c. "That a Bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by the Government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our own delegated powers, or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt. Had the Executive been called on to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed." The message is principally employed in discussing the objections which the President entertained to the particular provisions of the charter, and not to the bank itself; such as the right of foreigners to hold stock in it; its exemption from State taxation; its capacity to hold real estate, &c. Does the President, even in this message, array himself in opposition to any Bank of the United States? Does he even oppose himself to the existing bank, under every organization of which it is susceptible? On the contrary, does he not declare that he does not entertain a doubt that a bank may be constitutionally organized? Does he not even rebuke Congress for not calling on him to furnish a project of a bank, which he would have cheerfully supplied? Is it not fairly deducible, from the message, that the charter of the present bank might have been so amended as to have secured the President's approbation to the institution? So far was the message from being decisive against all banks of the United States, or against existing banks, under any modification, that the President expressly declares that the question was adjourned. He says: "A general discussion will now take place, eliciting new light, and settling important principles; and a new Congress, elected in the midst of such discussion, and furnishing an equal representation of the people, according to the last census, will bear to the Capitol the verdict of public opinion, and I doubt not bring this important question to a satisfactory result."

This review of the various messages of the President conclusively evinces that they were far from expressing frankly and decisively any opinions of the Chief Magistrate, except that he was opposed to the amendments of the charter contained in the bill submitted to him for its renewal, and that he required further amendments. It demonstrates that he entertained no doubt that it was practicable and desirable to establish a bank of the United States; it justified the hope that he might be ultimately reconciled to the continuation of the present bank, with suitable modifications; and it expressly proclaimed that the whole subject was adjourned to the new Congress, to be assembled under the last census. If the parts of the messages which I have cited, or other expressions in the same document, be doubtful, or susceptible of a different interpretation, the review is sufficient for my purpose; which is, to refute the argument so confidently advanced, that the President's opinion, in opposition to the present or any other Bank of the United States, was frankly and fairly stated to the people prior to the late election, was fully understood, and finally decided by them.

Accordingly, in the canvass which ensued, it was boldly asserted by the partisans of the President that he was not opposed to a Bank of the United States, nor to the existing bank, with proper amendments. They maintained, at least wherever those friendly to a national bank were in the majority, that his re-election would be followed by a recharter of the bank, with proper amendments. They dwelt, it is true, with great earnestness, upon his objections to the bank as at present modified, and especially to the pernicious influence of foreigners in holding stock in it; but they nevertheless contended that these objections would be cured if he was re-elected, and the bank sustained. I appeal to the whole Senate, to my colleague, to the people of Kentucky, and especially to the citizens of the city of Louisville, for the correctness of this statement.

After all this, was it anticipated by the people of the United States that, in the re-election of the President, they were deciding against an institution of such vital importance? Could they have imagined that, after an express adjournment of the whole matter to a new Congress by the President himself, he would have prejudged the action of this new Congress, and pronounced that a question expressly by himself referred to its authority was previously settled by the people? He claimed no such result in his message immediately after the re-election; although in it he denounced the bank as an unsafe depository of the public money, and invited Congress to investigate its condition. The President, then, and the Secretary of the Treasury, are without all color of justification for their assertions that the question of the bank or no bank was fully and fairly submitted to the people, and a decision pronounced against it by them.

Sir, I am surprised and alarmed at the new source of executive power which is found in the result of a presidential election. I had supposed that the constitution and the laws were the sole source of executive authority; that the constitution could only be amended in the mode which it has itself prescribed; that the issue of a presidential election was merely to place the Chief Magistrate in the post assigned to him; and that he had neither more nor less power, in consequence of the election, than the constitution defines and delegates. But it seems that if, prior to an election, certain opinions, no matter how ambiguously put forth by a candidate, are known to the people, these loose opinions, in virtue of the election, incorporate themselves with the constitution, and afterwards are to be regarded and expounded as parts of the instrument!

The public money ought not, the Secretary thinks, to remain in the bank until the last moment of the existence of the charter. But that was not the question which he had to decide on the 26th September last. The real question then was, could he not wait sixty days for the meeting of Congress? There were many last moments—near two years and a half—between the 26th of September and the day of the expiration of the charter. But why not let the public money remain in the bank until the last day of the charter? It is a part of the charter that it shall so remain; and Congress having so ordered it, the Secretary ought to have acquiesced in the will of Congress, unless the exigency had arisen on which alone it was supposed his power over the depositories would be exercised. The Secretary is greatly mistaken in believing that the bank will be less secure in the last hours of its existence than previously. It will then be collecting its resources, with a view to the immediate payment of its notes, and the ultimate division among the stockholders of their capital; and at no period of its existence will it be so strong and able to pay all demands upon it. As to the depreciation in the value of its notes in the interior at that time; why, sir, is the Secretary possessed of the least knowledge of the course of the trade of the interior, and especially of the western States? If he had any, he could not have made such a suggestion. When the bank itself is not drawing, its notes form the best medium of remittance from the interior to the Atlantic capitals. They are sought after by merchants and traders with avidity, are never below par, and, in the absence of bank drafts, may command a premium. This will continue to be the case as long as the charter endures, and especially during the last moments of its existence, when its ability will be unquestionable; Philadelphia being the place of the redemption, whilst the notes themselves will be receivable in all the large cities in payment of duties.

The Secretary asserts that "it is well understood that the superior credit heretofore enjoyed by the notes of the Bank of the United States was not founded on any particular confidence in its management or solidity. It was occasioned altogether by the agreement, on behalf of the public, in the act of incorporation, to receive them in all payments to the United States." I have rarely seen any state paper characterized by so little gravity, dignity, and circumspection as the report displays. The Secretary is perfectly reckless in his assertions of matters of fact, and culpably loose in his reasoning. Can he believe the assertion which he has made? Can he believe, for example, that, if the notes of the Bank of the Metropolis were made receivable in all payments to the Government, they would ever acquire, at home and abroad, the credit and confidence which are attached to those of the Bank of the United States? If he had stated that the faculty mentioned was one of the elements of the great credit of those notes, the statement would have been true; but who can agree with him that it is the sole cause? The credit of the Bank of the United States results from the large amount of its capital; from the great ability and integrity with which it has been administered; from the participation of the Government in its affairs; from its advantageous location; from its being the place of deposite of the public moneys; and its notes being receivable in all payments to the Government; and from its being emphatically the Bank of the United States. This latter circumstance arranges it with the Banks of England, France, Amsterdam, Genoa, &c.

The expansion and contraction of the accommodations of the bank to its individual customers are held up by the Secretary, in bold relief, as evidences of misconduct, which justified his withdrawal of the depositories. He represents the bank as endeavoring to operate on the public, by alternate bribery and oppression, with the same object, in both cases, of influencing the election or the administration of the President. Why this perpetual reference of all the operations of the institution to the Executive? Why does the Executive think of nothing but itself? It is I! It is I! It is I, that is meant! appears to be the constant exclamation. Christianity and charity enjoin us never to ascribe a bad motive, if we can suppose a good one. The bank is a moneyed corporation, whose profits result from its business. If that be extensive, it makes better; if limited, less profit. Its interest is to make the greatest amount of dividends which it can safely; and all its actions may be more certainly ascribed to that than any other principle. The administration must have a poor opinion of the virtue and intelligence of the people of the United States, if it supposes that their judgments are to be warped, and their opinions controlled, by any scale of graduated bank accommodations. The bank must have a still poorer conception of its duty to the stockholders, if it were to regulate its issues by the uncertain and speculative standard of political effect, rather than a positive arithmetical rule for the computation of interest.

As to the alleged extension of the business of the bank, it has been again and again satisfactorily accounted for, by the payment of the public debt, and the withdrawal from Europe of considerable sums, which threw into its vaults a large amount of funds, which, to be productive, must be employed; and as the commercial wants, proceeding from extraordinary activity of business, created great demands, about the same period, for bank accommodations, the institution naturally enlarged its transactions. It would have been treacherous to the best interests of its constituents if it had not done so. The recent contraction of its business is the result of an obvious cause. Notwithstanding the confidence in it manifested by one of the last acts of the last House of Representatives, Congress had scarcely left the District before measures were put in operation to circumvent its authority. Denunciations and threats were put forth against it. Rumors, stamped with but too much authority, were circulated, of the intention of the Executive to disregard the admonition of the House of Representatives. An agent was sent out—and such an agent!—[Here Mr. C. was interrupted with bursts of applause from the galleries, which occasioned the interference of the Vice President]—to sound the local institutions as to the terms on which they would receive the depositories. Was the bank, who could not be ignorant of all this, to sit carelessly by, without taking any precautionary measures? The prudent mariner, when he sees the coming storm, furls his sails, and prepares for all its rage. The bank knew that the Executive was in open hostility to it, and that it had nothing to expect from its forbearance. It had numerous points to defend, the strength or weakness of all which was well known from its weekly returns to the Secretary; and it could not possibly know at which the first mortal stroke would be aimed. If, on the 20th of September last, instead of the manifesto of the President against the bank, he had officially announced that he did not mean to make war upon the bank, and intended to allow the public depositories to remain until the pleasure of Congress was expressed, public confidence would have been assured and unshaken, the business of the country continued in quiet and prosperity, and the numerous bankruptcies in our commercial cities averted.

Removal of the Deposits.

The wisdom of human actions is better known in their results than at their inception. That of the bank is manifest from all that has happened, and especially from its actual condition of perfect security.

The Secretary complains of misconduct of the bank, in delegating to the committee of exchange the transaction of important business, and in that committee being appointed by the president, and not the board, by which the Government directors have been excluded. The directors who compose the board meet only periodically. Deriving no compensation from their places, (which the charter, indeed, prohibits them from receiving,) it cannot be expected that they should be constantly in session. They must necessarily, therefore, devolve a great part of the business of the bank, in its details, upon the officers and servants of the corporation. It is sufficient if the board controls, governs, and directs the whole machine. The most important operation of a bank is that of paying out its cash; and that the cashier or teller, and not the board, performs. As to committees of exchange, the board not being always in session, it is evident that the convenience of the public requires that there should be some authority at the bank daily, to pass daily upon bills, either in the sale or purchase, as the wants of the community require. Every bank, I believe, that does business to any extent, has a committee of exchange similar to that of the Bank of the United States. In regard to the mode of appointment of the board by the president, it is in conformity with the invariable usage of the House of Representatives; with the practice of the Senate for several years, and until altered at the commencement of this session; with the usage in a great variety, if not all, of the State Legislatures, and with that which prevails in our popular assemblies. The president, speaker, chairman, moderator, almost uniformly appoints committees. That none of the Government directors have been on the committee of exchange, has proceeded, it is to be presumed, from their not being entitled, from their skill and experience, and standing in society, to be put there. The Government directors stand upon the same equal footing with those appointed by the stockholders. When appointed, they are thrown into the mass, and must take their fair chances with their colleagues. If the President of the United States will nominate men of high character and credit, of known experience and knowledge in business, they will no doubt be placed in corresponding stations. If he appoints different men, he cannot expect it. Banks are exactly the places where currency and value are well understood and duly estimated. A piece of coin, having even the stamp of the Government, will not pass unless the metal is pure.

The French bill forms another topic of great complaint with the Secretary. The state of the case is, that the Government sold to the bank a bill on that of France for $900,000, which the bank sold in London, whence it was sent by the purchaser to Paris to receive the amount. When the bank purchased the bill, it paid the amount to the Government, or, which is the same thing, passed it to the credit of the treasury, to be used on demand. The bill was protested in Paris, and the agents of the bank, to avoid its being liable to damages, took up the bill on account of the bank. The bill being thus dishonored, the bank comes back on the drawer, and demands the customary damages due, according to the course of all such transactions. The complaint of the Secretary is, that the bank took up the bill to save its own credit, and that it did not do it on account of the Government; in other words, that the bank did not advance at Paris $900,000 to the Government, on account of a bill for which it had already paid every dollar at Philadelphia. Why, sir, has the Secretary read the charter? If he has, he must have known that the bank could not have advanced the $900,000 for the Government, at Paris, without subjecting itself to a penalty of three times the amount, ($2,700,000.) The 13th section of the charter is express and positive: "That if the said corporation shall advance or lend any sum of money, for the use or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding $500,000, all persons concerned in making such unlawful advance or loan shall forfeit treble the amount, one-fifth to the informer," &c.

The last reason which I shall notice of the Secretary is, that this ambitious corporation aspires to possess political power. Those in the actual possession of power, especially when they have grossly abused it, are perpetually dreading its loss. The miser does not cling to his treasure with a more death-like grasp. Their suspicions are always active and on the alert. In every form they behold a rival, and every breeze comes charged with alarm and dread. A thousand spectres glide before their affrighted imaginations; and they see in every attempt to enlighten those who have placed them in office a sinister design to snatch from them their authority. On what other principles can we account for the extravagant charges brought forward by the Secretary against the bank? More groundless and reckless assertions than those which he has allowed himself to embody in his report never were presented to a deceived, insulted, and outraged people. Suffer me, sir, to group some of them. He asserts that "there is sufficient evidence to prove that the bank has used its means to obtain political power;" that, in the presidential election, "the bank took an open and direct interest, demonstrating that it was using its money for the purpose of obtaining a hold upon the people of this country;" that it "entered the political arena;" that it circulated publications containing "attacks on the officers of Government;" that "it is now openly in the field as a political partisan;" that there are "positive proofs" of the efforts of the bank to obtain power; and, finally, he concludes, as a demonstrated proposition, "Fourthly, that there is sufficient evidence to show that the bank has been, and still is, seeking to obtain political power, and has used its money for the purpose of influencing the election of the public servants."

After all this, who can doubt that this ambitious corporation is a candidate for the next presidency? Or, if it can moderate its lofty pretensions, that it means at least to go for the office of Secretary of the Treasury, upon the next removal? But, sir, where are the proofs of these political designs? Can any thing be more reckless than these confident assertions of the Secretary? Let us have the proofs. I call for the proofs. The bank has been the constant object for years of vituperation and calumny. It has been assailed in every form of bitterness and malignity. Its operations have been misrepresented; its credit, and the public confidence in its integrity and solidity, attempted to be destroyed, and the character of its officers assailed. Under these circumstances, it has dared to defend itself. It has circulated public documents, speeches of members of Congress, reports made by chairmen of committees, friends of the administration, and other papers. And, as it was necessary to make the defence commensurate with the duration and the extensive theatre of the attack, it has been compelled to incur a heavy expense to save itself from threatened destruction. It has openly avowed, and yet avows, its right and purpose to defend itself. All this was known to the last Congress. Not a solitary material fact has been since disclosed. And when before, in a country where the press is free, was it deemed criminal for any body to defend itself? Who invested the Secretary of the Treasury with power to interpose himself between the people, and light and intelligence? Who gave him the right to dictate what information shall be communicated to the people, and by whom? Whence does he derive his jurisdiction? Who made him censor of the public press? From what new sedition law does he deduce his authority? Is the superintendence of the American press a part of the financial duty of a Secretary of the Treasury? Why did he not lay the whole case before Congress, and invite their revival of the old sedition law? Why anticipate the arrival of their session? Why usurp the authority of the only department of the Government competent to apply a remedy, if there be any power to abridge the freedom of the press? If the Secretary wishes to purify the press, he has a most Herculean duty before him. And when he sallies out on his Quixotic expedition, he had better begin with the Augean stable, the press nearest to him—his organ—as most needing purification.

I have done with the Secretary's reasons. They have been weighed, and found wanting. There was not only no financial motive for his acting, (the sole motive which he could officially entertain,) but every financial consideration forbade him to act. I proceed now, in the third and last place, to examine the manner in which he has exercised his power over the depositories.

III. The whole people of the United States derive an interest from the public depositories in the Bank of the United States, as a stockholder in that institution. The bank is enabled, through its branches, to throw capital into those parts of the Union where it is most needed. Thus it distributes and equalizes the advantages accruing from the collection of a large public revenue, and the consequent public depositories. Thus it neutralizes the injustice which would otherwise flow from the people of the West and the interior, paying their full proportion of the public burdens, without deriving any corresponding benefit from the circulation and depositories of the public revenue. The use of the capital of the bank has been signally beneficial to the West. We there want capital—domestic, foreign, any capital that we can honestly get. We want it to stimulate enterprise, to give activity to business, and to develop the vast resources which the bounty of nature has concentrated in that region. But, by the Secretary's financial arrangements, the twenty-five or thirty millions of the public revenue collected from all the people of the United States (including those of the West) will be retained in a few Atlantic ports. Each port will engross the public moneys there collected; and, as that of New York collects about one-half of the public revenue, all the people of the United States will be laid under contribution, not for the sake of the people of the city of New York, but of two or three banks in that city, in which the people of the United States collectively have not a particle of interest; banks, the stock in which is, or may be, held by foreigners.

Three months have elapsed, and the Secretary has not yet found places of deposit for the public moneys as substitutes for the Bank of the United States. He tells us, in his report of yesterday, that the Bank of Charleston, to which he applied to receive them, declined the custody, and that he has yet found no other bank willing to assume it. But he states that the public interest does not in consequence suffer. No! What is done with the public moneys constantly receiving in the important port of Charleston, the largest port (New Orleans excepted) from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico? What with the revenue bonds? It appears that he has not yet received the charters from all the banks selected as places of deposit. Can any thing be more improvident than that the Secretary should undertake to contract with banks, without knowing their power and capacity to contract by their charters? That he should venture to deposite the people's money in banks, without a full knowledge of every thing respecting their actual condition? But he has found some banks willing to receive the public depositories, and he has entered into contracts with them. And the very first step he has taken has been in direct violation of an express and positive statute of the United States. By the act of the 1st

May, 1820, sixth section, it is enacted, "that no contract shall be hereafter made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfilment; and excepting, also, contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the army or navy, and contracts by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those departments." Now, sir, what law authorized these contracts with the local banks, made by the Secretary of the Treasury? The argument, if I understand the argument intended to be employed on the other side, is this: that, by the bank charter, the Secretary is authorized to remove the public depositories; and that includes the power in question. But the act establishing the Treasury Department confides, expressly, the safe keeping of the public moneys of the United States to the Treasurer of the United States, and not to the Secretary; and the Treasurer, not the Secretary, gives a bond for the fidelity with which he shall keep them. The moment, therefore, that they are withdrawn from the Bank of the United States, they are placed, by law, under the charge and responsibility of the Treasurer and his bond, and not of the Secretary, who has given no bond. But let us trace this argument a little further. The power to remove the depositories, says the Secretary, from a given place, implies the power to designate the place to which they shall be removed. And this implied power to designate the place to which they shall be removed, implies the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with the new banks of deposit. And on this third link in the chain of implications a fourth is constructed, to dispense with the express duties of the Treasurer of the United States, defined in a positive statute; and yet a fifth, to repeal a positive statute of Congress, passed four years after the passage of the law containing the parent source of this most extraordinary chain of implications. The exceptions in the act of 1820 prove the inflexibility of the rule which it prescribes. Annual appropriations are made for the clothing and subsistence of the army and navy. These appropriations might have been supposed to contain a power to contract for those articles, notwithstanding the prohibitory clause in that act. But Congress thought otherwise, and therefore expressly provided for the exceptions. It must be admitted that our clerk (as the late Governor Robinson, of Louisiana, one of the purest republicans I have ever known, used to call a Secretary of the Treasury) tramples with very little ceremony upon the duties of the Treasurer, and of the acts of the Congress of the United States, when they come in his way.

These contracts, therefore, between the Secretary of the Treasury and the local banks, are mere nullities and absolutely void, enforceable in no courts of justice whatever, for two causes: 1st. Because they are made in violation of the act of the 1st May, 1820; and, 2dly, because the Treasurer, and not the Secretary of the Treasury, alone had, if any federal officer possessed it, the power to contract with the local banks. And here again we perceive the necessity there was for avoiding the precipitancy with which the Executive acted, and for waiting the meeting of Congress. Congress could have deliberately reviewed the previous legislation, decided upon the expediency of a transfer of the public depositories, and, if deemed proper, could have passed the new laws adapted to the new condition of the treasury. It could have decided whether the local banks should pay any bonus, or pay any interest, or diffuse the public depositories throughout the United States, so as to secure among all their parts equality of benefits as well as of burdens, and provided for ample guaranties for the safety of the public moneys in their new depositories.

But let us now inquire whether the Secretary of the Treasury has exercised his usurped authority, in the formation of these contracts, with prudence and discretion.

Removal of the Deposites.

HAVING substituted himself to Congress and to the Treasurer of the United States, he ought at least to show that, in the stipulations of the contracts themselves, he has guarded the public moneys, and provided for the public interest. I will examine the contract with the Girard Bank of Philadelphia, which is presented as a specimen of the contracts with the Atlantic banks. The first stipulation limits the duty of the local bank to receive in deposit, on account of the United States, only the notes of banks convertible into coin "in its immediate vicinity," or which it is, "for the time being, in the habit of receiving." Under this stipulation, the Girard Bank, for example, will not be bound to receive the notes of the Louisville Bank, although that also be one of the deposit banks, nor the notes of any other bank, not in its immediate vicinity, even if it be a deposit bank. As to the provision that it will receive the notes of banks which, for the time being, it is in the habit of receiving, it is absurd to put such a stipulation in a contract, because, by the power retained to change the habit for the time being, it is an absolute nullity. Now, sir, how does this contract compare with the charter and practice of the Bank of the United States? That bank receives every where, and credits the Government with the notes, whether issued by the branches or the principal bank. The amount of all these notes is every where available to the Government. But the Government may be overflowing in distant bank notes when they are not wanted, and a bankrupt at the places of great expenditure, under this singular arrangement.

With respect to the transfer of moneys from place to place, the local bank requires in this contract that it shall not take place but upon reasonable notice. And what reasonable notice is, has been left totally undefined, and of course open to future contest. When hereafter a transfer is ordered, and the bank is unable to make it, there is nothing to do but to allege the unreasonableness of the notice. The local bank agrees to render to the Government all the services now performed by the Bank of the United States, subject, however, to the restriction that they are required "in the vicinity" of the local bank. But the Bank of the United States is under no such restrictions; its services are co-extensive with the United States and their territories.

The local banks agree to submit their books and accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to any agent to be appointed by him, but to be paid by the local banks pro rata, as far as such examination is admissible without a violation of their respective charters; and how far that may be the Secretary cannot tell, because he has not yet seen all the charters. He is, however, to appoint the agents of examination, and to fix the salaries which the local banks are to pay. And where does the Secretary find the power to create officers, and fix their salaries, without the authority of Congress?

But the most improvident, unprecedented, and extraordinary provision in the contract is that which relates to the security. When, and not until, the deposits in the local bank shall exceed one-half of the capital stock actually paid in, collateral security, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury, is to be given for the safety of the deposits. Why, sir, a freshman, a schoolboy, would not have thus dealt with his father's or guardian's money. Instead of the security preceding, it is to follow the deposit of the people's money! That is, the local bank gets an amount of their money, equal to one-half of its capital, and then it condescends to give security! Does not the Secretary know that, when he goes for the security, the money may be gone, and that he may be entirely unable to get the one or the other? We have a law, if I mistake not, which forbids the advancing of any public money, even to a disbursing agent of the Government, without previous security. Yet, in violation of the spirit of that law, or, at least, of all common sense and common prudence, the Secretary disperses upwards of twenty-five millions of public revenue among a countless number of unknown banks, and stipulates that, when the amount of the deposit exceeds one-half of their respective capitals, security is to be given!

The best stipulation in the whole contract is the last, which reserves to the Secretary of the Treasury the power of discharging these local banks from the service of the United States whenever he pleases; and the sooner he exercises it, and restores the public deposits to the place of acknowledged safety, from which they have been rashly taken, the better for all parties concerned.

Let us look into the condition of one of these local banks, the nearest to us, and that with respect to which we have the best information. The banks of this District (and among them that of the Metropolis) are required to make annual reports of their condition on the 1st day of January. The latest official return from the Metropolis Bank is of the 1st of January, 1832. Why it did not make one on the 1st of last January, along with the other banks, I know not. In point of fact, I am informed, it made none. Here is its account of January, 1832, and, I think, you will agree that it is a Flemish one. On the debit side stand, capital paid in, $500,000; notes in circulation, $62,855; due to banks, $20,911 10; individuals on deposit, $74,977 42; dividend and expenses, $17,591 77; and surplus, $8,131 02; making an aggregate of $684,496 31. On the credit side there are bills and notes discounted, and stock [what sort?] bearing interest, $626,011 90; real estate, $18,404 86; notes of other banks on hand, and checks on ditto, $23,213 80; specie—now, Mr. President, how much do you imagine? Recollect that this is the bank selected at the seat of Government, where there is necessarily concentrated a vast amount of public money employed in the expenditure of Government at this place. Recollect that, by another executive edict, all public officers, charged with the disbursement of the public money here, are required to make their deposits with this Metropolis Bank; and how much specie do you suppose it had at the date of its last official return?—$10,974 76. Due from other banks $5,890 99; making in the aggregate, on the credit side, $684,496 31. Upon looking into the items, and casting them up, you will find that this Metropolis Bank, on the 1st day of January, 1832, was liable to an immediate call for $176,335 29, and that the amount which it had on hand ready to meet that call was $40,079 55. And this is one of the banks selected at the seat of the General Government for the deposit of the public moneys of the United States! A bank, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, and upwards of ten millions of specie on hand, has been put aside; and a bank, with a capital of half a million, and a little more than ten thousand dollars in specie on hand, has been substituted in its place! How that half million has been raised; whether, in part, or in the whole, by the neutralizing operation of giving stock notes in exchange for certificates of stock, does not appear.

The design of the whole scheme of this treasury arrangement seems to have been to have united, in one common league, a number of local banks, dispersed throughout the Union, and subject to one central will, with a right of scrutiny instituted by the agents of that will. It is a bad imitation of the New York project of a safety fund. This confederation of banks will probably be combined in sympathy as well as interest, and will be always ready to fly to the succor of the source of their nourishment. As to their supplying a common currency in place of that of the Bank of the United States, the plan is totally destitute of the essential requisite. They are not required to credit each other's paper, unless it be issued in the "immediate vicinity."

We have seen what is in this contract. Now let us see

DEC. 30, 1833.]

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

what is not there. It contains no stipulation for the preservation of the public morals; none for the freedom of elections; none for the purity of the press. All these great interests, after all that has been said against the Bank of the United States, are left to shift and take care of themselves as they can. We have already seen the president of a bank in a neighboring city rushing impetuously to the defence of the Secretary of the Treasury against an editorial article in a newspaper, although "the venom of the shaft was not quite equal to the vigor of the bow." Was he rebuked by the Secretary of the Treasury? Was the bank discharged from the public service? Or, are morals, the press, and elections, in no danger of contamination, when a host of banks become literary champions on the side of power and the officers of Government? Is the patriotism of the Secretary only alarmed when the infallibility of high authority is questioned? Will the States silently acquiesce, and see the federal authority insinuating itself into banks of their creation, and subject to their exclusive control?

We have, Mr. President, a most wonderful financier at the head of our Treasury Department. He sits quietly by in the cabinet, and witnesses the contest between his colleague and the President; sees the conflict in the mind of that colleague between his personal attachment to the President on the one hand, and his solemn duty to the public on the other; beholds the triumph of conscientious obligation; contemplates the noble spectacle of an honest man preferring to surrender an exalted office, with all its honors and emoluments, rather than betray the interests of the people; witnesses the insulting and contemptuous expulsion of that colleague from office; and then coolly enters the vacated place, without the slightest sympathy or the smallest emotion. He was installed on the 23d of September, and, by the 26th, the brief period of three days, he discovered that the Government of the United States had been wrong from its origin; that every one of his predecessors, from Hamilton down, including Gallatin, (who, whatever I said of him on a former occasion, and that I do not mean to retract, possesses more practical knowledge of currency, banks, and finance, than any man I have ever met in the public councils,) Dallas, and Crawford, had been mistaken about both the expediency and constitutionality of the bank; that every Chief Magistrate, prior to him whose patronage he enjoyed, had been wrong; that Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, and the people of the United States, during the thirty-seven years that they had acquiesced in or recognised the utility of a bank, were all wrong. And, opposing his single opinion to their united judgments, he dismisses the bank, scatters the public money, and undertakes to regulate and purify the public morals, the public press, and popular elections!

If we examine the operations of this modern Turgot in their financial bearing merely, we shall find still less for approbation.

1. He withdraws the public moneys, where, by his own deliberate admission, they are perfectly safe, with a bank of thirty-five millions of capital, and ten millions of specie, and he places them, at great hazard, with banks of comparatively small capital and but little specie, of which the Metropolis Bank is an example.

2. He withdraws them from the bank created by, and over which the Federal Government has ample control, and puts them in other banks created by different Governments, and over which it has no control.

3. He withdraws them from a bank in which the American people, as a stockholder, were drawing their fair proportion of interest accruing on loans, of which those deposits formed the basis, and puts them where the people of the United States draw no interest.

4. From a bank which has paid a bonus of a million and a half, which the people of the United States may be now liable to refund, and puts them in banks which have paid to the American people no bonus.

5. Depreciates the value of the stock in a bank where the General Government holds seven millions, and advances that of banks in whose stock it does not hold a dollar, and whose aggregate capital does not probably much exceed that very seven millions. And, finally,

6. He dismisses a bank whose paper circulates, in the greatest credit, throughout the Union and in foreign countries, and engages in the public service banks, the paper of which has but a limited and local circulation in their "immediate vicinities."

These are immediate and inevitable results. How much that large and long standing item of unfavorable funds, annually reported to Congress, will be swelled and extended, remains to be developed by time.

And now, Mr. President, what, under all these circumstances, is it our duty to do? Is there a Senator who can hesitate to affirm, in the language of the resolutions, that the President has assumed a dangerous power over the treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and the laws; and that the reasons assigned for the act by the Secretary of the Treasury are insufficient and unsatisfactory?

The eyes and the hopes of the American people are anxiously turned to Congress. They feel that they have been deceived and insulted; their confidence abused; their interests betrayed; and their liberties in danger. They see a rapid and alarming concentration of all power in one man's hands. They see that, by the exercise of the positive authority of the Executive, and his negative power exerted over Congress, the will of one man alone prevails, and governs the republic. The question is no longer what laws will Congress pass, but what will the Executive not veto? The President, and not Congress, is addressed for legislative action. We have seen a corporation, charged with the execution of a great national work, dismiss an experienced, faithful, and zealous president, afterwards testify to his ability by a voluntary resolution, and reward his extraordinary services by a large gratuity, and appoint in his place an executive favorite, totally inexperienced and incompetent, to propitiate the President. We behold the usual incidents of approaching tyranny. The land is filled with spies and informers; and detraction and denunciation are the orders of the day. People, especially official incumbents in this place, no longer dare speak in the fearless tones of manly freemen, but in the cautious whispers of trembling slaves. The premonitory symptoms of despotism are upon us; and if Congress do not apply an instantaneous and effective remedy, the fatal collapse will soon come on, and we shall die—ignobly die—base, mean, and abject slaves; the scorn and contempt of mankind; unpitied, unwept, unmourned!

[The conclusion of the speech was followed by such loud and repeated applause from the immense crowd which thronged the galleries and the lobbies, that the Vice President was constrained to enforce the respect due to the Senate, by having the galleries cleared.]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 30.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a long communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the resolution of the 19th, calling for copies of certain correspondence between Mr. Crawford and others, on the subject of the bank, &c. [See appendix.]

The communication having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose, and said that, as to the report which had been just read, and which he now held in his hand, it was a most extraordinary and an unprecedented document. The Senate had called on the Secretary of the Treasury for documents, and he had given them an argument. With respect to that argument, the Secretary was welcome to the full benefit of it. He (Mr. C.) would undertake to prove, at a proper opportunity, that the Secretary had misquoted the letters of Mr. Crawford. Mr. Crawford had acted under the resolution of 1816, and all extracts which referred to that authority had been suppressed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate had called for things which they had not got, and had got things which they had not called for. They had asked of the Secretary bread, and he had given them a stone. The Senate had called for the name of the agent who had been employed to make arrangements with the banks. The Secretary ought to have known that this was one of the objects of the call, because he recited in the beginning of his report the whole of the resolution. But the name of the agent was not communicated. The Senate had asked for the compensation to the agent, but the Secretary had not given it. The Secretary was asked by virtue of what law this agent was appointed. It was replied by the Secretary, that he knew of no law but the practice of his predecessors. It was not now the proper occasion to go into this question. He had himself looked into the correspondence of Mr. Crawford, at the time, and had seen it all but the circular to the banks, which he had obtained an opportunity of seeing this morning from another quarter. And he was ready to assert that it affirmed no such power as that which was now claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

He concluded with moving that the communication be laid on the table, and printed; but withdrew the motion, at the request of Mr. FORSYTH.

Mr. FORSYTH then said that he thought the Senator from Kentucky was most unkind to the Secretary of the Treasury, and had done him much injustice. He had accused the Secretary of suppression of information, because he had not returned all which had been asked for. What was asked for? The Secretary had been asked to send certain documents, to show that the extracts made from the letters of Mr. Crawford sustained the course of the Secretary. He had done so. The gentleman from Kentucky had charged that some of these extracts were misquoted, and that others had been concealed. The Secretary had, it must be well known, referred to no documents which were exclusively in his possession. They were out of his possession, and there could be no concealment. The Senator from Kentucky, when he introduced this call, had distinctly declared that he denied the Secretary's statement of his own case. There it was. The gentleman had charged the Secretary with making misquotations from Mr. Crawford's letters. Here the letters were—chapter and verse. He thought the Senator would be grossly mistaken, if he thought he should be able to show any misstatement of the Secretary. Mr. F. then referred to the charges made against Mr. Crawford before the House of Representatives, to show that he was not charged with impropriety for having made transfers of the public money, but for having failed to communicate the fact to Congress. As to the other part of the charge against the Secretary, that he had not given the name of the agent, it would be found that the name was in the commission of the agent; and among the papers would also be found the compensation given to the agent. The information required was here given in the most authentic form, and the gentleman could make what use of it he pleased.

Mr. CLAY replied, that no one could be more free from the charge of unkind feeling towards the Secretary of the Treasury than he was. He scarcely knew him as an individual, and could have no unkindness towards him. I view him only in his official character, and in my own public capacity. The gentleman from Georgia had said that he (Mr. C.) had required from the Secretary his own statement of his case. Had not the Secretary made out his statement before the Senate made this call? There was, indeed, a part of it which was not made out, and that was the correspondence of Mr. Crawford. The Senate, at his instance, had called for this correspondence; but no argument was called for. They had asked for documents, letters, evidence; and the Secretary had given—what? an argument. As to the name and compensation of the agent, he had not been able to find it in the report. The gentleman from Georgia might have had access to the documents, and seen what he (Mr. C.) had not been able to find in the report, in which it seemed to be totally omitted. He should feel happy, however, if the information was given in any part of the communication. As to the course and authority of Mr. Crawford sustaining the Secretary, he could only say that he had read the whole of the correspondence of Mr. Crawford, and would pledge himself to show, at some other time, that he had misquoted, in every instance, where there was a semblance of similarity between the argument of Mr. Crawford and that of the Secretary. The powers assumed by the present Secretary were never asserted by Mr. Crawford; and if they had been, it would be nothing more than the opinion of one Secretary sustaining another.

The report and documents were then ordered to be laid on the table, and be printed.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the removal of the depositories, and the resolutions thereon.

Mr. CLAY resumed his speech in support of his resolutions, and continued it till the usual hour of adjournment, (as given above;) when, not having got through with what he had to say, he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 31.

THE PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having announced the hour for the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the depositories,

Mr. CLAY rose, resumed, and concluded his remarks, (as given entire above.)

Mr. BENTON then rose to reply, but, in consequence of some domestic occurrence, expressed a wish not to enter on the discussion to-day.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After which, the Senate adjourned to Thursday.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1834.

DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved the reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the report of the joint committee, who were at the last session charged with the duty of preparing a system of civil and criminal laws.

Mr. C. said that the joint committee had reported a system of laws for the District at a late period of the session, and had induced the Senate to cause it to be printed, in expectation that its delivery, at an early period in the recess, would enable intelligent and professional gentlemen, and others in the District, to be prepared at the opening of the present session with suggestions for alteration and amendment, which the committee did not doubt were necessary to the greater perfection of the system. Unavoidable circumstances, and especially the time necessarily devoted to the preparation of a full and satisfactory index, had delayed the publication until the commencement of the present session.

The deep interest to all classes of persons resident in the District on this subject, and the imperative duty of Congress to act promptly and efficiently, were so obvious, that the Committee on the District had already made it an object of their attention; and it was believed that the most eligible plan of proceeding would be, to refer it to the standing committee, to whom could be proposed such views as might occur to practical and professional men, for the further improvement and perfection of the proposed system. He had presented these remarks for the purpose of making known, to those who might be disposed to avail themselves of the information, the course designed to be pursued by the committee, and to announce the willingness of the committee to act finally at the present session, if it should be found practicable to do so.

THE PUBLIC DEPOSITS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the removal of the deposits, and the resolutions thereon offered by Mr. CLAY.

THE VICE PRESIDENT took the occasion to remark, that all expressions of opinion, on the part of the spectators, concerning the matters in debate, were improper, and would, on no account, be tolerated. He adverted to what had taken place in the galleries during the last two or three days; by which the decorum due to the Senate had been violated; stated that the officers were instructed to do their duty, and that, in case of any repetition of the impropriety, effectual means would be resorted to for the purpose of suppressing it, by instantly clearing the galleries.

Mr. BENTON then rose, and said he would take leave, before he took up the subject under debate, to vindicate an officer of the Senate who had been unjustly assailed, and who had not the right of speaking for himself. He alluded to the Secretary of the Senate, [Mr. Lowrie,] and to the threat publicly expressed in open debate by a Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to move to expel him from his office if he should remove any of his clerks for their political opinions. The threat implied a knowledge or belief that the Secretary intended to make such removals; when, in point of fact, no such intention existed. The Secretary now had every clerk in his office who was in it when he came in many years ago. He was living in the utmost harmony with these clerks, and could not but feel himself deeply wounded by a threat, which raised an implication which had no manner of existence. Mr. B. said, that an acquaintance of fourteen years with the Secretary enabled him to say that he was incapable of the dishonorable conduct, attributed, by implication, to him; that he was a high exemplification of the character of a Christian and a gentleman, and would conscientiously discharge his duties to the Senate and his clerks, without the slightest regard to unmerited threats. Mr. B. also spoke of the animadversion which had been made at the same time, and for the same cause, upon an officer of another body, (the Clerk of the House of Representatives.) Mr. B. was a stranger to him, knew nothing of what he had done, had no opinions to give as to his conduct; but he would say, in vindication of the privileges of the House of Representatives, that the conduct of their clerk belonged to them, not to the Senate, and that it was unparliamentary for the Senate to take notice of it.

Mr. B. then proceeded to the order of the day, the resolutions submitted by a Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] on the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and asked for the reading of the resolutions.

The Secretary read them as follows:

"1. Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion; and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

"2. Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient."

Mr. B. said that the first of these resolutions contained impeachable matter, and was in fact, though not in form, a direct impeachment of the President of the United States. He recited the constitutional provision, that the President might be impeached—1st, for treason; 2d, for bribery; 3d, for high crimes; 4th, for misdemeanors; and said that the first resolution charged both a high crime and a misdemeanor upon the President: a high crime, in violating the laws and constitution, to obtain a power over the public treasure, to the danger of the liberties of the people; and a misdemeanor, in dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury from office. Mr. B. said that the terms of the resolution were sufficiently explicit to define a high crime, within the meaning of the constitution, without having recourse to the arguments and declarations used by the mover in illustration of his meaning; but, if any doubt remained on that head, it would be removed by the whole tenor of the argument, and especially that part of it which compared the President's conduct to that of Caesar, in seizing the public treasure, to aid him in putting an end to the liberties of his country; and every Senator, in voting upon it, would vote as directly upon the guilt or innocence of the President, as if he was responding to the question of guilty or not guilty, in the concluding scene of a formal impeachment.

We are, then, said Mr. B., trying an impeachment! But how? The constitution gives to the House of Representatives the sole power to originate impeachments; yet we originate this impeachment ourselves. The constitution gives the accused a right to be present; but he is not here. It requires the Senate to be sworn as judges; but we are not so sworn. It requires the Chief Justice of the United States to preside when the President is tried; but the Chief Justice is not presiding. It gives the House of Representatives a right to be present, and to manage the prosecution; but neither the House nor its managers are here. It requires the forms of criminal justice to be strictly observed; yet all these forms are neglected and violated. It is a proceeding in which the First Magistrate of the republic is to be tried without being heard, and in which his accusers are to act as his judges!

Mr. B. called upon the Senate to consider well what they did before they proceeded further in the consideration of this resolution. He called upon them to consider what was due to the House of Representatives, whose privilege was invaded, and who had a right to send a message to the Senate, complaining of the proceeding, and demanding its abandonment. He conjured them to consider what was due to the President, who was thus to be tried in his absence for a most enormous crime; what was due to the Senate itself, in thus combining the incompatible characters of accusers and judges, and which would itself be judged by Europe and America. He dwelt particularly on the figure which the Senate would make in going on with the consideration of this resolution. It accused the President of violating the constitution, and itself committed twenty violations of the same constitution in making the accusation! It accused him of violating a single law, and itself violated all the laws of criminal justice in prosecuting him for it. It charged him with designs dangerous to the liberties of the citizens, and immediately trampled upon the rights of all citizens, in the person of their Chief Magistrate.

Mr. B. descanted upon the extraordinary organization of the Senate, and drew an argument from it in favor of the reserve and decorum of their proceedings. The Senate were lawgivers, and ought to respect the laws already made; they were the constitutional advisers of the President, and should observe, as nearly as possible, the civil relations which the office of adviser presumes; they might be his judges, and should be the last in the world to stir up an accusation against him, to prejudge his guilt, or to attack his character with defamatory language. Decorum, the becoming ornament of every functionary, should be the distinguishing trait of an American Senator, who combines, in his own office, the united dignities of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial character. In his judicial capacity especially, he should sacrifice to decorum and propriety; and shun, as he would the contagious touch of sin and pestilence, the slightest approach to the character of prosecutor. He referred to British parliamentary law to show that the Lords could not join in an accusation, because they were to try it; but here the Senate was sole accuser, and had nothing from the House of Representatives to join; but made the accusation out and out, and tried it themselves. He said the accusation was a double one, for a high crime and a misdemeanor, and the latter a more flagrant proceeding than the former; for it assumed to know for what cause the President had dismissed his late Secretary, and undertook to try the President for a thing which was not triable or impeachable.

From the foundation of the Government, it had been settled that the President's right to dismiss his Secretaries resulted from his constitutional obligation to see that the laws were faithfully executed. Many Presidents had dismissed Secretaries, and this was the first time that the Senate had ever undertaken to found an impeachment upon it, or had assumed to know the reasons for which it was done.

Mr. B. said that two other impeachments seemed to be going on at the same time against two other officers, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Treasurer; so that the Senate was brimful of criminal business. The Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury were both civil officers, and were both liable to impeachment for misdemeanors in office; and great misdemeanors were charged upon them. They were, in fact, upon trial, without the formality of a resolution; and, if hereafter impeached by the House of Representatives, the Senate, if they believed what they heard, would be ready to pronounce judgment and remove them from office, without delay or further examination.

Mr. B. then addressed himself to the Vice President (Mr. VAN BUREN) upon the novelty of the scene which was going on before him, and the great change which had taken place since he served in the Senate. He commended the peculiar delicacy and decorum of the Vice President himself, who, in six years' service, in high party times, and in a decided opposition, never uttered a word, either in open or secret session, which could have wounded the feelings of a political adversary, if he had been present and heard it. He extolled the decorum of the opposition to President Adams's administration. If there was one brilliant exception, the error was redeemed by classic wit, and the heroic readiness with which a noble heart bared its bosom to the bullets of those who felt aggrieved. Still addressing himself to the Vice President, Mr. B. said that if he should receive some hits in the place where he sat, without the right to reply, he must find consolation in the case of his most illustrious predecessor, the great apostle of American liberty, [Mr. Jefferson,] who often told his friends of the manner in which he had been cut at when presiding over the Senate, and personally annoyed by the inferior—no, young and inconsiderate—members of the federal party.

Mr. B. returned to the point in debate. The President, he repeated, was on trial for a high crime, in seizing the public treasure in violation of the laws and the constitution. Was the charge true? Does the act which he has done deserve the definition which has been put upon it? He had made up his own mind that the public deposits ought to be removed from the Bank of the United States. He communicated that opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary refused to remove them; the President removed him, and appointed a Secretary who gave the order which he thought the occasion required. All this he did in virtue of his constitutional obligation to see the laws faithfully executed; and in obedience to the same sense of duty which would lead him to dismiss a Secretary of War, or of the Navy, who would refuse to give an order for troops to march, or a fleet to sail. True, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to direct the removal of the deposits; but the constitution makes it the duty of the President to see that the Secretary performs his duty; and the constitution is as much above law as the President is above the Secretary.

The President is on trial for a misdemeanor—for dismissing his Secretary without sufficient cause. To this accusation there are ready answers: first, that the President may dismiss his Secretaries without cause; secondly, that the Senate has no cognizance of the case; thirdly, that the Senate cannot assume to know for what cause the Secretary in question was dismissed.

The Secretary of the Treasury is on trial. In order to get at the President, it was found necessary to get at a gentleman who had no voice on this floor. It had been found necessary to assail the Secretary of the Treasury in a manner heretofore unexampled in the history of the Senate. His religion, his politics, his veracity, his understanding, his Missouri restriction vote, had all been arraigned. Mr. B. said he would leave his religion to the constitution of the United States, Catholic as he was, and although "the Presbyterian might cut off his head the first time he went to mass." His understanding he would leave to himself. The head which could throw the paper which was taken for a stone on this floor; but which was, in fact, a double-headed chain shot fired from a forty-eight pounder, carrying sails, masts, rigging, all before it, was a head that could take care of itself. His veracity would be adjourned to the trial which was to take place for misquoting a letter of Secretary Crawford, and he had no doubt would end as the charge did for suppressing a letter which was printed in extenso among our documents, and withholding the name and compensation of an agent, when that name and the fact of no compensation was lying on the table. The Secretary of the Treasury was arraigned for some incidental vote on the Missouri restriction, when he was a member of the Maryland Legislature. Mr. B. did not know what that vote was; but he did know that a certain gentleman, who lately stood in the relation of sergeant to another gentleman, in a certain high election, was the leader of the forces which deforced Missouri of her place in the Union for the entire session which he first attended (not served) in the Congress of the United States. His politics could not be severely tried in the time of the alien and sedition law, when he was scarce of age, but were well tried during the late war, when he sided with his country, and received the constant denunciations of that great organ of federalism—the Federal Republican newspaper. For the rest, Mr. B. admitted that the Secretary had voted for the elder Adams to be President of the United States; but denied the right of certain persons to make that an objection to him. Mr. B. dismissed these personal charges for the present, and would adjourn their consideration until his trial came on, for which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] stood pledged; and after the trial was over, he had no doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury, although a Catholic and a federalist, would be found to maintain his station in the first rank of American gentlemen and American patriots.

JAN. 2, 1834.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

Mr. B. took up the serious charges against the Secretary, that of being the mere instrument of the President in removing the depositories, and violating the constitution and laws of the land. How far he was this mere instrument, making up his mind in three days to do what others would not do at all, might be judged by every person who would refer to the opposition papers for the division in the cabinet about the removal of the depositories, and which constantly classed Mr. Taney, then the Attorney General, on the side of removal. This classification was correct, and notorious, and ought to exempt an honorable man, if any thing could exempt him, from the imputation of being a mere instrument in a great transaction of which he was a prime counsellor. The fact is, he had long since, in his character of legal adviser to the President, advised the removal of these depositories; and, when suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to take the office which would make it his duty to act upon his own advice, he accepted it from the single sense of honor and duty, and that he might not seem to desert the President in flinching from the performance of what he had recommended. His personal honor was clean; his personal conduct magnanimous; his official deeds would abide the test of law and truth.

Mr. B. said he would make short work of long accusations, and demolish in three minutes what had been concocting for three months, and delivering for three days in the Senate. He would call the attention of the Senate to certain clauses of law, and certain treasury instructions, which had been left out of view, but which were decisive of the accusation against the Secretary. The first was the clause in the bank charter which invested the Secretary with the power of transferring the public funds from place to place. It was the 15th section of the charter; he would read it. It enacted that whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the bank should give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, or territories thereof; and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, &c.

Here is authority to the Secretary to transfer the public moneys from place to place, limited only by the bounds of the United States and its territories; and this clause of three lines of law puts to flight all the nonsense about the United States Bank being the treasury, and the Treasurer being the keeper of the public moneys, with which some politicians and newspaper writers have been worrying their brains for the last three months. In virtue of this clause, the Secretary of the Treasury gave certain transfer drafts to the amount of two millions and a quarter; and his legal right to give the draft was just as clear, under this clause of the bank charter, as his right to remove the depositories was under another clause of it. The transfer is made by draft; a payment out of the treasury is made upon a warrant; and the difference between a transfer draft and a treasury warrant was a thing necessary to be known by every man who aspired to the illuminating of a nation, or even to the understanding of himself. To make this clear, Mr. B. read extracts from the treasury instructions to banks of deposit in 1829, and from certain letters from the Treasurer of the United States to the cashier of the Bank of the United States in the month of November last, which would justify the issue of the transfer drafts, and quiet the alarms of all those who thought the Treasurer had forfeited the penalty of his bond, and the Secretary had violated the clause of the constitution which forbids money to be drawn from the treasury except upon warrants and under appropriation laws. They would show that the transfer drafts were not warrants; that they drew nothing from the treasury, but made a treasury in every place into which they carried money, within the limits of the United States or its territories, whether there was a branch of the United States Bank there or not.

Extract of a circular instruction to the banks employed as depositories of the public moneys, dated

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
May 28, 1829.

"All public moneys received on or subsequently to the 1st of June will be placed to the credit of Mr. Campbell, as Treasurer. They will be drawn for by him in the following manner, and no other:

"1st. The Secretary of the Treasury will issue his warrant upon the Treasurer, directing the payment, which warrant will be countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury, and recorded by the Register, who will authenticate the record by his signature; and upon a suitable part of the warrant the Treasurer will give his order directed to the proper bank for the payment of the money.

"2d. When transfers are to be made of the public funds from one bank to another, the Treasurer will issue a transfer draft upon the bank in which the funds may be at his credit, in favor of the bank to which they are transferred, for the amount required, stating that it is to be placed to his credit in such bank. This draft will be recorded by the Register, who will authenticate the record by his signature upon the draft; and it will finally receive the written sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"No deduction whatever is to be made from the moneys placed to the credit of the Treasurer, except in these two modes."

Extract of a letter from the Treasurer of the United States to the cashier of the Bank of the United States, dated 25th November, 1833.

"The charter of the Bank of the United States has given to the Secretary of the Treasury the sole power of ordering transfers of the public funds from place to place, for the convenience of the public service; and he, of course, must judge of their necessity and legality. It would, therefore, be out of place in me to offer any observations as to the character of the drafts to which some allusion has been made. He is responsible to the nation for the proper exercise of this power, and of course cannot be controlled in it by any officer in the treasury, or of the bank, as I conceive. The charter of the bank provides 'that, whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place within the United States or the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors.' The form in which this power, thus confided to the Secretary, is to be carried into effect, he has prescribed in his instructions to the bank of May 28th, 1829, which were accordingly communicated to all the banks in which there were public funds. These instructions are as follows:

"When transfers are to be made of public funds from one bank to another, the Treasurer will issue a transfer draft upon the bank in which the funds may be at his credit, in favor of the bank to which they are to be transferred, for the amount required, stating that it is to be placed to his credit in such bank. This draft will be recorded by the Register, who will authenticate the record by his signature upon the draft, and it will finally receive the written sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

"The transfer draft, signed by the Treasurer, Register, and Secretary, in pursuance of these instructions, is the form prescribed by the Secretary for carrying into effect the power confided to his discretion of ordering transfers of the public funds from place to place. It was adopted to give authenticity to the order, and to enable the Treasurer to render an accurate account of the state of the public funds in the bank and its branches, and not in consequence of his having any discretion or control over the subject. He has, therefore, rigidly and strictly conformed to all the instructions given by the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject; and whenever he shall direct that notices of transfer drafts, as well as of warrants, shall be transmitted to the banks by this office, those instructions shall, with great pleasure, be complied with on my part; but, until such instructions are given, the practice of this office will be continued as heretofore.

"When disbursements of money are to be made out of the treasury, the law has pointed out the duties of the Treasurer. Such disbursements are to be made alone upon the warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded and authenticated by the signature of the Register. And, by the regulations of the treasury of the 28th of May, 1829, which were also communicated to all the banks in which there were public deposits, the Treasurer is required to write his order for the payment of the money upon the warrant; and, by another regulation, the Treasurer is required to transmit to the bank a daily list of the warrants thus directed during the day to the bank for payment. These regulations have been, and will continue to be, uniformly complied with."

After reading these extracts, Mr. B. took a position, and defied all attacks to dialogue him from it. It was this: That a warrant for the payment of money out of the treasury must, in addition to other requisites, be countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury; and the bank is forbidden to pay, and pays at its peril, any warrant not so countersigned. The transfer draft is not so countersigned; the Comptroller does not so countersign it; yet the Bank of the United States paid these drafts, to the amount of two millions and a quarter, without the countersigning of the Comptroller, and, in so doing, admitted that the money was not drawn out of the treasury. This was conclusive, and put the Bank of the United States in the position of contradicting itself, and contradicting all its advocates, in the assumption that the bank is the treasury.

Mr. B. took a further view of what he called the new fangled conception that the Bank of the United States was the treasury of the United States. It followed, from that doctrine, that where there was no branch of the United States Bank there could be no treasury, and no public moneys. Now, six or eight States of this Union had no branch; the three Territories had none; by consequence, no public money could be sent to those States and Territories. Again: the Bank of the United States was not obliged to establish a branch in a single State, only in the District of Columbia; so that, if she withdraw her branches, no public money could be kept except in Philadelphia and Washington. He traced the origin of this assumption, that the bank was the treasury, to the great measure introduced by President Jackson in the first year of his administration for the protection of the treasury, which was, that the treasury warrant should be filed in the bank which paid the money. Before that time, the Treasurer issued his check on the bank for the money, and it was paid on his single check; since then, three other names must go to the bank with his; to wit: that of the Comptroller, that of the Register, and that of the Secretary of the Treasury; and this formed the true defence and security of the treasury. The Treasurer's bond for $150,000 was nothing to a man who would check for thirty millions in a year. President Jackson, in the first months of his administration, supplying the deficiencies of all his predecessors, applied the true remedy; Secretary Ingham wrote the circular; he (Mr. B.) had read extracts from it; it did high honor to the new administration. It put the treasury beyond the reach of being injured by any Treasurer. The Treasurer's check could not now draw one dollar without three other names upon it, and the filing of the warrant under the seal of the treasury. The bank is now to see the warrant, and to hold it; and because this warrant was formerly retained by the Treasurer, the bank thinks itself the treasury, because for six years it has had the treasury warrants, instead of the Treasurer's check. Mr. B. here commented upon the strangeness of fortune that President Jackson, who was the only President who had devised a true and impregnable safeguard for the treasury, should be charged with seizing it, and his conduct compared to that of Caesar in pillaging the gold which Pompey, the Consul, and the Senate, were silly enough to leave behind in the temple of Jupiter when they fled from Rome.

Mr. B. held that the Secretary of the Treasury was now acquitted; that the Treasurer himself was freed from the penalties of the act of 1789; that both were found to be borne out by law; and he regretted that these officers had not had an opportunity of showing to their accusers and judges the difference between a treasury warrant, and a transfer draft, before sentence of condemnation had been passed upon them for mere defect of that knowledge.

Mr. B. proceeded to the second of the resolutions; and, to avoid all questions about order, he took leave to give notice that he should, at the proper time, move an amendment to that resolution, namely, to strike it all out, and to substitute another of a different import.

He considered this second resolution to be illegal, futile, and nugatory. Illegal, because it assumed an appellate jurisdiction over the act of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a case in which no right of appeal had been reserved to the two Houses of Congress in their joint legislative capacity, much less to the Senate alone. The act of the Secretary is definitive. His report to Congress is for their information, not for their revision. The condemnation of his reasons by either, or both Houses of Congress, cannot restore the deposits, or alter their destination. It will require a law, or a joint resolution, to do that.

The resolution was illegal, in assuming a jurisdiction over a subject of which the Senate had no cognizance. It was a single resolution, and could not legally be communicated to the House of Representatives. It was futile and nugatory, in leading to no action or practical result. It declared a naked proposition, but indicated no consequence resulting from it. It declared the Secretary's reasons to be insufficient and unsatisfactory; but did not say what was to be done with the Secretary, or with the deposits, if the Senate found them to be so. He would still remain Secretary, and the public moneys would still remain removed, whether the resolution was passed or rejected by the Senate. The mover seemed to foresee this objection, and to understand the unparliamentary character of his resolution, when he alluded to the effect which its adoption might have upon the public mind. He (Mr. B.) denied that the Senate was the place to adopt barren resolutions for popular effect. He doubted the propriety of the trial, and the success of the experiment. He remembered a case in which the Senate's condemnation had been the highest passport to public favor; and it might be that a vote on this resolution in favor of the bank might be equally unprofitable to the Senate which gave it, and to the bank which received it.

[Here Mr. B. yielded the floor, and the Senate adjourned.]

On Friday, January 3, Mr. B. continued.

Mr. B. said, that, having got rid of the outworks which impeded his progress, he would arrive at the main point, and take up the subject which was more immediately before the Senate. For the sake of avoiding questions about order, he would give notice that he should submit, at the proper time, a motion in amendment of the second resolution under discussion, which amendment should be strictly appropriate, and naturally flowing from the course of the argument he should follow. And first, he would take leave to read a paper replete with facts and sentiments applicable to the present attitude of the Bank of the United States and the Government of the United States, though written thirty years ago, and a reference to which he should have frequent occasion to make. It was part of a letter from the great apostle of American liberty [Mr. Jefferson] to Albert Gallatin.

[Mr. KANE, at the request of Mr. B., read the paper.]

"This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and the form of our constitution. The nation is at this time so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment; but suppose a series of untoward events to occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a republican Government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unshingle the confidence of the people in the public functionaries, an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command, and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the Government. I deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation or its regular functionaries. What an obstruction could not this Bank of the United States, with all its branches, be in time of war! It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aids. Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile, we know, first, from a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of directors in every bank, principal or branch, and those of most of the stockholders; secondly, from their opposition to the measures and principles of the Government, and to the election of those friendly to them; and, thirdly, from the sentiments of the newspapers they support. Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our constitution, to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing only with other banks as to the favors of the Government." [That is, as to public deposits.]—Jefferson's letter to Gallatin, 1803.

This brief extract, Mr. B. said, soared above party politics, and averred the Bank of the United States to be hostile to the principles and to the form of our constitution; an assertion which would be proved to be true in the course of this debate. It recommended the people of the United States, while they were strong, to provide for the safety of their constitution, and to bring the great enemy of their liberty under subordination to the laws, and to do it by depriving him of the public deposits, and thus reducing him to a level with State banks.

He would now take up one of the reasons for removing the deposits, which had become infinitely stronger since, for not restoring them. It was the expansion and contraction of currency. This was the vice of all banks, especially powerful ones, such as the Bank of England and that of the United States. To make fortunes for individuals connected with the bank—to favor gamblers in the stocks—was generally the object of these expansions and contractions; but political ends were sometimes the main object, and the acquisition of fortunes a secondary and subaltern one. Once, in a certain number of years, the cycle for these operations came on in England, and was always attended with the making and breaking of many fortunes.

The last operation of the kind in England was performed in 1824-5, and Mr. Baring, who gave an account of it in the British House of Commons, described the effect to be such, that many millions changed hands, and men who, in a regular train of business, could have wound up with a clear estate of two hundred thousand pounds sterling, were left paupers on the hands of the parish. It was done by pouring out a flood of paper, lending money to every body, then calling all in, and lending money to nobody but the favorites of the bank. This operation, Mr. B. said, had been three times performed in the United States by the present bank: first, in 1818-9, from mercenary motives, to gamble in the stocks, and riot on the distresses of the country, and to make fortunes for the directors and their friends; once, in 1831-2, to effect a political object, when nearly thirty millions of loans were made in a few months, and suddenly called for at the appearance of the bank veto message; but the happy termination of the presidential election stopped the progress of the contraction, and gave the community time to breathe. The removal of the deposits was the next great occasion; and, for the contraction and pressure at that time the bank began to prepare as soon as it was ascertained that the removal would be made. This was early in the last summer. Many circumstances, growing out of the state of the country, and the legislation of Congress, favored the operation. The shortened credits on the revenue bonds was about to take effect; the cash payments on a part of the imports came into play at the same time. A great accumulation of revenue on hand, which made large balances against other banks, in whose notes much of it was paid. All this made of themselves an unusually large demand for money in the commercial cities towards the close of the year. The bank took advantage of these circumstances to make her contraction the more violent upon the community. They prepared for it in secret for several months beforehand. The first great measure was to accumulate bills of exchange in the Atlantic cities, payable at a brief date, and all falling due about the same time. For this purpose a resolution was passed applicable to the "five western branches," as they were called, of the most insulting, degrading, and injurious nature. They were forbidden to purchase bills of exchange, except payable in one of the Atlantic cities, and with not more than ninety days to run. This extraordinary fact and extraordinary resolution was communicated to Congress in the report of the Government directors, which had been printed, and was now a part of our documents. It would be found at page 21 of the original report. Mr. B. called upon any member who stood in a relation to know the secrets of the bank to account for this extraordinary resolution, which prevented the western banks from dealing in exchange with one another, or giving any citizen a bill in one branch for his money at the place where another was, or taking from an exporter of western produce, or a drover, a bill payable in New Orleans or Charleston. He wished to hear a reason; to him the object stood revealed—it was to make a great accumulation of these bills in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, towards the close of the year, and thus to increase the demand among the merchants for money in those places, at the very moment that the bank intended to deny them all aid, and was to press them for former debts. The next great act of preparation on the part of the bank was incredible and diabolical—it was to dishonor its distant branch bank notes at that time, and thus render as unavailable as possible the masses of those notes which might be on hand.

Mr. B. regretted that he had to allude to this act without the proofs in hand. They had been called for, and furnished, and were now in the hands of the printer, and would be used by him on a future occasion; and he trusted that a proceeding would be had which would put the bank before a tribunal where the history of this incredible transaction would be brought to light. He alluded to a scire facias for the violation of the charter. He said that the notes of the branches had been dishonored at New York, at Baltimore, and at Mobile, about the same time; and that time, in the crisis of this contraction, and with such similarity of circumstances, as to announce that all was done with the connivance, if not with the orders, of the Bank of the United States. He denied that there was any possible assignable reason for dishonoring the distant branch notes at this time. The bank was full of specie, five millions more than it had in 1832, at which time it considered about six millions to be enough, and the president of the bank treated as a mere surplus about five millions, which had been parted with in a few months, the greater part being sold to France and England. Yet they were refused for near a week in New York, till the cashier of the branch could first write, and then fly, in person, to the mother bank, to get leave to receive them, perhaps about fifty thousand dollars; refused the same way in Baltimore, until a like communication could be had with the mother bank; and refused absolutely, and without explanation, at the bank in Mobile, which was too distant to communicate with the mother bank. Mr. B. said that he stated these facts from a mere sight of the letters which proved them; the proof would be before the Senate soon, and he should endeavor to fix public attention upon a transaction which he might qualify as diabolical and infernal. The result of the whole was, that, when all these circumstances growing out of the state of the country had made an unusual demand for money, when the bank had increased that demand by an extraordinary accumulation of bills of exchange, the contraction was commenced at the rate of several millions a month, including the bills at ninety days, and at the moment their own distant bank notes would have become unavailable in the hands of the holders, if it had not been for the energy of the Secretary of the Treasury, who coerced the payment of the branch notes, by those celebrated transfer drafts, for about two millions and a quarter, the view of which, and the fear of more to follow, compelled the Bank of the United States to relax her policy, permit her branch notes to be received as usual, and thus saved the community from the shock of an unconvertible currency.

Mr. B. had, he said, already demonstrated that the present pressure in the money market was not only unnecessary, but wanton. He would now proceed to prove that the curtailment, so reprehensible in itself, was conducted in a manner which was illegal, and violated the charter of the bank; and, in the next place, he would prove that the curtailment was unequal and partial in its character and operation. He hoped that he fully felt the responsibility which he undertook in making charges against any individuals, or bodies corporate, out of this House; and it was from the thorough conviction that what he asserted could be proved, that he was induced to bring forward these charges; and, moreover, it was his intention to give the United States Bank a fair and full opportunity to vindicate itself from the charges, if they were unfounded.

First, the mode of curtailment was illegal. He repeated the words of the charter, stating that the business of the bank could not be transacted by less than seven directors, one of whom should be the president. These being the words, he held that the curtailment of twelve millions in five months was a portion of that business which could be legally transacted only by a board of directors. Now, sir, here is a paper that has come before us as a public document, and may be taken as evidence of the truth of what it contains till it is contradicted. [Mr. B. then read from the memorial of the Government directors a paragraph, and then said:]

This, sir, shows that the curtailment was not made by the board of directors, nor even by a committee appointed by the board, but by the president. Yes, sir, this enormous pressure, which was to bear upon the whole community, was the work of one single individual. It appears that the removal of the deposits being supposed to be probable, the bank began to take steps to meet it, as early as May or June, by curtailing its business.

The Government directors give us an account, in a narrative of several pages, of the steps taken to get at the reduction to be made. He read, first, an order of the board, in May, directing a committee to report a plan of curtailment; and remarked, so far, so good. That resolution he held to be a wise one, but that was by the board, and was legal. He read the resolution of the 13th of August, and the whole history of the curtailment, from the report of the Government directors.

"Resolved, That, for the present, and until the further order of the board, the amount of bills discounted shall not be increased at the bank and the several offices. That the bills of exchange purchased at the bank, and all the offices, except the five western offices, shall not have more than ninety days to run. That the five western offices be instructed to purchase no bills of exchange, except those payable in the Atlantic cities, not having more than ninety days to run, or those which may be received in payment of existing debts to the bank and the offices, and then not having more than four months to run.

"We perceived at once, in this measure, the commencement of a system of reduction, in conducting which wisely and impartially the welfare of the whole community was involved. No notice of these resolutions had been given; and therefore, while we concurred, as we stated, in the propriety and expediency of reducing the business of the institution, we required that the plan should be carefully weighed, so as to bear equally on all parts of the country, and all the debtors to the bank. We desired also to have the result of the views and inquiries of the committee already appointed. With these objects we asked that the resolution might be postponed for one week, or even until the next meeting, it being understood that the subject should be then definitively acted upon. Our request was refused. The resolutions were passed at once, and, as usual, by the votes of all present, except one other director and ourselves. Believing that this measure was not only precipitate, but partial, and that it would lead to curtailments unequal and oppressive, and entertaining the opinion that a system might easily be formed on a just basis, we offered the following resolution:

"Whereas, a resolution was adopted, on the 7th of May last, instructing the committee on the state of the bank to report to the board a scale of reduction in the business of the institution, and no report has been made in pursuance thereof: And whereas, a resolution, passed at the last meeting, which places certain restrictions on the business of the institution, confines the same to five of the western offices:

"Resolved, That the committee on the state of the bank be instructed to report to the board, at as early a day as possible, a system for the gradual reduction of the business of the institution, throughout all sections of the country, having regard to the interest of the stockholders, the debtors of the bank, and the community in general.

"This plan, which would have prevented an oppressive and partial system of curtailment, confined to particular portions of the country, and exerted at particular times; which would have given to the subject full and fair consideration; and which, above all, would have enabled every member of the board to exercise his deliberate judgment, was, as usual, rejected. Nor was this all; when we offered the resolution, temperately expressed as it is, the president himself asked the question of consideration upon it, though no motion to that effect had been made—a course never before adopted in the board, nor sanctioned by the by-laws, and evidently introduced to curtail more effectually, if possible, the very limited interference in the affairs of the institution which was still allowed to the public directors. On this suggestion of the president, the majority refused even to consider our resolution, by the vote of all present, except one director and ourselves. This plan was persisted in, and subsequently carried still further. A series of resolutions were adopted for reducing the business of the institution, and authority was given to the committee on the offices, which is appointed by the president alone, to modify them in such a manner as they should deem expedient; and eventually that committee was authorized to direct such measures for the general reduction of the business of the bank as they should think best. We offered, as an amendment to the resolution giving to a committee this extraordinary power, a request that 'they should report to the board such measures as they directed.' This request was rejected by the usual vote. It is, of course, impossible for us to know by what principles of policy the committee have been governed. Its proceedings are secret, and we can only ascertain, at intervals, some of the results to which they lead. We attribute to them the excessive curtailment in the business of the institution, which has lately been so sudden and oppressive, and which was not necessary either to the extent to which it has been carried, or in the manner in which it has been made to bear on the community. With these sentiments, and in the hope that the board itself might be induced, at a time like this, to interpose and to exercise for the welfare of the community some portion at least of that unlimited power it had intrusted to the committee, we lately offered the following resolution:

"Whereas, the pressure on the commercial community at this time may be removed by a liberal spirit of accommodation on the part of the banks generally; and whereas the State banks complain that, in consequence of the balances being largely in favor of the Bank of the United States, they are unable to afford the necessary facilities to their customers, without subjecting themselves to increased demands from this bank; and whereas it is believed that, were the banks in this district to extend their loans twenty per cent. beyond the income for a period of thirty days, it would relieve the money market, restore confidence, and have a salutary effect on the industry and enterprise of our citizens; therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, to confer with similar committees that may be appointed by the other banks, for the purpose of uniting in some arrangement to carry into effect the object of the foregoing preamble; and that the cashier be requested to send copies of the above to the presidents and directors of the other banks, with a request that their determination on the subject may be communicated as early as practicable.

"This resolution, the effect of which would have been to produce a concert of action among the banks, for the relief of the mercantile community, at a period of difficulty, and to display on the part of the Bank of the United States a determination to afford it, which could not have been unsuccessful, the board refused even to consider; it was rejected in the usual summary manner; and the whole subject remains, as before, in the power of the committee on the offices.

"It will thus be seen that while the unlimited authority of the president to expend the funds of the bank had been deliberately confirmed, and while the committee on exchange, selected and appointed by him, had been officially permitted to discount notes and carry on the proper business of the board; now, in addition to all this, the measures of the institution, in the regulation of its vast business, at this most important crisis, were intrusted to the committee on the offices, also selected and appointed by the president, accompanied by an explicit refusal to require them to report any of their acts to the board."

Mr. B. continued: It was not to a breach of the by-laws that he alluded as a breach of the charter. This high function of the board was delegated to a committee. This was equivalent to a delegation by Congress to one of its committees of that legislative power which the constitution vests in the two Houses of Congress.

Here an authority is given to a committee to make an enormous reduction; an authority, too, unlimited by the terms of the resolution which bestows it. The whole power of the board is surrendered to a subaltern board. Sir, said Mr. B., I denounce it as an atrocious violation of the charter of the bank. He hoped the question would be brought for decision before some tribunal competent to try the law and the facts, whether this was a violation of the charter and a forfeiture of it.

Does the Senate hear me? exclaimed Mr. B. Lest there was a single individual whose ears had not caught the words, he would read them again. He read, and exclaimed: The five Government directors appointed by the President and Senate of the United States, to represent seven millions of public stock, and to act as guardians over a great amount of public deposits, were left in the dark as to the immense business which might be transacted by a committee, left to find out what was done, like mere strangers to the board! One of these resolutions was, that the Bank of the United States should act in concert with the city banks in the adoption of measures for the relief of the money market. In what manner was it received by this imperious board? They would not even consider it! They did not consider, and then reject it; but they refused to consider it. They left their course to its results; be the effect on the community whatever it might.

I here rest, said Mr. B., the charge which I have made—no, sir, I cannot be considered as having made it; but the charge which I have brought out of the document which both Houses have ordered to be printed, as a public document—against the bank for having violated and forfeited its charter in the mode of curtailment which it has carried on. One branch of the charges was, that the mode of curtailment was illegal; the other was, that it was unequal and partial; and it was now for him to prove the assertion. He would have recourse to the same report of the Government directors, (page 14.) Two facts only, out of a number, he would bring before the Senate, which would show the favoritism and inequality of this curtailment. On the 16th of August, we find the extent of the authority assumed—one hundred thousand dollars was loaned to one individual.

"On the 16th of August we perceived a striking instance of the extent of authority they assumed. We observed that, a week before, a single loan of no less than $100,000 was made by the committee to one person, without any authority from the board, although it had been in session that very day; although the proposition for the loan must have been made before the meeting of the board, for it was submitted to the committee by its chairman immediately on the adjournment; and although the board had, on the same day, refused good mercantile paper. When we made inquiry, we ascertained that the loan was not in fact done for the person whose name was entered on the books, but for a bank of which he was a director, and on account of a large debt then due from it to the Bank of the United States, the regular payment of which was thus postponed. We cannot doubt that the board would have refused this proposal, had it been submitted to them; but, however that might have been, the assumption of such a power, exercised in such a manner by the committee, is not to be sanctioned, unless the other members of the board have become utterly useless."

Although the board had the same day refused the paper of good men, merchants in the city, on the 12th day of August, when the curtailment was in full operation, the exchange committee, without the authority of the board, discounted one hundred thousand dollars to an individual, and refused the business paper of mercantile men, though well endorsed. He held that it was an improper partiality, at the very moment when the screws were turning on the merchants of Philadelphia, to make such a loan to an individual. Who was that individual? He figures at the head of a memorial praying for the restoration of the deposits. He was one of those who were busy in getting up public meetings, and fac simile memorials in favor of the restoration of the deposites, which were to be repeated, in showers, from every part of the country, like the the memorials which, two years ago, we had in favor of the renewal of the charter. Could any thing be a more remarkable evidence of favoritism and partiality, than this screwing of one part of the community with one hand, and, with the other, pouring out favors upon those who were to aid the bank in getting up excitements, and sending memorials to Congress?

Mr. B. read again:

"Another instance was lately exhibited of the injustice arising from this unlimited and irresponsible power of the committee on exchange. The policy adopted by the board has caused curtailments in the loans to the community to a great extent. These ought at least to be general in their operation. Yet on a loan for a very large sum, secured on stock, being offered for renewal on the 8th of November, all reduction was refused, on the ground that it had been originally made by the committee on exchange, some years before, for an indefinite period, and that the faith of the bank was, therefore, pledged for its continuance. These resolutions, passed three years since, at a time when there was great abundance of money, 'authorized the committee on exchange to loan large sums on approved collateral securities.' Assuming, by virtue of these, a power which we believe the board never intended to confer, they have thus entered, it seems, into contracts which will extend to the termination of the charter, if not beyond it. These contracts, too, so far as we can learn, were not reduced to writing; in fact, the notes themselves were drawn at the usual short periods. It is now at least apparent that these proceedings were at variance with the true policy of the institution, and that they operated unequally on the community, whose interests ought to be impartially consulted."

The name of this individual was not given; but there were circumstances which would enable him (Mr. B.) to identify him. The committee, appointed two years ago, to investigate the affairs of the bank, reported that a loan of eleven hundred thousand dollars was made at one time to a broker, who was a relative of the president of the bank; a loan, too, for an indefinite term of years, and at five per cent. interest. This, sir, was the loan on which no reduction was to be made; a loan standing at five per cent., when the merchants were driven to the brokers for money at exorbitant premiums, to maintain their credit. There was an entire class of debtors to the bank, who were not subjected at all to the curtailment; but they were politicians and friends, and men who were busy in getting up meetings, for the purpose of producing that instantaneous action which was to restore the deposites to the bank, without any examination into the truth of the charges made against it.

I trust, Mr. President, (continued Mr. B.,) that I have now made out the case of illegality, partiality, favoritism, and violation of the charter, upon the testimony of a document which would stand before us, and before the American people, as true, until it should be disproved. He would not go further into the instances of favoritism: they were abundant, but time forbade the detail.

He wished now to say a word of the meetings every where getting up to influence Congress on the subject of the deposites—to coerce their "instantaneous restoration." He had observed that merchants were often engaged in these meetings. Allow me to say, sir, that my historical reading, and my professional studies, have led me to entertain an exalted opinion, and high respect for merchants as a body. He need not go back to the middle ages, when merchants were the founders of States, and raised the free cities of Italy to a level with kingdoms and empires. He would refer to the merchants of England and America, who had a potential voice with statesmen in all matters of finance and commerce. The opinions of such men, whenever expressed, would command from him respect and deference; but to maintain their right to that respect and deference, they must express the opinions of merchants, and not of political partisans. Their meetings must be those of merchants, in which they speak and act for themselves, and not the meetings of lawyers and politicians, in which the merchants made no figure. In such meetings the voice coming from merchants was lost; it was their own fault, for merging their own high character in that of faction. The heat and passion of a political meeting was not their theatre, when they wished to enlighten the councils of the nation in matters of finance and commerce; and they must not think it amiss if they shared the fate of their company, and saw their opinions no better treated than those of lawyers and partisan politicians. Mr. B. then descanted, with some keenness, upon the fac simile meetings which were getting up all over the United States, and adopting resolutions bearing the impress of the same mint, to coerce Congress into "immediate action." He treated the motives of such meetings with considerable levity; made some cuts at lawyers and politicians who could decide all the points connected with the immense question of removing and restoring the public deposites, without evidence, without facts, without hearing but a small piece of one side of the question, and then put forth their resolves to govern the opinion of the country. He said he should not pay much regard to such sudden verdicts, although they might be communicated by a procession of gownmen, who should make a circuit round the city, like the soldiers of Joshua round the walls of Jericho, and deliver their resolves in a blast of rams' horns loud enough to blow down the walls of the Capitol.

The pressure in the money market, Mr. B. said, was a prevailing topic in all these resolutions and memorials sent to Congress; but the framers of those resolutions had no access to the great facts which showed the conduct of the bank in creating that pressure. They knew nothing of the order of restriction upon the western branches; the concerted accumulation of bills of exchange in the Atlantic cities; the extension of new loans to old favorites; the refusal to curtail friends, relations, and politicians; the immense amount of specie—five millions more than the president of the bank deemed a sufficiency two years ago; and, above all, they knew nothing of the secret order, or connivance, from the bank to its principal branches, to refuse to receive the notes of their distant sister branches; and that the transfer drafts, against which so much denunciation was directed, were the sole cause of compelling the bank to honor its own branch paper, and were put into the hands of the deposit banks for the sole purpose of being used, upon condition that the institution should refuse its branch paper, or wantonly oppress the community by unnecessary curtailments. Men acting in ignorance of all these things, said Mr. B., must not be astonished if those who do know them should attach but little weight to their elaborate resolutions.

A great issue, said Mr. B., is made up, and between great parties, and greatly affecting the property and liberty of the American people. It is an issue of fact. It is, whether the Bank of the United States has unnecessarily curtailed its debts, and oppressed the community, and used its immense power over the money market to promote its own objects at the present time. The issue itself is a great one; the parties to it are eminent; they are the Government directors of the bank, who affirm it; the Secretary of the Treasury, who assigns it in his report on the removal of the deposites; and the President of the United States, who solemnly communicates the fact in his annual message; these are the parties on one side: on the other stand the majority of the directors of the bank, denying the whole. The Senate has assumed to try this great issue; and how will they try it? By entering the arena, for and against the bank? By pleading like lawyers, and testifying as witnesses, and deciding as judges? Will they become compurgators for the bank? Will they enter the lists as champions, and that in a case in which the laws of chivalry do not admit of a champion; for the bank is neither a woman nor a priest? Will they convert the Senate into a bear garden, give and take contradictions, have a dog fight for the entertainment of the galleries, and acquit the bank by dint of numbers, without examination, and without trial?

Mr. B. held it to be impossible that the Senate of the United States could go on in this way, but that they were bound to proceed in the most solemn manner known to the history of parliamentary proceedings, namely, an examination of the president of the bank, and all other material witnesses, at the bar of the Senate. This, he said, was the course followed in England in similar conjunctures. It was done in the famous case of the South Sea directors; it was the proper course in all great national emergencies. It was the only way to obtain a public trial, such as the genius of our constitution delights in. Committees sat in secret; the public did not see how the committees acted. An examination at the bar of the Senate would be an open and public procedure. The people could judge as to the fairness and fulness of the trial; for he held it to be a part of the essence of all trials, in free countries, that the court should be open, that the people might judge the judges, while they judged the accused. Nothing less gave confidence to the results of trials, or better supported the tribunals in righteous judgments. This case, above all others, demanded such a public trial. The gravity and enormity of the accusation, the dignity of the parties making it, the high trust of the parties denying it, the elevation of the tribunal before which it was made, and the deep interest to their property and liberty, which involved the whole body of the American people in the most anxious suspense for a just and impartial decision. To the directors of the bank themselves, it should be the most desirable mode of proceeding. They should even demand it as a right. It will give them a voice on this floor. It will enable them to confront their accusers. It will give them such a trial as American citizens, free, and proud of their freedom, should aspire to have—open, public, fair; the Senate for judges, the American people for spectators and audience, and ultimate judges over all concerned. At the proper time, therefore, he (Mr. B.) should move to strike out the whole of the second resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which undertook to pronounce judgment without trial, and to insert in place of it a resolution to summon Nicholas Bidle, president of the Bank of the United States, and such other persons as the Senate should direct, to appear at the bar of the Senate at some short and convenient day, to be examined upon oath as to the causes which led to the late large curtailment of the debts of the bank, and the manner of conducting that curtailment.

Mr. B. took up the next great reason assigned by the Secretary for removing the deposits; it was the interference of the bank in the politics and elections of the country. To this most serious charge, the bank, availing itself of a mode of practice known to some courts, but condemned in some others, puts in two pleas of contradictory tenor; that is to say, she pleads double; in one plea denying the truth of the accusation out and out, and in the other admitting it to be true, and justifying it. In a word, she pleaded not guilty, and justification. She should have the benefit of both pleas, and in her own words; for he (Mr. B.) would read them from the little book which the bank itself had prepared and furnished gratis to all the members of Congress, at the commencement of the present session. He had received one, would make his thanks for the favor in due form, and now proceed to use it. Mr. B. then read various extracts from the report of the bank directors.

"The Bank of the United States, like every other bank, derives much of its advantages from its credit, and its general reputation for solvency; and the directors are, therefore, bound, by official as well as personal considerations, to remove unfounded prejudices, and to repel injurious calumnies on the institution intrusted to their care.

"Soon after the first message to Congress, issued by the signer of the present paper, it became necessary to counteract the schemes for the destruction of the bank, by the diffusion of intelligence among the people. Accordingly, the following resolutions have been adopted by the board.

"On the 30th of November, 1830, 'the president submitted to the board a copy of an article on banks and currency, just published in the American Quarterly Review of this city, containing a favorable notice of this institution, and suggested the expediency of making the views of the author more extensively known to the public than they can be by means of the subscription list; whereupon it was, on motion,

"Resolved, That the president be authorized to take such measures in regard to the circulation of the contents of the said article, either in the whole or in part, as he may deem most for the interest of the bank.'

"On the 11th of March, 1831, 'the president stated to the board that, in consequence of the general desire expressed by the directors at one of their meetings of the last year, subsequent to the adjournment of Congress, and a verbal understanding with the board, measures had been taken by him in the course of that year, for printing numerous copies of the reports of General Smith and Mr. McDuffie, on the subject of this bank, and for widely disseminating their contents through the United States; and that he had since, by virtue of the authority given him by a resolution of this board, adopted on the 30th day of November last, caused a large edition of Mr. Gallatin's Essay on Banks and Currency, to be published and circulated in like manner, at the expense of the bank. He suggested, at the same time, the expediency and propriety of extending still more widely a knowledge of the concerns of this institution, by means of the republication of other valuable articles, which had issued from the daily and periodical presses.'

"Whereupon, it was, on motion,

"Resolved, That the president is hereby authorized to cause to be prepared and circulated such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information in regard to the nature and operations of the bank."

"And, finally, on the 16th of August, 1833, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the board have confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the president, and in the propriety of the resolutions of the 30th of November, 1830, and 11th of March, 1831, and entertain a full conviction of the necessity of a renewed attention to the objects of the resolutions; and that the president be authorized and requested to continue his exertions for the promotion of said objects."

"The resolutions of 1830 and 1831 were passed openly and unanimously by the board, the two Government directors who attended concurring in them; and they have been carried into effect without the least reserve or secrecy. The form of the resolution was the same as that adopted on a kindred subject, the arrest of counterfeiters, a short time previous, on the 25th of October, 1830."

"Resolved, That the president of the bank be authorized to take whatever measures he may think proper for the discovery and arrest of counterfeiters of the notes and drafts, and to incur such expenses from time to time in effecting that object as he may deem useful or necessary."

"The expenses incurred, as stated in the expense account, in executing these resolutions, from December, 1829, when the first assault was made on the bank by the President, to the present time, running through the years 1829, 1830, 1831, 1832, 1833, amount to $58,265 05, making an average for the last four years of $14,583 76 a year.

During that period, the total expenses under the head of printing and stationary amounted to	$105,057 73
Of which, the proportion for the defence of the bank was	$58,265 04
And for miscellaneous expenses of books and stationary,	46,792 69
	<hr/> $105,057 73

"So that the general result is, that within four years past the bank has been obliged to incur an expense of $58,000 to defend itself against injurious misrepresentations.

"This has been done with regret that it should be necessary, but with the strongest conviction of its propriety, and without the slightest wish either to disavow or to conceal it. On the contrary, the bank asserts its clear right to defend itself equally against those who circulate false statements, and those who circulate false notes. Its sole object, in either case, is self-defence. It cannot suffer itself to be calumniated down, and the interests confided to its care sacrificed by falsehoods. A war of unexampled violence has been waged against the bank; the institution defends itself; its assailants are what are called politicians; and when statements which they cannot answer are presented to the country, they reproach the bank with interfering in politics. As these assaults, too, are made at the period of public elections, the answers of the bank must, of course, follow at the same time; and thus, because these politicians assail the bank on the eve of elections, unless the institution stands mute, it is charged with interfering in politics, and influencing elections. The bank has never interfered in the slightest degree in politics, and never influenced or sought to influence elections; but it will not be deterred by the menaces or clamors of politicians from executing its duty in defending itself. Of the time and manner, and degree and expense, connected with this service, the board of directors claim to be the sole and exclusive judges. Whether the defence is too costly, is for the stockholders, whose interests are sustained by it, to decide; but, certainly, the assailants themselves have no right to complain of the expenses they have occasioned. Their own duty, in the full proportion which may be needed for defending the institution intrusted to them, the board of directors will cheerfully and zealously perform."

After reading the extracts, Mr. B. made a quotation from Holy Writ, "Oh that mine adversary would write a book!" and added, he has written it! and sent it here; and out of this book comes death and sorrow to the writer. He would examine the defence, thus officially set up by the bank itself, under three different aspects: first, the right of it; secondly, the truth of it; thirdly, the manner of it.

As to the right of defence: he (Mr. B.) utterly denied to the bank, as a corporation, any right to spend the money of the corporation, and especially the money of the United States, as a part of that corporation, which was a stockholder in it to the amount of $7,000,000, in governing or influencing the action of the Government as to its future continuance. The bank was created for the convenience of Government, as a thing necessary to the Government, and not for the benefit of itself. The benefits which might result to the stockholders were incidental and subordinate, and could be no part of the object of the Government in creating the bank. It was for its own convenience alone that the charter was granted; and upon that argument alone, worked up to the idea of necessity, could the charter be renewed.

The Government, then, was the judge of the convenience and of the necessity which should induce a recharter; and the institution itself had no right to demand it, much less to spend the Government's money to obtain it. As individuals, the directors and stockholders may spend their own money, like other citizens; but the funds, of which they were the trustees, could only be used according to the terms of the trust; that is, in making profits for the stockholders, and defraying the necessary expenses of a prudent and economical administration of its affairs. It had been chartered for twenty years, has enjoyed eighteen years of its exclusive privileges, and would enjoy the remainder, unless it died under the sentence of the law for a violation of its charter. In either event, it will have had its contract; it will have had all its rights in full. To refuse to be discontinued, to demand a recharter, and to use its money to obtain it, is just as outrageous and unjustifiable as if the regiment of dragoons, raised last winter, and to be enlisted for three years, should refuse to be disbanded at the end of the time, and use their swords and pistols upon Congress to force a re-enlistment. There would be no difference in the nature of the offence; no difference in the nature of the right; the dragoons would use their appropriate weapon, the sword; the bank uses its appropriate weapon, the purse. The difference was in the weapon, not in the right of using it, or the nature of the offence in using it. It was a difference in the power of the two weapons, as to which was most formidable and dangerous. It had been said on this floor, that all power resided in the sword and purse, and that in fact all power resolved itself into that of the purse; for, without the aid of the purse, the sword could not be drawn. It was a sage remark, and a true one; it was also an old one. The greatest of generals had placed the power of the purse above that of the sword. Phillip of Macedon found it to be so, and proclaimed it to be so, when capturing the cities and destroying the liberties of the Grecian republics. His aphorism was brief and emphatic, that an ass loaded with gold could find its way through the gates of the strongest city. So of the Bank of the United States: its purse would be infinitely more potent than the swords of the dragoons in demanding the respective renewals of charters or enlistments. He (Mr. B.) now considered the Bank of the United States in the position of an army raised for the war, and refusing to be disbanded at the return of peace. The bank was created for a crisis; for a season of embarrassment in the moneyed system; for a season of public debt, great revenue, and deranged currency; that season has passed by. Every reason urged at that time for the creation of the bank has passed away; all necessity for it, if any ever existed, has passed away; the time has come for the rights of the bank to expire upon their own limitation; but she refuses to let them expire; she demands renewed existence, and uses money to obtain it, and boldly declares that she will be the sole judge of the propriety of the use, and the amount to be used. The bank, according to the decision of the Government, has become as unnecessary as an army in time of peace; but, like an army that refuses to be disbanded in time of peace, she revolts against the Government, sets up her will above that of the Government, and uses her appropriate weapon, money, to prolong and to perpetuate her existence.

We hear much, said Mr. B., of the danger of armies; much of the dangers of military despotism and insubordination; but where is the example of an army, in the history of our existence, refusing to be disbanded, and demanding renewed enlistment? There was no such example; nor was there an example in the world, either ancient or modern, in which any army revolted against the civil authorities, until those authorities first made themselves odious and contemptible to the people. A civil Government must be first detested and despised by the people, before an armed force can overturn it. Not so with a moneyed power. It works by corruption. It saps the foundations of Governments. It destroys Governments by rendering them odious, and not because they are odious. It prepare them for the arm of the military usurper; and if this Government shall ever be overthrown by a military chieftain, it will be after the indulgence of a course of conduct that shall deprive it of the confidence and esteem of the people. The moneyed power—the ass loaded with gold—is then so much more dangerous than an army, as it can use a more formidable weapon, and can attack the Government before it is corrupt; and, by corrupting it, fit it for overthrow by the military arm. Here, then, is a great moneyed power, wielding its tens of millions, holding half the specie of the country in its vaults, in open insurrection against the Government of the country, contending against it for power and pre-eminence, and boldly declaring, in a paper furnished by itself to the members of Congress, that it will be the exclusive judge of the amount of money, and the time and manner of using it, which it will choose to expend in this contest. Such is the declaration of directors, who themselves have no real interest in the bank, except the profitable business of managing it; who, holding their one, two, five, and ten shares, arrogantly wield the seventy thousand shares of the Government against itself. Mr. B. said, this was a crisis which the prophetic spirit of Jefferson foresaw, and which, thirty years ago, he foretold. It was an attempt to upset the Government—the popular elective Government—secured to the people by the constitution, and to substitute for it a bank government, representing, not the people, but the bloated oligarchy of a moneyed power.

Mr. B. took up the plea of the bank under the aspect of its truth. He would make no comment upon the double character of the pleading, the not guilty, which was pleaded so stoutly, and the justification, which was so quickly added. The beautiful harmony and high consistency between such pleas would be fully observed and appreciated without the aid of comment. He proceeded to something more fatal and revolting. It grew out of that dry and inexorable thing, a date; and the date he alluded to was the one which the bank directors had given in their report as the time when their right of defence against the President accrued. It was December, 1829. It is at that time that this report dates the first assault of the President upon the bank; and yet it is seen from the same report, and a mass of other evidence, that the defence had commenced a year before that time. The very next line states the expenses incurred by the bank in defending itself against this assault, "running through the years 1829, '30, '31, '32, '33," amounted to the sum of $58,000 for printing. The inclusion of the year 1829 as one of those in which the bank had already begun to "defend" itself, is thus expressly declared and admitted by the bank itself, and shows the "defence" to have commenced a full year before the first assault was made. If it had not been admitted by the bank, the same fact could have been proved by other means, and in relation to other modes of the defence. The fee-bill to attorneys would abundantly prove it. He (Mr. B.) would refer to evidence obtained from the bank two years ago—its own statements—to show that this arm of the defence was prodigiously strengthened a year before the attack commenced. He had in his hand a statement of the amount paid by the bank to attorneys from the establishment of the institution to the close of the year 1831, and certain comparisons growing out of this statement would fix the attention of the Senate and the people. He would first contrast two periods of time together; the first five years of the existence of the bank, from 1817 to 1821, inclusive, when in reality there was a great mass of business to be done by lawyers, and three years of the latter period of the time, from 1829 to 1831, inclusive, when there was little or nothing to be done by attorneys, and see how the respective amounts stood by the side of each other. For the first period, of five years, he showed the amount to be $35,000; for the second period, $34,000. Mr. B. said, to comprehend the force of this statement, it would be necessary to reflect that this period of three years, when $34,000 went to attorneys, was a period of the greatest prosperity of the bank, when she was pouring out money by millions—nearly thirty millions in a few months—scarcely suing any body, and boasting of the small loss from debtors, and the unprecedented punctuality of all in paying up; the longer period of five years, when only $35,000 was expended, was notoriously a period of the greatest embarrassment to the bank; when it was brought to the verge of bankruptcy; had to close all its southern and western branches; bring innumerable suits; foreclose a great number of mortgages, and seek for the mass of its debts by law alone. These reflections would enable the Senate to judge of the propriety of the expense to lawyers in the last named period of three years. It would itself be conclusive of their opinions; but there was a closer view yet to be taken of this point; it would be obtained by contrasting two single years together from each period of time. He would take the year 1821, the largest of the bank expenditure to attorneys in the first five years of its existence, and the year 1829, the first year of the bank defence against attacks not then made. The result of the contrast would be $17,618 for the year 1821, and $16,298 for 1829; that is to say, just about as much for the year of the greatest law business the bank ever had, and the year in which it had little or nothing to do. A call upon the bank for the list of suits attended to by the attorneys in the two years would complete the view of this point; and this call, the United States, as a stockholder to the amount of seven millions, had an undoubted right to make. And here Mr. B. would rest, for the present, one branch of the inquiry into the truth of the bank's plea, that the expenditures complained of were made in defence of itself against attacks.

Another branch of the same inquiry as to the truth of the plea, and a still more serious one, remained to be made: it was in the matter of fact, whether there was any attack at all upon the bank, at the time averred, to justify either her prophetic anticipation of the event, or to stand upon afterwards to repel it. The bank directors, he would repeat, fixed the first assault of the President, and the only one which they had named, as justifying all the expenses of their "defence," to the year 1829, and to the month of December of that year. He would give the bank the benefit of its own words, and read again from the extract already read:

"The expenses incurred, as stated in the expense account, in executing these resolutions, from December, 1829, when the first assault was made on the bank by the President, to the present time, running through the years," &c.

This extract, said Mr. B., fixed the time of the assault, and the assault itself. It evidently referred to the President's annual message, so that the assault complained of must have been contained in that message; but if any doubt could be raised on that point, it would be cleared up by another part of the bank report, also contained in the extract which he had read, and which he would read over again, that the bank should still have the benefit of its own words. He read:

"Soon after the first message to Congress issued by the signer of the present paper, it became necessary to counteract the schemes for the destruction of the bank, by the diffusion of intelligence among the people. Accordingly, the following resolutions have been adopted by the board."

Mr. B. then specified the resolutions here referred to, and showed them to be those of the 30th of November, 1830; the 11th March, 1831; and 16th August, 1833; being those under which such part of the extraordinary expenditures of the bank for its defence as has yet come to light had been made. He made no further use, at present, of the extract he had read, or the resolutions referred to, than to lay hold of the word message, in the clause "first measure to Congress, issued by the signer of the present paper;" the present paper referred to was the one read by President Jackson to his cabinet on the 18th of September last; and this word "message" being joined to the President's name in the extract first read, and being considered as identical with the word assault, therein used, will leave it beyond the reach of cavil or contradiction, subterfuge or evasion, that the attack complained of by the bank, and which is relied on to justify the three resolutions read, and all the expenses incurred under them, including those not yet come to light, was the paragraph in which the President called the attention of Congress to the bank, in his annual message in the year 1829. This point established, Mr. B. would have recourse to the message itself, for the character of the assault complained of. He then asked that the Secretary should read the paragraph in the message, which had thus become identified. The Secretary reads:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from a precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all, that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

This, exclaimed Mr. B., is the assault of the President of the United States on the Bank of the United States. Is it true? Is it, in point of fact, an assault upon that institution? Certainly none. If it assaults any body, or any thing, it is the Congress of 1816, or the law of that Congress creating the bank. It recites the fact that the constitutionality and expediency of that law is questioned—and well questioned—by a large portion of the American people. The adjective well, here used, implies sufficiently, properly; and is equivalent to a declaration that the law was both unconstitutional and inexpedient. But what of that? The President does not advise the repeal of the law, and cannot be said to have a scheme for the destruction of the bank. He does not even assault the bank, neither by words nor implication; if he assaults any thing, it is the defunct Congress that granted the charter; but the fact is, there is no assault upon any body, any institution, or any thing. What he says of the present bank refers to its future application for a charter, not to its present existence; and, however opposed he might be to the grant of a new charter, that opposition cannot be charged as a design to destroy the present charter. Even if he had alleged a violation of the charter, and ordered a scire facias, the bank could not complain of it, and go into the newspapers to counteract him, but should submit to the legal trial which the laws prescribed, and abide the decision of that trial, without using the money of the institution to defend herself, otherwise than in conducting her legal defence before the court. But the President does none of this. He does not intimate a word against the life of the bank during the time it has to live. The assertion that it had failed to furnish a sound and uniform currency, was not an attack upon the existence of the bank. It was an assertion authorized by facts, and properly communicated to Congress as a reason why a new charter should not be granted. It was an assertion strictly true; for, from the year 1813 to 1827, the bank had issued no currency at all in the South and West; all its branches in those sections of the Union were shut up for eight years nearly, preceding the message. The branch drafts, which have since been put out, in imitation of branch notes, only began to issue, and that in small quantities, by way of feeling the public pulse, in 1827. They appeared first on the outskirts of the Union, at the upper land office in Missouri, as if they had come from Mexico, and were barely creeping slowly and cautiously into circulation, when the President made his message of 1829. The President might not have known of them; but, if he did, and comprehended them in the phrase unsound, why, in the first place, that phrase was no assault upon the life of the bank; it was no disclosure of a scheme for its destruction; and, in the next place, the phrase was true, and has been so decided at the last term of the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States against Brewster, who was indicted upon two counts for forging these drafts; one count describing them as notes of the branch bank, the other as bills; the court decided that they were neither bills nor notes, within the meaning of the bank charter; and the counterfeiter escaped the penalties of the law. The whole case is reported in 7th Peter's Reports, p. 164, where gentlemen could see it for fuller information. Taken in any sense, and in any way, there was not a word in the President's message to justify the charge of an assault upon the bank, much less an assault with intent to kill, as charged by the bank. Taken in their clear and obvious meaning, the words of the message would show that the President was opposed to the recharter of the bank; but even this meaning was stoutly denied on this floor by the leading supporter of the bank, [Mr. CLAY;] so that, according to the voice of its friend here, the President had not even committed the offence of expressing an opinion adverse to the renewal of the charter. But Mr. B. would not take that ground. He would take the true ground, that the President did show himself opposed to the renewed charter in that message. He did that much, and no more. The bank knew he did that much, and no more. They knew he was opposed to the renewal of their charter; and for that cause, and for expressing that opinion to the Congress of the United States, as it was his privilege and his duty to do under the constitution of the United States, he has been assailed for five years by the bank, under the pretext of defending itself; and now, how and in what manner that defence had been conducted, he would proceed to show.

On Monday, January 6, Mr. BENTON continued:

The manner in which the bank had conducted its defence against the President was next to occupy the attention of the Senate. The three resolutions adopted by the board to provide the ways and means, and direct the mode of carrying on that defence, were briefly recapitulated by Mr. B., from the first one in November, 1830, which authorized the wide diffusion and republication of Mr. Gallatin's Essay on Currency, to that of March 11, 1831, which contained the delegation of a general authority to the president of the bank to take upon himself the care of its defence, and which authority seemed to be conferred in the equivocal words in which a similar authority was conferred by the Romans when a dictator was created, that he should see that the republic received no detriment, down to that of August, 1833, which confirmed and extended the former, and gave it a practical meaning, not observable upon the face of the words, by confirming all that had been done under it. Mr. B. said it was not his intention to go out of the record at present to search into the manner of conducting this defence; there was an immensity of matter beyond the record which might be well used, but there was enough in it to show the character of the defence, and he would confine himself to it. He would not even now dilate upon the flagrant breach of the charter committed in the second and third resolutions, which put the funds of the stockholders, without limitation of time or amount, at the sole disposition of Mr.

Biddle; he would not repeat the contents of any of the publications made against the President of the United States in the pamphlets, handbills, and broadsides, which were printed under these resolutions; he would not refer to the newspaper articles, innumerable as the leaves of the trees, which owed their origin to the same source; he would not refer to the relentless and cruel persecution of five years' duration, which had been carried on against the public and private character of the President, against his official and his personal conduct, against all even who took his part; he would not refer to these things, all of which owed their origin to the three resolutions for the defence of the bank, by communicating information to the people; but leaving them for the present to the recollection of the Senate, and proposing to pay some attention to them in another part of his speech, he would now limit himself to the words in the record, presented to the Senate in a form which made them the immediate act of the bank, in its most solemn and official mode of acting, and leaving upon the institution itself the undivided and undisputed responsibility of what was said.

The first features in the manner of conducting what has been called a defence of the bank, but which is now proved to be a long continued attack upon the President to prevent his re-election, because he was opposed to a renewal of the charter of the bank, is the resolution for the arrest and punishment of counterfeiters, ostentatiously paraded by the bank in its report, and styled by them a kindred subject to the President's first assault. They say that the form of the resolution, in the case of the President, was the same as the form of another resolution on a "kindred subject," namely, the arrest of counterfeiters; and then give the form of both that the similitude might be seen, and that all America and Europe should see that the bank placed the President of the United States and the counterfeiters of its notes on a level with each other, and actually affirmed a relationship, or kindred, between their respective conducts. Both resolutions were quoted in the extract which he Mr. B. had read, and all the difference that he could see between them was the absence of all that vindictive feeling towards the counterfeiters which was so venomously expressed towards the President. But it was not in the resolution alone that the President was assimilated to the basest order of felons. The delicious comparison was too agreeable to be dropped after once using. It is soon recurred to again, and the right of the bank courageously affirmed to defend itself equally against those who circulated false statements, and those who circulate false notes to its prejudice. He (Mr. B.) had seen all this some months ago in the newspaper press in the service of the bank, but it had never entered into his head to suppose that the directors had drawn up such articles. He had also heard it in the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who led off the debate in favor of the bank; but even these preparatory notes had not prepared his feelings for the shock which he felt at seeing the American President assimilated to a band of counterfeiters, in an official report from the board of directors, and actually addressed to the members of Congress. Great as his idea was of the boldness of the moneyed power, this was a shot beyond all his anticipations, and he read, and re-read, with silent and inexpressible indignation, the outrage which was offered, not so much to the President as to the people who had elected him, and the republican Government, of which he was the Chief Magistrate. But his attention was not permitted to remain fixed, nor his indignation to exhaust itself, on this amazing and almost incredible outrage; a cloud of other passages and epithets of the same cast and temper presented themselves to his view and claimed a share of his feelings. "Injurious calumnies;"—"calumniated down;"—"misrepresentations;"—"sacrificed by falsehoods." Such are the epithets applied by a board of bank directors against the First Magistrate of a republic—a President who had been twice, he might say three times, elected to that dignity by the people; and all because, in a message to Congress, he had disclosed the fact of his unwillingness to see their bank re-chartered.

Well might Mr. Jefferson call the institution an enemy to the forms and principles of our institutions; well might he say that it would labor to destroy the confidence of the people in their public functionaries, and seize a critical moment to upset the Government. All that he said is justified, and more than justified, by this official act of the bank; and that all persons might know precisely who did it, he would read their names from the minutes of the board that sanctioned the report, and ordered five thousand copies to be printed. The names of those voting for the adoption of the report were, Messrs. Willing, Eyre, Bevan, White, Sergeant, Fisher, Lippincott, Chauncey, Newkirk, Lewis, Holmes, Biddle—12.

Those voting against it were, Messrs. Gilpin, Sullivan, Wager—3.

After reading these names, Mr. B. said that he did not deal in epithets, neither on the floor of the Senate, nor elsewhere. He did not permit himself to describe by any form of expression the character of the act that he had read, much less to speak of those who did it. They were men in a high station, and inhabitants of a city whose population had vindicated their right to the beautiful name—more beautiful in its import than in its sound—which its benevolent founder had bestowed upon it. They were men wielding a mass of $35,000,000, of which $7,000,000 belonged to the people whose Chief Magistrate had thus been stigmatized by them. They were men who doubtless gloried in their act, or they would not thus publicly have set their names to it, and ordered five thousand copies of it to be printed. It was not for the purpose of expressing an opinion of their conduct that he had read the passages from their report, and spread their names before the Senate. He would leave that task to all that portion of the American people in whom the moral sense was not yet extinct. Far different, and immeasurably more exalted, was his object. It was to invoke the attention of all the friends of free government; for he would not limit himself to the friends and supporters of President Jackson; it was to call the attention of all good men, of whatever party or country, to the abuse which was lavished upon the President of a republic, by the directors of a great moneyed institution, under the assumed pretext of defending itself against his assaults, but in truth and in fact because he was opposed to the renewal of their charter! Having got the attention of the people fixed upon this great fact, he would rely upon their intelligence to say if this was not electioneering, and upon their patriotism to say whether a moneyed institution, which thus electioneers, is not incompatible with the existence of a free and popular Government, and ought not to be put down.

Mr. B. had now examined the bank's plea under the three-fold aspect: its right; its truth; its manner. He had showed that it had no right to make it; that its pretext was untrue; and that its manner of making it was revolting and atrocious. He had a few other remarks of a detached character to apply to this head of the argument, after which he would dismiss it. The first was the expense of the printing account, which, for want of particulars, he would only judge comparatively, that is to say, by contrasting the period of the bank's electioneering with the period in which she was attending to her own business. This contrast would present the following result: that in five years of electioneering, namely, from 1829 to 1833, inclusive, the printing account was about 80,000 dollars; while, for the whole twelve preceding years of the bank's existence, it was only about 12,000 dollars; being at the rate of 16,000 dollars a year while electioneering, and 1,000 a year when not. This statement would speak for itself, and show that money was applied, and largely applied, to the press, to secure its aid in defending the bank against the assault of President Jackson; that is to say, in opposing his re-election. The papers published also speak for themselves, and show that they were for electioneering purposes. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had confined his justification of the bank to the republication of Mr. Gallatin's Essay on Currency, and the reports of Messrs. Smith and McDuffie, but the list of papers published will show that these items made but a small part of the printing done. There were, for example, about seventy thousand copies of a paper entitled Address to State Legislatures, which were dispersed through all the States on the eve of the Senatorial elections, and not only sent to the members of the General Assemblies, but into all the counties, and up the creeks, and into the gorges of the mountains, to citizens apparently obscure, who were astonished at the honor done them by the Bank of the United States, and sadly at a loss to know how such exalted personages as inhabited the marble palace of that institution came to find out their humble names and surnames, and the name of the creek, cove, and parish in which their humble dwelling was situated. Vast numbers of these addresses were sent to the State of Missouri for the benefit of himself, (Mr. B.) whose election was then coming on; but they happened to work the contrary way from what they were intended, among the men of the rifle, in that young and noble-hearted State. The obtrusion of the bank addresses was received as an insult. Instead of defeating, it hastened his election. The Legislature of Missouri rebuked the insolence which would dictate to them, by instantly electing the man they were intended to defeat. But in some States it might have been otherwise. One-third of the Senate was renewable that year; out of so many, and in States where the balance was nearly even, the bank address may have turned the scale.

Mr. B. said that the names of the persons to whom money was paid for printing would also speak for themselves, and show that some received money who were neither printers, editors, nor publishers, but who were treasurers, as he was informed, of election committees opposed to President Jackson. Of this description, he was told, was Mr. E. Olmstead, of Philadelphia, who received $1,371 04; and Mr. Riddle, of the same place, who received $2,583 50. But Mr. B. would not pursue these items; though large in themselves, they were small compared to the immense sums lavished by the bank, and the particulars of which cannot be ascertained. He had a general and comprehensive view to take of this point: it was a statement of the gross profits received by the bank, and the nett amount actually divided by the stockholders. He had the half-yearly statements of the dividends, which would show these amounts from July, 1829, to July, 1831; after which, a slight operation in arithmetic would show the amount that remained undivided, and of course went to the expenses of the institution, and to such other objects as the directors would direct. Mr. B. exhibited the statement.

		Gross profits.	Dividends.
July,	1829,	$1,682,575	$1,225,000
January,	1830,	1,693,975	do.
July,	1830,	1,743,430	do.
January,	1831,	1,717,985	do.
July,	1831,	1,943,533	do.

Mr. B. remarked upon this statement that while the gross profits rapidly increased, and advanced near 300,000 dollars in the half year, or 600,000 dollars in the whole year, the dividend remained exactly the same before and after the increase. The dividend was still 1,225,000 dollars for the half year, when the half-yearly gross profits had risen from 1,682,000 to 1,943,000 dollars. The dividend was still at the rate of only 7 per cent., when the gross profits were about 11 per cent. The sum undivided in the whole year 1829 was about 800,000 dollars; the amount undivided in the year 1831 was about 1,400,000 dollars. Here was a difference of 600,000 dollars, which, it would seem, ought to have been divided among the stockholders, but was not; and the United States, as the largest of those stockholders, certainly had a right to know why it was not, and to what objects it was applied. To a plain understanding it would seem that the lawful expenses of the institution, or the legitimate objects of expenditure, could not have increased to the amount of 600,000 dollars per annum in the short space of two years, and that while the charter was drawing to a close they could not absorb 1,400,000 dollars. Mr. B. said that this incomprehensible fact needed explanation, and the more so, since the board of directors had refused to abide the decision of their own books, and utterly denied, as late as the 13th December last, to appoint a committee, of which the Government directors should be members, to examine the expense account of the bank. This refusal was regularly made at the board, in the peremptory refusal of the majority to consider a resolution for that purpose; so that the Government directors, up to the middle of December last, and, in all probability, up to the present moment, are ignorant of the items which compose the expenses of the bank. In the face of such a fact, would the Senate go on to acquit the bank without examination, and to convict the President and Secretary of the Treasury with having falsely accused it of applying the moneys of the institution to political and electioneering objects? His own view was quite different. He was for allowing the president and directors of the bank an opportunity of defending themselves on this floor, if they were willing to avail themselves of the chance; and, if they were not willing, he held it to be the highest possible reason for requiring them to appear and answer. He should, therefore, at the proper time, submit as a further amendment to the second resolution brought in by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] a requisition upon Nicholas Biddle, president of the Bank of the United States, and such other persons as the Senate should direct, to appear at the bar of the Senate at some brief and convenient day, to answer the Senate, upon oath, touching the application of the moneys of the bank to political and electioneering objects.

Mr. B. conceived that nothing short of this public and solemn examination, at the bar of the Senate, and in the face of the public, could satisfy the people, or ought to satisfy them, of the innocence of the bank. The accusation was a tremendous one; nothing less than that of a great moneyed power poisoning liberty in all her fountains—the press, the elections, the legislative bodies. It was a crime beyond treason and bribery, or any thing enumerated in the constitution, as fit offences for impeachment. It was an offence which the framers of the constitution did not foresee, for they did not foresee the existence of a bank. It was not impeachable in due form, for the directors of the bank were not civil officers of the United States. But the offence was triable; and the Senate having taken cognizance of it, and having entertained a resolution declaring that the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for removing the deposits are unsatisfactory and insufficient, it behooved them to examine into the truth of the reasons before they pronounced judgment.

Mr. B. claimed the indulgence of the Senate while he should avail himself of a pause in the argument, to clear up a matter with respect to the Secretary of the Treasury, which he had left in doubt when he spoke of that gentleman some days ago; it was relative to his vague and indefinite offence against Missouri, at the period of attempting to impose the restriction upon her. He could not comprehend, at that time, what the imputed offence was; and, by consequence, could make no answer to it. His situation was different at present; he knew the offence and the answer; and, with the leave of the Senate, would state the case, and he would state it from the book; for he held in his hand the Journal of the Legislature of Maryland at the time alluded to, and had the whole case under his eye. It was this: a resolution was brought in to instruct the Senators and to request the Representatives to vote for the admission of Missouri without the restriction. Some members of the Senate thought this instruction unnecessary, and somewhat ungracious towards a delegation that was going to vote for the unrestricted admission of the State any way; and one of them, the celebrated Mr. Pinkney, was known to be disposed to exert the greatest powers of his eloquence in her behalf. They, therefore, opposed the instruction; but, to avoid misconception, moved an amendment, declaring in the fullest and most unequivocal terms, the individual sentiments of the members of the Senate to be in favor of the free and unrestricted admission of the State. Mr. B. here read the amendment, and continued: This amendment was not accepted; it was put to the vote, and rejected without the yeas and nays; but he was authorized to say, that it expressed the sentiments of the present Secretary of the Treasury, then a member of the State Senate of Maryland; and so vanishes the charge against him of having sinned against Missouri at the time of her infant struggles for a free and equal admission into the Union.

Mr. B. here yielded the floor to Mr. WILKINS, on whose motion the Senate adjourned.

He took up a third reason for the removal of the deposits; it was the exclusion of the Government directors from a participation in the business of the bank. The reason was prominently assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, and, from its intrinsic importance, and the stress laid upon it in the assignment of reasons, would doubtless command the most serious attention of the Senate. In approaching its examination, he (Mr. B.) felt his task lightened, and almost reduced to the mere occupation of reading the evidence which bore upon the case; for it was a fact not of a nature to be established, or even illustrated by argument, but solely depending upon evidence. He would, therefore, proceed in the dry and lawyer-like business of laying that evidence before them.

For that purpose, he would read various extracts from the report made to the two Houses of Congress by the Government directors, printed by the order of the Senate, and now a part of our official documents.

"We shall endeavor to present the view we have taken of the relation in which we are placed, as well towards the institution in question, as towards the Government and people of the United States, to prove that from the moment we took our seats among the directors of the bank, we have been the objects of a systematic opposition; our rights trampled upon, our just interference prevented, and our offices rendered utterly useless for all the purposes required by the charter; and to show that the statements by the majority of the board, in the document to which we refer, convey an account of their proceedings and conduct altogether illusory and incorrect."

"A case parallel to ours has never yet been exhibited in this country. It is the case of a subordinate corporation, spurning at, and virtually discarding, the agents of those by whom it was created; paying no sort of respect to the exalted public sources whence their appointment immediately emanates; denying the true nature of their trusts; and nullifying, by preconcert and pretence, the law of the land and its ministerial officers. Individually and personally, this arrogant and unequal proceeding, conducted under the semblances of official forms, cannot affect us; we are, in fact, relieved by it from many labors, irksome, painful, and unprofitable; made silent and useless by the force of a majority, we are freed from much responsibility and care. But to our constituents, to the American nation and people, the example is of vast, and, we believe, vital interest; and to them, and for them, we feel it a duty to make the statement which we now submit to their assembled representatives. With them alone it remains to decide whether they will assert the supremacy of the law; support their public agents in the discharge of their duties; and confine within its proper sphere of subordination and real usefulness an institution created not for its own, but their benefit."

"We now proceed to lay before Congress the history of those transactions on the part of the majority of the directors of the Bank of the United States, which are the foundation of the preceding remarks and have called forth this statement."

"On the 8th of January, 1833, having been appointed directors by the President of the United States, three of us attended the first meeting of the board, two being residents of the city of Philadelphia. On the appointment of the standing committees, to whom the preparation and consideration of a great deal of the most important business is assigned, and who consist altogether of thirteen persons, neither of us was appointed on any one committee; thus evincing, by the very earliest acts of the president and the board, as we could not fail to perceive, a determination to deprive us of the best means of information in regard to the nature of its proceedings."

"We very soon found, however, that this system of conducting the most important affairs by committees, from which we were excluded, was not merely occasional. It was, as we discovered, regularly practised, in violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the charter, which declares that not less than seven directors shall be necessary to the transaction of business; and which intrusts it to a board properly chosen and appointed. We found, also, that this plan, the effect of which was to transfer from the board to a few members so much power and authority, was extended even to the disposal of the funds of the stockholders—a branch of business which certainly ought not to be exercised, except by the full representation of their interests, required by the charter; and which, otherwise conducted, has involved, and must involve, the institution in transactions from which it is difficult to withdraw without a loss."

"In a word, from the moment we took our seats at the board, we have seen that the real business of the institution is not there transacted, nor its real authority there exercised; that there exists, beyond its control, a power that can be and is exerted, promptly, secretly, and efficiently, from one end of the country to the other, and the just instrumentality of the directors has been curtailed, either by the mode of operation gradually introduced, or by positive regulations from time to time prescribed; and that their duties must be inadequately performed, if they are willing to remain passive instruments under such a system, instead of asserting their rights as representative agents, charged with an important and highly responsible trust."

"We have thus endeavored to trace, as well as we can, the course of policy adopted by the bank towards the public directors. Excluded, as it is seen we have been and still are, not merely from any participation in the measures of the board, but even from the examination of its documents, we have been able only to state some of the prominent instances of unjustifiable infringement on our rights. A full and proper investigation would at once augment their number, and display their impropriety in a light still more glaring. Yet, as it is, we confidently appeal to the exposition we have made to sustain us in our assertion, that from the moment we took our seats at the board, a systematic policy has been pursued of so conducting the affairs of the institution, as to exclude the directors appointed on the part of the United States from a participation in, or knowledge of, its most important transactions."

After reading these extracts, Mr. B. went on to say that it would be tedious to read the various instances of their exclusion from the business of the bank which the Government directors enumerated to sustain their general declaration. The instances were numerous and important, and continued from the first day they took their seats to the end of the last month, when their term of service expired. But there was one instance of a nature too striking to be omitted, because it contained in itself an entire system of operations. It was an application on the part of the Government directors to have an impartial committee appointed to examine into the expense account of the bank, to ascertain whether the Government directors had untruly represented the amount of expense supposed to have been incurred on account of electioneering and political objects. The board refused even to consider the resolution, and thus left the Government directors without the means of making the examination and report which was essential to their own honor, as well as to the interest of the United States.

Mr. B. would show the resolution they offered, and the date of it, premising that this took place on the 13th of December; that is to say, in the last month of the service of the directors.

"Therefore, Resolved, That a committee of six members of this board be appointed, three of whom shall be public directors, for the purpose of examining the expense account of the institution, under the head of stationary and printing, from the 1st July, 1829, to 1st July, 1833. That they state the nature and amount of all expenditures therein, the persons to whom payments were made, the number and names of the documents printed, and the cost of distribution and postage; also, the nature and amount of the current expenses of the bank for printing and stationary; also, any extraordinary expenditures under that head for new bank notes or other purposes; and particularly enumerate any items of the said account which are erroneously stated in the said report of the public directors, if any there be.

"That the said committee obtain and include a statement of the particulars of the expenditures on orders of the president, referred to in the said report, of the persons paid, the amount, and the services performed.

"That the said committee prepare the said statement as soon as possible, in such form as that it may be submitted to the public and stockholders."

"The majority refused to consider these resolutions, by the vote of all present but the public directors and one other."

Mr. B. considered the fact to be now established, that the Government directors were excluded from their participation in the business of the bank, from the beginning to the end of their terms. They sat, indeed, at the board, but the committee on exchange did the real business of the board, and from that committee they were rigorously excluded. Once, only, the president of the bank relaxed for a moment, and put two of the Government directors on the inferior committees, but quickly returned to his former policy, and dropped them from all. The following is their account of this short lived honor:

"Shortly after the resolution referred to, placing us expressly on a committee, one of us was appointed on the committee of the offices, and another of us on that of the state of the bank; from that on exchange, by which the powers of the board have been, as we have seen, virtually assumed, we continued to be excluded. When the committees were again appointed, we were again excluded from them all."

Mr. B. here remarked upon the appointment and duties of these committees, which had been assimilated by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to the appointment of committees by the presiding officer of the House of Representatives, and by chairmen of all public meetings. It was in this manner that the appointment of these committees, by the president of the bank alone, instead of the directors taking the duty by turns and in rotation, was attempted to be excused, and the exclusion of the Government directors passed over lightly. But the difference was too obvious to escape the attention of any hearer. The committees of legislative bodies and of public meetings were only to prepare business for the action of the body to which they belonged; but the committees of the bank, and especially the exchange committee, had final and conclusive authority over the subjects on which they acted; and these subjects were loans and discounts to any amount, for any length of time, and upon any security they pleased. In fact, the committee on exchange was the board of directors, or what the charter intended the board to be. In the course of what had been shown, and would yet be shown, Mr. B. said it would be seen that all real power was in the committees; that their acts were definitive; that they did not even report to the board; and that from these committees the Government directors were rigorously and systematically excluded. The exclusion of these directors being established by proof, Mr. B. would ask what became of the national feature of the bank? He would ask what was left except the name, and the use of the public deposits, to distinguish it from the local banks? The Government directors were appointed to represent the stock of the United States, which was one-fifth of the capital; they constituted in number one-fifth of the whole directory; they derived their appointment from the highest source known to the constitution, namely, from the nomination of the President of the United States, and the approbation of the Senate. They had not only the stock of the United States to represent, but other great interests to watch over. The public deposits, amounting to an average of six and a half millions, gave the United States a new interest to that amount in the bank. The receivability of the notes of the bank, in payment of all public dues, gave her another interest in the circulation and general management of the institution, to the amount of all the notes annually received in payment of the revenue, and which might amount to ten or a dozen millions more. To guard these great interests, the Government of the United States, in granting a charter to the bank, reserved the right of appointing five directors; and this right, thus reserved, has been carefully exercised by every administration, from the establishment of the bank to the present day. It has been duly exercised by President Jackson; and, now, what is the result? These directors totally excluded from all the real business of the bank, and even left without the means of knowing what was done. Here was a clear breach and violation of the charter, an open insult to the President and Senate, and a high contempt for the forms and principles of our Government, whose officers or agents were thus set aside. It was a dissolution of the connexion between the Government and the bank; it was the extinction of the only national feature in the institution; it was a sufficient cause in itself for a removal of the deposits. It amounts to this, that, for one entire year, the Government of the United States, in open breach of the charter, has been deprived of her one-fifth part of the administration of the affairs of the bank, for the entire term for which the directors were appointed; and, if submitted to, would authorize the bank to exclude the Government in toto, and in all time to come, from any share in the management of the bank. What excuse has been given for this act? By the bank directors themselves, none; but by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] it is intimated that they are unfit for their stations; so that the bank sets itself up above the constituted authorities, judges the appointments which it makes, and sets them aside when not agreeable to itself. Henceforth the bank must be consulted in the choice of Government directors, in the choice of those who are to represent the interests of the United States; and if the President and Senate presume to make appointments contrary to her will, they will be set aside and nullified. Mr. B. said there was no need of further testimony on this head. The fact of total, permanent, and systematic exclusion of the Government directors from the business of the bank was fully established. He (Mr. B.) thought it, of itself, a sufficient reason for withholding all confidence from the bank in future. So thought the President and Secretary of the Treasury, and he trusted that the Senate and American people would concur in their opinion.

The supersedeas of the board, by devolving their power on the committees on exchange and offices, was the next of the reasons assigned by the Secretary, which was examined by Mr. B. He remarked upon the mode of appointing these committees, which was by the president alone. Formerly there were no appointments, but the directors served on the committees by turns, and in rotation. The present mode of appointment virtually threw all power into the hands of the president, for the power of the committee was supreme over the funds of the bank. Mr. B. then quoted a part of the examination of Mr. Biddle before the investigating committee, two years ago, to show the extent of power possessed by the committee on finance. It appeared, from his testimony, that they made loans and discounts at discretion, and were not even bound to report their proceedings to the board. For the fact that the board was superseded in its proper duties by these committees, Mr. B. read extracts from the report of the Government directors:

"Nor was it in regard to the public directors alone that the management of this institution presented serious causes of objection. The whole system is one which is calculated to exclude the board of directors from a proper knowledge of its situation, of the conduct of its officers, and of its policy as a great financial and commercial institution. The plan of transacting much of the business in secret committees has already been referred to, in many remarkable instances; but, so far as our limited experience on some of the committees has enabled us to judge, very many objects, which ought to be submitted to the inspection and approbation of the directors, never come even before the standing committees, much less before the board."

Mr. B. said he could quote many other passages to prove the same thing, but the fact occurred so frequently, in almost any extract that he read, that he held it to be unnecessary to repeat them. He held it to be established that the committees, and especially the committee on exchange, was invested with full power to make loans and discounts, which was the great business which the bank had to transact, and which put it into the power of three directors, and those three selected by the president, to do what they pleased with the money of the stockholders. By the terms of the charter a board of seven directors, of whom the president, or his deputy, should be one, could alone transact business; less than that number, even six, were incompetent to do the business of the institution; but, by the course pursued, less than half the number required by the charter are invested with full power to loan the moneys of the stockholders, without limitation of time or amount. On former occasions it had been shown that they made loans for hundreds of thousands of dollars, and even for more than a million, for indefinite periods, as long even as the charter had to run, and that the loans made by it were considered to be privileged, and not to be touched by the curtailment which was now heavily falling upon others. Mr. B. denied, as he had done before, that the board could delegate its authority to a committee. It could no more authorize a committee to transact its proper business, that of making loans, than the Congress of the United States could devolve the power of legislation upon its committees. He conceived this conduct of the board, in devolving their own powers upon subaltern committees, appointed by the president alone, to be so flagrant, that he must be excused for quoting another copious extract from the Government directors' report in relation to it. The case was so powerfully stated by them, that it would supersede the necessity of any remarks from him.

"The committee on exchange, we observed, was appointed by the president alone, and it was evident that, organized as it was, and assuming the power it did, the directors became, in a great degree, useless; and the interests of the institution, and the money of the stockholders, were so far placed beyond their control. Its formation, too, was in direct opposition to the by-laws, which provided that the committee having the business of exchange under its care, as well as that of attending daily at the bank, 'should be selected from the board in rotation'—a just arrangement, acted on until within a few years, and enabling all the directors, from time to time, to participate in the action on matters which they had all been selected to superintend. Being satisfied that this arrangement was altogether the proper one, both in regard to the safe disposal of the funds of the stockholders, and to the legitimate performance of their duties by the directors, we were desirous of restoring it in practice. We therefore offered the following resolutions:

"Whereas, it is proper that the ordinary business of the board should not be transacted by a smaller number of directors than that required by the charter, and the business of discounts can be conveniently transacted, as heretofore it has been, at the meeting of the board; therefore,

"Resolved, That the duties of the committee on exchange shall not extend to the business of discounts; that the committee on exchange shall, after the expiration of the present month, consist of three directors, residing in Philadelphia, to be selected, as prescribed by the existing by-laws, monthly, from the board, in rotation; and that the president and cashier shall be united with them.

"These resolutions were at once laid upon the table by a vote of the majority, and we could not obtain their adoption.

"But this mode of appointment by the president alone, and this assumption of power by the committee on exchange, were not merely contrary to the spirit of the charter and the letter of the by-laws. In assuming to discount notes on days intervening between the meetings of the board, and not unfrequently on days when it did meet, the committee on exchange acted in direct opposition to two recorded decisions of the board, by the last of which, no longer since than in 1830, on an application from the office at Charleston to give these same powers to a committee, the inexpediency of doing so was declared in the most explicit terms. When the application was made, it was referred to the standing committee on the offices. They reported against it without hesitation, and on general principles, applicable to the whole institution. 'The subject,' they say, 'of discounts by committees has frequently engaged the attention of the board, who have always felt and expressed great repugnance to such a practice, to which, in fact, much of the losses of the board may be ascribed. The committee on the offices still entertain that opinion, and they think that the better course to be pursued, in regard to the present suggestion, is that adopted on the 31st of October, 1823, on a similar application from the office at Boston. They accordingly recommend the adoption of the following resolution: That the president be requested to communicate to the president of the office at Charleston the unwillingness of this board to adopt the plan of making discounts of notes by a committee, that being the proper business of the board, organized as such; but, in order to give every proper facility to business, the board perceives no objection to more frequent, and even daily, meetings of the board, which could take place for a short time at a particular hour of every day.' To this correct decision, the reasoning of which appears to us unanswerable, made nearly ten years ago, and deliberately reconsidered and renewed six years afterwards, we referred. We pointed it out still standing on the minutes, and we asked that its principles might be adhered to. All, however, was without effect. Finally, that the subject might be brought more fully to the consideration of the directors, we offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the cashier be instructed to lay before the board any resolution rescinding that passed on the 2d of February, 1830, which declares the inexpediency of discounts being done by committees; and any resolution altering the rule of the by-law which directs the appointment of the committee attending at the bank, monthly, in rotation, and which, as appears by the minutes, was complied with up to 1828.

"This resolution, also, was at once laid upon the table by a vote of the majority, and we could not obtain its adoption.

"Our remonstrances, however, were not without effect. They led to a determination on the part of the majority to give some sanction to their course, by adopting new rules, and abolishing those long in existence. A new set of by-laws was prepared in accordance with the actual practice. They were submitted to the board in the month of April last. When they were under consideration, we requested 'that the standing committees might be appointed from the board in rotation;' this was rejected, and the president was authorized himself to select the two of most importance, that on the offices and that on exchange. We then requested that the powers of the committee on exchange 'might not be extended to the business of discounts.' This, too, was rejected. Desirous that if these powers were thus to be exercised by a committee, selected by the president, the other directors might at least be regularly informed of its proceedings, we then requested that they 'should lay before the board at every stated meeting a statement of their proceedings, which should be read before the discounts of the day were settled.' This, too, was rejected. All these being refused, we requested that, among the business of the day, the board might have submitted and read to it 'a report of the final proceedings of the committee,' since the previous stated meeting. This, too, was rejected. In a word, the system of late years acted upon was formally sanctioned by a majority of the board. It is now a portion of its by-laws, as before it was of its practice."

The surrender of the funds of the bank to its president, to be used by him without limitation of time or amount, was viewed by Mr. B. as a clear infraction of the charter. Had such extraordinary power been granted for the most laudable purpose, it still would have been a breach of the charter, and therefore unjustifiable; but it was evident that this great surrender of funds was made for an unjustifiable purpose, and thus greatly aggravated the offence of violating the charter. It was evidently for electioneering and political objects. The application of part of the sums under the resolutions has been discovered by the Government directors; and, as he (Mr. B.) wished to carry conviction by the fairest means, he would read what they had communicated to Congress, and rely upon evidence in preference to argument. He read as follows:

"In pursuance, it is presumed, of these resolutions, the item of stationary, and printing was increased during the first half of the year 1831, to the enormous sum of $29,979 92, exceeding that of the previous year by $23,000, and exceeding the semi-annual expenditure of 1829 by upwards of $26,000. The expense account itself, as made up in the book which was submitted to us, contained very little information relative to the particulars of this expenditure, and we were obliged, in order to obtain them, to resort to an inspection of the vouchers. Among other sums was one of $7,801, stated to be paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831, and the orders themselves were the only vouchers of the expenditure which we found on file; some of the orders, to the amount of about $1,800, stated that the expenditure was for distributing General Smith's and Mr. McDuffie's reports and Mr. Gallatin's pamphlet; but the rest stated, generally, that it was made under the resolution of the 11th of March, 1831.

"There were also numerous bills and receipts for expenditures to individuals, among them of Gales & Seaton, $1,300 for distributing Mr. Gallatin's pamphlet; of William Fry, for Garden & Thompson, $1,675 75 for five thousand copies of General Smith's and Mr. McDuffie's reports, &c.; of Jesper Harding, $440 for eleven thousand extra papers; of the American Sentinel, $124 74 for printing, folding, packing, and postages of three thousand extras; of William Fry, $1,830 27 for upwards of fifty thousand copies of the National Gazette, and supplements, containing addresses to members of the State Legislatures, review of Mr. Benton's speech, abstract of Mr. Gallatin's article from the American Quarterly Review, and editorial article on the project of a treasury bank; of James Wilson, $1,447 75 for twenty-five thousand copies of the reports of Mr. McDuffie and Mr. Smith, and for twenty-five thousand copies of the address to members of the State Legislatures, agreeably to order, and letters from John Sergeant, Esq.; and of Carey & Lea, $2,850 for ten thousand copies of Gallatin on Banking, and two thousand copies of Professor Tucker's article.

"During the second half-year of 1831 the item of stationary and printing was $13,224 87, of which $5,010 were paid on orders of the president, and stated generally to be under the resolution of 11th of March, 1831; and other sums were paid to individuals, as in the previous accounts, for printing and distributing documents.

"During the first half-year of 1832 the item of stationary and printing was $12,134 16, of which $2,150 are stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th of March, 1831. There are also various individual payments, of which we notice $106 38 to Hunt, Tardiff, & Co., for one thousand copies of a review of Mr. Benton's speech; $200 for one thousand extra copies of the Saturday Courier; $1,176 to Gales & Seaton, for twenty thousand copies of 'a pamphlet concerning the bank,' and six thousand copies of the minority report relative to the bank; and $1,800 to Matthew St. Clair Clarke, for 'three hundred copies of Clarke & Hall's Bank Book.'

"During the last half-year of 1832 the item of stationary and printing rose to $26,543 72, of which $6,350 are stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831. Among the specified charges, we observe $821 78 to Jesper Harding, for printing a review of the veto; $1,371 04 to E. Olmstead, for four thousand copies of Mr. Ewing's speech, bank documents, and review of the veto; $4,106 13 to William Fry, for sixty-three thousand copies of Mr. Webster's speech, Mr. Adams's and Mr. McDuffie's reports, and the majority and minority reports; $295 for fourteen thousand extras of the 'Protector,' containing bank documents; $2,583 50 to Mr. Riddle, for printing and distributing reports, Mr. Webster's speech, &c.; $150 12 to Mr. Finnall, for printing the speeches of Messrs. Clay, Ewing, and Smith, and Mr. Adams's report; $1,512 75

to Mr. Clarke, for printing Mr. Webster's speech, and articles on the veto; and $2,422 65 to Mr. Hale, for fifty-two thousand five hundred copies of Mr. Webster's speech. There is also a charge of $4,040 paid on orders of the president, stating that it is for expenses in measures for protecting the bank against a run on the western branches.

"During the first half-year of 1833 the item of stationery and printing was $9,093 59, of which $2,600 are stated to have been on orders of the president, under the resolution of the 11th March, 1831. There is also a charge of Messrs. Gales & Seaton of $800 for printing the report of the exchange committee."

Mr. B. resumed: The bare reading of this statement shows that the funds of the bank, under the direction of the president of the bank, have been used, and largely used, in supplying the public with electioneering matter. He would make no comments upon that evidence. It needed none. It was a case in which the truth, in this modest, unpretending form of evidence, would do its business upon the understanding without the aid of argument or illustration. He would call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that there was a material portion of the funds used under the resolutions which were wholly unaccounted for, and a knowledge of which the Government directors in vain endeavored to obtain. It seemed to be a secret-service fund, such as the ministers of crowned heads had at their disposal in the European monarchies, and which was to be used for purposes which would not bear the light. A portion of the money so used by the president of the bank—the one-fifth part of it, for the United States owned the one-fifth of the stock—belonged to the people of the United States. It would then result in this: that while the two Houses of Congress could not by law even spend a dollar of the people's money, without specifying the object, and accounting for the expenditure, the same people might have their money taken out of the Bank of the United States by the president of the institution, and applied to objects unknown and unknowable to the people; unknown and unknowable, in fact, to the guardians of their interests, whom they had stationed in the bank to watch their moneys for them. With respect to these unaccounted for sums, he (Mr. B.) could say nothing positively; but by putting together a few dates and facts, about which there was no dispute, a presumptive case of interference with the newspaper press will be made out, which possibly may not be true, but which, according to the rules of human evidence, must stand for true until it was shown by those in whose power it is to show the truth that there was some mistake or error in it. The first date that he should refer to in this presumptive case was that of the resolution which clothed the president of the bank with general power over the preparation and publication of documents for the defence of the bank: it was the 11th day of March, 1831. The next date would be that disclosed in an answer to a question put by the investigating committee in the spring of 1832, to the president of the bank. It stands thus in the documental history of that committee's proceedings: "Question by Mr. Thomas: On what day did you pay the $15,000 to Silas E. Burrows?" "Answer by Mr. Biddle: On the 26th of March, 1831." The next fact was as to the place from which this money came; and as the president of the bank had given his own account of that matter, he (Mr. B.) thought it fair to give him the benefit of his own words. He would, therefore, read his account of it, as he gave it in evidence to the investigating committee. Mr. B. reads:

"These notes were discounted by the exchange committee, under the resolution just referred to. They were done at the request of Mr. Silas E. Burrows, of New York. Mr. Burrows had, some time before, brought me a particular letter of introduction from an old friend, Mr.

Monroe, the ex-President. Mr. Burrows had been very liberal to Mr. Monroe in his pecuniary misfortunes, and he had recently received from the President of the United States particular thanks and commendations for his generous conduct towards a Russian ship of war. I understood him to be a very rich merchant, of a kind and benevolent disposition, and constantly engaged in doing acts of liberality. In one of his visits to Philadelphia, he said he was desirous of befriending Mr. Noah, and assisting him in the purchase of a share in a newspaper, and he asked if the bank would discount the notes of these parties; adding that, although as a mere merchant he did not wish to appear as a borrower, or to put his name on paper not mercantile, yet he would at any time do so whenever it might be necessary to secure the bank. I do not recollect whether he then mentioned the time which the notes would have to run. The committee, being authorized to discount any paper, the security of which they might approve, agreed to do them. As Mr. Burrows was going out of town, I gave him the money out of my own funds; and the notes were afterwards put into my possession. They remained with me a long time, as I had no occasion to use the funds; nor was it till the close of the year that my attention was called to them by the circumstance that, as a new board of directors and a new committee of exchange would soon be appointed, the same committee which made the loan should consummate it. I had seen also, in the public prints, many reproaches against the bank for lending money to printers and editors, and I was unwilling that any loan made by the bank should seem to be a private loan from one of its officers. Having no use for the money, it would have been perfectly convenient to let the loan remain as it was; but I thought it right that every thing done by the bank should always be distinctly known and avowed; and I therefore gave the notes to the chairman of the committee, Mr. Thomas B. Cope, who entered them on the books."

Having read this statement, Mr. B. went on to say that he was not arguing upon it now, but merely putting circumstances together to make out a presumptive case, which would stand for a true case until those who could clear it up should come forward and do so. Pursuing this dry and unambitious course, the next circumstance which he would bring into the array was the hégira of Burrows, whose flight from the marshals, during the sitting of the investigating committee, left them wholly unenlightened by his account of the manner in which he became possessed of this large sum of money for an object so remote from his usual mercantile operations, and with which he did not think it prudent to mix his name. Mr. Noah, however, supplied, in some degree, the absence of Mr. Burrows; and his account of the $15,000 will be the fourth circumstance which he should bring together in the formation of this case. It is this: "Being on terms of intimacy with Mr. Silas E. Burrows, I mentioned the circumstance to him; and, believing that he possessed facilities, proposed that he should loan me fifteen thousand dollars to effect the purchase, (one-half of the Courier and Enquirer,) on condition that ten per centum should be paid every six months, with interest, until the whole was liquidated. He told me that his mercantile operations were extensive, and that he could not well take that sum from his capital, but that he approved of the purchase, and would apply to his father in Connecticut for a loan to that amount. In a few days he informed me that he was going to Connecticut for his father, and subsequently that his father had arrived in town, and invited me to meet him at his house in Bleecker street, where, after much preliminary conversation and arrangements, I gave my notes to Mr. Burrows, senior, endorsed by Mr. Webb, and a commission of two and a half per cent. to Mr. Burrows, junior, and received from Mr. Burrows, senior, his paper, which was subsequently cashed by Mr. Stewart, the father-in-law of Mr. Webb.

It was not for six months after negotiating this loan that final payment was made by Mr. Burrows. Judge, therefore, of my astonishment at having heard it suggested that that sum in money was loaned by Mr. Biddle for my use, when, throughout the negotiation, the name of the United States Bank was not even mentioned; and I never for a moment suspected that the loan emanated from any other source than Mr. Enoch Burrows, of Connecticut." The fifth fact which Mr. B. had to arrange into this picture was, that the supposed Enoch Burrows, father to Silas, who figured as a great money-lender in this transaction, was not the real Connecticut Enoch, father of Silas, but a sort of fac simile representation of the old gentleman—a sort of John Doe or Richard Roe—who had been acquired for the occasion from the streets of New York, and was dismissed from the stage (when he had finished his part) with a present of half a crown and a glass of grog for the trouble he had taken in sitting in dumb-show during the progress of the negotiation, and nodding his head with pantomimic gravity, in token of assent, when the solemn affair was concluded. Having put these five circumstances side by side, Mr. B. would crown them by a quotation from the letter of the famous William Cobbett to President Jackson, which had just appeared in the United States, and, among other things, described the manner of performing a certain operation in England.

"There is, however, (says Mr. Cobbett) a 'delicacy' in the manner of * * * here, which is wholly unknown to your tribe of paper money ruffians. The press is as * * * here as it is there; and it swallows ten thousand times the amount of * * * that yours swallows; but the manner of * * * is so indirect, the source is at so great a distance from the reservoir, the stream meanders through so many and such covert channels, that it would take a year for the most acute man in the world, though invested with full powers to send for persons and papers, to trace the * * * back from the last hand to the first." The sixth circumstance which Mr. B. would group into this cluster was the fact, already proved, that the Government directors have labored in vain to obtain from the president of the bank and the other directors any account whatever of the application of a sum, used under the resolution of March 11th, 1831, of more than twenty thousand dollars, and yet wholly ignorant of the uses and persons to which it was applied, their application for information being constantly rejected, although it was declared by Mr. Biddle, when he gave up the notes of Webb and Noah to be put on the books of the bank, that he did so "because he thought it right that every thing done by the bank should always be distinctly known and avowed." The seventh incident which Mr. B. would weave into this web was the circumstance of an offer of pecuniary aid made to the editor of the "New York Standard," upon certain conditions, in the same month of March, 1831, a few days after the passage of the famous resolution of the 11th of that month, and nearly contemporaneously with the generous assistance extended to the editor of the Courier and Enquirer. The eighth and last of these collated circumstances was, that, before the loan through Burrows, the Courier and Enquirer abounded with editorial articles against the Bank of the United States; after that time it abounded with like articles in favor of it. With this array of dates and facts, Mr. B. would pause, and submit it to the Senate and the American people to say if there was not a presumptive case made out against the Bank of the United States, which must stand for true, until it is cleared up by a full and public examination.

Mr. B. said he drew to the close of what he had to say on this head, namely, the surrender of the funds of the bank to its president, without limitation of time or amount, for the simulated pretext of defending itself against the assaults of the President in his message of December, 1829. The pregnant reflections which would result from the details he had gone through would force themselves upon the minds of all persons. In one point of view only would he present one of the circumstances over again to the Senate, and that for the purpose of showing in reality what this exchange committee was, which has so prominently appeared upon the scene, superseding and eclipsing the entire board of directors.

It would be observed that the arrangement for the $15,000 took place entirely between Mr. Burrows and Mr. Biddle. The exchange committee was not even present at the application. The whole arrangement was entered as a matter of course upon the books of the committee, when Mr. Biddle gave in the notes which had been discounted; and other discounts were subsequently made in continuation of the same transaction, until $52,000 were loaned, and years allowed for repaying it. In this point of view the important conclusion will present itself to the minds of all candid and impartial inquirers, that, in transferring the great business of the bank from the board prescribed by the charter to a subaltern committee named by himself, the president of the bank has, in reality, constituted himself sole governor of the Bank of the United States; receives and entertains, in his private apartments, the application for loans which ought to be made at the board; makes what loans he pleases—to what amount he pleases—upon what security he pleases—upon what terms and conditions he pleases—to what persons he pleases—for what objects he pleases; and that the authority under which he uses this vast and irresponsible power is an authority without limitation as to time; and, from all the circumstances of its avowed origin and notorious use, is an authority intended to be continued until that race of Presidents shall be set aside who will commit the crime of assaulting the bank, as President Jackson did in his message of 1829.

Must such a bank have the further keeping of the public moneys? Is it not enough that it has so long had them for such incredible purposes? Is it not enough that it now has seven millions of the public money in its stock, which it wields as it pleases? Is it not enough that the whole amount of its notes are receivable in payment of the public dues, and derive a credit and circulation from that circumstance which enables them to traverse the continent, and pass from hand to hand, without calling at the doors of the bank for any part of that ten millions of specie which lies inactive in the vaults of the bank, while business men are screwed to the uttermost for the last dollar, and running from broker to broker to purchase money at any price, for any brief period that it can be obtained? Is not all this enough for such a bank, thus governed, without exacting the use of the future deposits for the two years it has to live?

The approaching termination of the charter, Mr. B. said, was the last of the reasons for removing the deposits which he should examine, though among the first assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury. That reason has been assailed in several different ways on this floor, but in each and every of these assaults a ready repulse awaited the assailant. It had been denied that the presidential election was any test of public opinion upon the question of continuing the charter of the bank; and this denial had been made by the same Senator, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who exulted on the floor of the Senate on the issue of life and death joined between President Jackson and the bank, at the return of the famous veto message in July, 1832, and who quoted the re-election of President Jackson as proof that the protective system was abandoned by the people, and gave that as a reason for abandoning it himself. The fact was, that the re-election of President Jackson was full evidence of the sentiments of the people against the bank. It was also full evidence of their decision in favor of the President's often declared policy on the subject of the tariff; namely, no surplus revenue; no unnecessary or unconstitutional expenditure; reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government; and incidental protection to essential branches of national industry. The re-election of the President was a proof incontrovertible of public sentiment on both heads, and much more decidedly pronounced in the case of the bank than in that of the tariff; because the bank, under the lead of its political friends, had made up an issue between itself and the President, and fought him a pitched battle throughout the Union for victory or death. This was known to every body; and broad denials or special pleading evasions were equally unavailable to obscure the fact, or obliterate its recollection. Mr. B. would assume, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury rested and remained upon an inattackable position, when he affirmed that the re-election of President Jackson was the death-warrant of the American people against the federal bank.

Another denial from the same source was to the fact that the present bank would not be rechartered: the Secretary of the Treasury held the affirmative of that proposition; the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] the negative of it. He (Mr. B.) would only say that the people had decided in the affirmative, not only in the re-election of the President, but also in the election of members to the present House of Representatives, about one hundred and sixty of whom, out of two hundred and forty, stood before their constituents as opposed to the recharter at the time of their election; and he would not suppose that it would happen in the Congress of the United States, as it happened in the first reformed Parliament of the British empire, which assembled a year ago, that the large majority elected against the bank should evaporate out of the crucible when put to the test of fire, and leave but a small minority,—a lump of pure gold, indeed—where their shadowy forms had lately been embodied. He would not now anticipate such a tremendous evaporation of human forms as this result would seem to imply, although the prodigy had just been witnessed in England, when three hundred pledged members against the renewed charter of the Bank of England suddenly dissipated into thin vapor, like the Genii of the Sealed Casket, in the Arabian Nights, disappeared from the vision, and left but fifty “human forms divine” where three hundred had but that moment stood. He (Mr. B.) would take things as they now stood: a large, and, he trusted, an immovable majority of the House of Representatives, were fresh from the people, and decidedly opposed to the renewed charter. He would also take leave to say, that many gentlemen who stood in the attitude of self-oppugnation at the granting of the present charter will have to appear under the double aspect of the same individual representation, if they go for the recharter now. For the ground has changed under their feet a second time. The reasons which enabled them to make war upon their old principles, and abandon their old grounds in 1816, have now all disappeared; not one of them remains; so that, in going a second time for the existence of a bank which they once condemned, they will have to take a second departure from their original principles, and justify themselves a second time, upon a class of reasons standing in the exact relation of antipodes to those they justified upon before.

In the present, therefore, Mr. B., taking things as they were, must hold the affirmative that the Bank of the United States would not be rechartered; though he was free to admit that the maintenance of that opinion would largely depend upon the issue of the present contest between the Bank of the United States and the Government of the United States, for the restoration of the deposits.

Dropping his own opinions, he went to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, expressed in his assignment of reasons, that the bank charter must expire upon its own limitation within two years of this time; and maintained that the Secretary was bound to entertain that opinion from the circumstances which surrounded the question; and, entertaining the opinion, he was bound to act upon it, and to take it into consideration, in deciding the great question of removing the deposits. He did take it into consideration, and has presented the results of that consideration to the Senate in a statement of reasons and facts, which declamation and sarcasm have ventured to assail, while logic and argument have kept at a distance. The reasons of the Secretary are spread at large in that admirable state paper now under consideration, which placed him at once, or rather developed his true position at once, among the first statesmen of his day. Mr. B. would barely recapitulate the heads of these reasons, referring for amplifications and illustrations to the report of the Secretary himself.

Premising that these reasons had reference to the primary position, that it was necessary for the bank now to begin to prepare for the winding up of its concerns, he (Mr. B.) would recall to the recollection of the Senate that this was the precise reason given by the bank in its memorial to Congress two years ago. It wanted the question of recharter decided, that, if denied, it might begin at once to prepare for the close of its concerns. Now, said Mr. B., if this reason was good four years before the expiration of the charter, it was certainly still better two years before it. Let us then see what were the preparations which the bank had to make to be able to come to a close, without a shock to the community. First, there was the amount of its notes in circulation, about 18,000,000 dollars, which would have to be withdrawn; and, if called in upon a sudden, and in mass, would leave a vacuum for some time before silver and gold and the larger notes of other banks would fill it up. It would take some time to get into circulation the 22,000,000 of hard dollars which the bank had abstracted from the West, and of which it had itself shipped, or sold to others to ship, about the one-half to Europe. In the next place, was the depreciation of these notes in the hands of the distant holders; (for, on account of the wide circulation which the universal receivability of these notes in payment of public dues gave them, they circulated at all distances from the places of their issue;) and as the mass of these mis-called notes consisted of branch drafts, to which the penalty of twelve per cent. for non-payment would not attach, the bank had only to refuse to redeem them except at the branches where they issued, and immediately all these drafts, or unaccepted orders, as they might be more properly called, became practically unconvertible in the hands of the holders, on account of the distance of the branch where issued; would fall, of course, into the hands of brokers and money dealers; and the actual holders would have to take what they would give. In the third place, was the amount of debts due the bank, say 62,000,000 dollars. It is evident, if this amount of debt remained entire, to be called for in a mass at the expiration of the charter, and that when 18,000,000 of paper were retiring from circulation, that payment would be impossible; the cities of the United States, wherever a branch was established, might be put up at auction, and bid in at nominal prices, by the bank attorneys, for the benefit of the bank, as the city of Cincinnati was put up, sold out, and bid in, about a dozen years ago.

It is evident that, with the community thus as its mercy, it would seize the opportunity to agonize the country with suffering and distress, until their cries and prayers should extort a recharter from Congress. This it could do; this, the scene enacting before our eyes proves it would do. But by withdrawing the deposits—not withdrawing them, but merely ceasing to put them in that bank—the institution would be put under the necessity of commencing a gradual reduction of her business; a necessity for gradual reduction which she has made the pretext for a rapid and excessive one, for producing much real and greatly exaggerated distress in the principal commercial cities; and from which results the conviction upon every candid mind, that, if the mere cessation to receive the deposits hereafter, for the two years the charter has to run, could either afford the bank a pretext or lay it under a necessity for curtailing its debts, and oppressing the community as it has done, how much more excessive and intolerable must that curtailment and oppression have been, if left to the last moment of the existence of the institution!

Mr. B. said he had now finished the view which he proposed to take of the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the public deposits. He trusted that the facts and reasons which he had brought to bear upon the question, in addition to the intrinsic weight and palpable force of the Secretary's reasoning, were sufficient to show that the reasons assigned by him were sufficient to justify the act that he had done; at all events, that they ought not to be condemned as insufficient, without a rigorous investigation into their truth. This investigation was what he demanded; he did not want a verdict, either for or against the bank, without a trial. He believed that all those opposed to the bank were in favor of investigation. He considered the House of Representatives, as being the grand inquest of the nation, the appropriate branch of the Legislature for originating accusations, and particularly charged with the moneyed concerns of the people, to be the proper place for investigating the truth of the charges against the institution. He would prefer that the whole matter should be left in that House, which was now fully occupied with the subject; but the control of this subject was in the hands of the friends of the bank, and, if they would prosecute it here, he must demand investigation into the truth of the Secretary's reasons before they were condemned.

Mr. B. concluded with moving to strike out the second resolution, and insert "That Nicholas Biddle, president of the bank of the United States, and — be summoned to appear at the bar of the Senate on the — day of —, then and there to be examined on oath, touching the causes of the late large curtailment of debts due to the Bank of the United States, and the manner of conducting the said curtailment; also, to be then and there examined touching the application of the moneys of the bank to electioneering and political objects."

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3.

TRADE WITH THE WEST INDIES.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. SPRAGUE, was taken up for consideration.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, so far as the documents and returns received will permit, the amount of trade between the United States and the British North American colonies, the British West Indies, the Danish West Indies, and the Swedish West Indies, since the 30th day of September, 1832, distinguishing the amount of American, British, and other foreign tonnage, which has entered and departed to and from those places respectively, or the United States generally. Also, the amount of imports and exports of American and foreign produce, distinguishing between the same.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that his object in offering this resolution was to obtain an official statement of the present condition of the trade with the British colonies, insular or continental, lying in this hemisphere. This was considered a subject of deep interest some years ago, and he was persuaded it had lost none of its intrinsic importance. It was known that this subject had been a matter of controversy between the United States and Great Britain from the existence of the Government up to the year 1830, when the celebrated "arrangement," as it had been denominated, was made of the colonial trade. It was strictly a question of navigation, affecting the carrying trade of the United States. The whole matter of controversy was, whether the United States should have an equal and fair participation in the carrying its own produce from this country to the ports for which it was ultimately destined, or whether an undue advantage should be given to Great Britain. Up to the year 1830, from the superiority of the American navigators, and the natural advantages which their country possessed from position in relation to that trade, the United States had had nine-tenths of the carrying trade existing between it and the British colonial possessions. The amount of British tonnage did not equal one-tenth of the American up to the period he had mentioned. How far it had been increased since the arrangement of the carrying trade in 1830 would be seen by the public documents. During the first year after this arrangement, the British tonnage in the direct trade to the West Indies arose to ninety-six per cent., and to the North American colonies exceeded the American; for every 100 tons of American there were 110 tons of British; and in the succeeding year, ending September 30, 1832, the trade seems to have been still more diverted in the circuitous route through the northern colonies in British bottoms. The tonnage which departed from the United States was, in the direct trade, 66,769 American, and 19,357 foreign; while to the North American colonies on our borders there were 66,056 American, and 146,292 foreign—the foreign more than doubling the American.

The whole amount of tonnage which cleared from the United States for the British West Indies and British American colonies both during the year ending September, 1832, was 132,825 American, and 165,649 foreign. Thus the foreign tonnage, which, prior to the arrangement, was less than one-tenth, has, under and by virtue of that diplomatic arrangement, actually exceeded the American! Such were the facts disclosed by the documents heretofore communicated, a tabular statement from which he then held in his hand, well worthy the attention of the Senate; and he wished, by means of the resolution which he had offered, to ascertain the state of the trade to the most recent date.

The resolution was then adopted.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed this subject, and Mr. BENTON continued his speech (as given above) until the usual hour of adjournment; when he yielded the floor, and The Senate adjourned to Monday.

French Spoliations.—Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, JANUARY 6.

After disposing of some morning business, the Senate resumed the subject of the depositories, and Mr. BENTON continued his speech, (as given above,) until the hour of adjournment, without concluding.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 7.

MEMORIALS RESPECTING THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of New York, on the subject of the pecuniary distress of the country, and the removal of the depositories, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On this reference being made,

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said that several papers of a similar character had been referred already to the Committee on Finance. Among others, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania (not now in his place) had presented to the Senate memorials from several banks in the city of Philadelphia, and other parts of Pennsylvania, ascribing the present distress (for no milder name could be given to it) in the commercial community to the removal of the public depositories. Undoubtedly this subject could not have entirely escaped the Committee on Finance. In addition to these papers, thus referred to the committee in relation to this matter, it was notorious, and was, at this moment, meeting so much attention in every part of the country, that the Senate could not suppose the committee had overlooked it. But he (Mr. W.) would take occasion to say that the committee could not, with any great propriety, submit their sentiments to the Senate and the country, until they should be officially in possession of the letter of the Secretary, giving his reasons for the course he had thought proper to pursue relative to the depositories.

At an earlier day he should have made a motion to refer that paper to the Committee on Finance, but from the great unwillingness he felt to deprive gentlemen, on all sides of the House, of an opportunity of addressing to the Senate such views as they might wish to submit.

He (Mr. W.) rose merely to say that, as early as he could, with the decorum and respect which he felt for gentlemen on all sides of the Senate, with that perfect disposition which he entertained to accord to every gentleman a fair and full opportunity of delivering his sentiments on such an interesting occasion, he would move that the report of the Secretary be committed to the Committee on Finance. If that course should be taken, the subject would be properly brought before that committee, could be brought before the Senate, and the results of its deliberations presented to the Senate, with no unnecessary delay.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed this subject, and Mr. BENTON concluded his speech, (as given above,) when,

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Select Committee on French Spoliations, reported the bill referred to that committee, with sundry amendments, which were read.

Mr. W. then said that, as it was important that this subject should be discussed at as early a period of the session as possible, he should now, in compliance with the opinion of the committee, move to postpone the consideration of the bill till Wednesday, the 5th of February, and to make it the special order for that day.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CLAY on this subject, together with the amendments moved thereto by Mr. BENTON,

Mr. SOUTHARD, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said that he had come prepared to express the views which had aided him in making up his decision as to his own vote, but an amendment had been introduced to which he did not design to apply any of his observations. According to all parliamentary usage, while this amendment was pending, he was bound to address himself to it. It was, therefore, his wish that the question should be at once taken on the amendment, and that, until that was done, he might reserve what he had to say. He hoped the question would at once be taken on the amendment, and he desired that it should be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORSYTH said that the question had come on him unexpectedly. The mover of the amendment [Mr. BENTON] was not present, and he would therefore move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was lost.

Mr. GRUNDY said he was not disposed to vote for the resolutions in the form in which they were offered, but he wished the Senator from Missouri to be present. He thought the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey as to the disposal of the amendment a proper one, and wished that a delay of a few minutes might take place until the Senator from Missouri could be sent for. He had no desire to say a single word on the subject.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, considered the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey as incorrect, and that the whole subject was now as completely open for discussion as if the amendment were withdrawn.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished to make one remark. The subject which had been discussed, and the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, grew out of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and related to the removal of the depositories. The amendment which had been presented by the Senator from Missouri had no relevance whatever to that question. It was entirely a distinct proposition, which the Senator from Missouri might present in a different form; when, if he desired the testimony of the president of the United States Bank, or any other testimony, he could submit a proposal for a committee of the Senate, before which it might be obtained upon oath. But now, while the reasons of the Secretary were under discussion, the Senator from Missouri had closed a four days' speech, by making a proposition which was absurd, and had no possible connexion with the subject. Therefore he thought that the Senator from New Jersey was correct in drawing a line between the amendment and the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. He hoped that the question would be at once taken on the amendment, to which, in another view, he objected, as placing the Senate in the position of a grand jury putting an individual on his trial.

Mr. FORSYTH repeated that he could not have anticipated that the question would have been taken this morning. He had come to the Senate expecting to hear the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey, and he was not himself prepared to vote on the amendment. He had no objection, however, that the question should be taken, but he desired to see every member in his seat, especially as the amendment had been so severely, and, as he thought, so unjustly assailed by the Senator from Mississippi. He thought that the amendment had a reference to the subject under discussion, and referred the Senate to the reasons assigned for the removal of the depositories, by the Secretary of the Treasury, among which are the enormous curtailments of the issues of the bank, and the application of its funds to electioneering purposes. Now, the amendment had reference to both these points. He was not quite satisfied that the course of the Senator from Missouri was the correct one; but assuredly the amendment had reference to the subject, and did not deserve the epithets used by the gentleman from Mississippi.

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 8, 1834.]

He was not disposed to take the reasons of the Secretary on one hand, or the argument of the bank on the other, without further investigation; but he wished that examination to be by a committee of the Senate.

[Here Mr. BENTON came in.]

Mr. KANE moved a division of the question, so that it be first taken on striking out Mr. CLAY's second resolution.

The CHAIR decided the motion to be out of order.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. BENTON, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Grundy, Hill, Kane, Linn, Morris, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Silabee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins—34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOUTHARD then rose and said: The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri having been removed out of the way by the vote of the Senate, the debate returns upon the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky; and these present subjects of the first magnitude for the grave consideration of Congress.

For sixteen years, said Mr. S., the money belonging to the Union has been kept in a position selected by Congress, under the authority of law—in a depository suited to its safety, to the convenience of the Government, and the interests of the people. Within three or four months past this money has been removed and distributed among twenty or thirty State banks, in positions not selected by Congress, nor under its control, without consulting the representatives of the people, and in violation of their recently expressed opinion. The place of its former deposit was created for the express purpose, by the legislative power of the country; the places of its present deposit were not created by Congress, nor are they under its control, but chosen according to the discretion of an executive officer. The order for the change was given by the Secretary of the Treasury, under and by virtue of a construction of his powers and authority as Secretary; and it operates not only on the money now in the treasury, but on all which may hereafter be acquired.

We have not, therefore, before us mere questions regarding the temporary possession of office. We are not to deliberate and decide upon the policy of sustaining this or that man, nor whether it is wise to recharter a bank, nor how we shall settle a dispute between an individual President of the United States and his advisers on the one part, and a moneyed corporation on the other. The questions rise higher; they affect the management and control of the whole treasure of the Union, and the construction which is, now and hereafter, to be put upon delegated powers, under the fundamental and written laws of the land. Our decision, in its consequences, will be felt when present party conflicts shall be over; when aspirants for place and placemen shall have passed by and been forgotten; and they demand, at our hands, all the calmness of deliberation which the exciting circumstances in which we find ourselves will admit.

The Secretary, in compliance with the command of law, has submitted his reasons for the acts which he has performed; and the Senate, as a part of Congress, is called upon either to approve or condemn both the acts themselves, and the reasons which are offered for their justification. We are, therefore, required to examine—

1. The acts which have been done.

2. The principles avowed as the authority for these acts; and

3. The reasons assigned as rendering them necessary and proper at the time.

1. The Secretary of the Treasury has ordered the debtors of the Government, and the inferior officers under the control of his department, to deposit the public money which may now be or may come hereafter into their hands, from the various sources of revenue, in more than twenty State banks, created by several of the States, and holding their corporate powers and authorities under State legislation. This order must, in its nature, be prospective, and relate not only to the money now in the public treasury, but to all that which shall be acquired by the Government and people of the Union.

The terms on which it is to be received and kept, and by which it is to be secured, are found in the agreements entered into between the Secretary and the several banks—copies of two or three of which are appended to his report, and found in pages 36, 37, and 40. And as Congress has not authority over these banks, and this agreement is the security provided for the public money, its various items require examination. We must look into the agreement, or we cannot understand the nature and effect of the conduct of the Secretary, nor the situation in which the money now is.

By the first item, each bank agrees "to receive and enter to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States all sums of money offered to be deposited on account of the United States, whether offered in gold or silver coin, in notes of any bank which are convertible into coin in its immediate vicinity, or in notes of any bank which it is, for the time being, in the habit of receiving!"

It is apparent, therefore, that they have agreed to receive money on account of the United States only, and not such money as, being in the hands of officers or disbursing agents, may be deposited under the provisions of the law of 3d March, 1809. If the latter shall be ordered to be placed in them, the agreement affords no protection to it. The extent of the agreement deserves attention, as it will be found that the Secretary has ordered money to be deposited there which is not embraced in this condition. The money, also, which they are bound to receive, is not of the notes of all the selected banks, nor of any of them, unless they are convertible into coin in their immediate vicinity, or be such as they are in the habit of receiving at the time it is offered; in other words, such as they may choose. Notes of selected banks in Virginia, or elsewhere, offered in payment of a debt in New York, they are under no obligation to receive, and must, of necessity, generally refuse for their own safety.

The second item provides that "if the deposits shall exceed one-half of the capital stock of the bank actually paid in, collateral security, satisfactory to the Secretary, shall be given for its safe keeping and faithful disbursement," with a proviso that the Secretary may demand collateral security when the deposits do not exceed one-half of the capital. There is, then, no present security for the public money but the solvency of the banks. It has been placed in banks selected by the Secretary, without taking other security; and whether there is any to be given hereafter depends on the will—of whom? Of the Congress of the United States? Of the constitutional guardians of the public purse? No; but on the will of the Secretary of the Treasury alone. And what is the value of that security, which results from the present condition and the charters of these banks? It can only be commensurate with the powers of their charters and the soundness of their condition. Do Senators know its value? Has the Secretary deigned to inform us? Did he himself know it when he acted? Are Senators informed whether there be not restrictive clauses which forbid the agreement on their part? Did the Secretary know it?

JAN. 8, 1834.]

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

He affirms that they are banks of undoubted credit, but without an examination of their charters; and, with regard to some of them, without the possibility of his acquiring the knowledge within the time in which he acted. A comparison of dates, which are before the Senate, justifies this declaration. That these banks were not altogether strong and safe, is apparent from his declaration that, within a short period, "so far from being able to relieve the community, they found themselves under the necessity of providing for their own safety."—(p. 9.) And, within a few days, the stockholders of one of them have rejected the deposits; and we are told that one ground of their decision was, that they were incompetent, by their charter, to fulfil the conditions of the agreement; the others rested on the odious nature of the terms of the agreement itself.

By the fourth item the bank agrees to pay warrants and drafts, and to transfer the public money without charge, "but the Secretary shall give reasonable notice of the time when such transfer shall be required." What is reasonable notice of the time when a transfer will be wanted? Who is to be the judge on this point? Suppose a transfer is directed from New York to New Orleans in five days, or in fifty; will it be deemed "reasonable?" The bank may say it is not, and there may be a failure to meet the wants of the Government, without apparent violation of the contract. There is no escape from this conclusion, but by regarding the whole discretion on this subject as within the will of the Secretary; and this would place the banks at his mercy, and under his unrestricted dominion.

The fifth item requires of the banks the performance of all the "services now performed by the Bank of the United States, or which may be lawfully required of it, in the vicinity of said contracting bank." They are to render these services in their vicinity, and not elsewhere. Thus has the Secretary made an entire surrender of all the advantages which the Congress of the United States, acting in their high legislative capacity, had declared that the Government should possess, except such as may be performed in the immediate neighborhood of these favored banks.

In the sixth item, taken in connexion with the third, there is another provision which strikes me as improper and dangerous. They authorize weekly returns from the banks, of their entire condition, to the Secretary and Treasurer; the submission of all their books and transactions to a critical examination by the Secretary, or any agent duly authorized by him, whenever he shall require it; and the appointment by him of one or more agents to examine and report to him, the banks paying "an equitable proportion of his or their expenses and compensation, according to such apportionment as may be made by the Secretary."

There is no restriction as to the nature and extent of the examination into their books and transactions, except the "current accounts of individuals, or, as far as is admissible without a violation of their charters." Transactions of all kinds, of every character, are examinable by him or his agents. The restriction, as to current accounts of individuals, is useless, and worse than useless, if the reasonings of the Secretary, in the 14th page of his report, be correct. He there spurns the objection which relates to private accounts, and argues that these may be the very grounds on which action against the Bank of the United States is to be justified. Besides, what is the restriction resulting from their charters? It is not known; those charters were not before the Secretary, and are not before us.

In the appointment of agents there is no limit, either as to numbers or compensation, but the will of the Secretary. One thousand, or five thousand dollars, may be given for the services of each. And report, at this moment, assigns a large compensation to one designated agent, whose name creates no feeling of confidence in the purity with which his trust will be discharged.

Thus is this most important power, this unlimited control, assumed by the Secretary. The consequences of such provisions need scarcely be exhibited before the Senate. The last item authorizes the Secretary to discharge the banks "whenever, in his opinion, the public interest may require it;" whenever whim, caprice, party policy, the executive order, may demand it. This is the tenure by which the selected fiscal agents of the Government hold their offices! these the terms on which they are to discharge their duty to the public!

In presenting this agreement the Secretary has neglected to tell us when it was executed with much the greater number of the banks. The dates of only three or four of the contracts are here. When he was about to present himself before Congress, with his reasons for the removal of the public money, was it fair to make this omission? One of these reasons is the curtailment of issues by the Bank of the United States, at a specific period. The dates of these contracts, and the action of the department in relation to them, were necessary in forming a just estimate of the conduct of the bank in this particular; and yet the Secretary conceals this important information, which must have had a direct effect upon the action of the bank.

To my apprehension it is apparent that, in ordering the deposits of the public money to be thereafter made in these State banks, the Secretary has been grossly negligent of his duty. He had not made the necessary inquiries; he acted without the proper information; and we are now called upon to justify his conduct, when it affects the whole treasure of the nation, and puts it in jeopardy. Between the 18th, when the decision was made—the 20th, when the notice was given in the Globe—the 26th, when the order issued—there was not time for obtaining the information, and forming the contracts. Nor was one of them made before the order was given. No financier, however skilful and prompt, could have made the inquiries, and executed the instruments, which the interests of the whole people demanded on the occasion. There can be no relief to the Secretary from the fact that an agent had previously been appointed. Of that agency, and its effects, I shall be disposed to speak hereafter. His appointment could have been made only about the last of July, or first of August, but a few days before the order was given; time enough, perhaps, to inquire about some of the banks in a few of the commercial cities; but as to all the rest, from Maine to Louisiana, he had no opportunity to examine into their condition and their charters; and if he had, the Secretary, under the circumstances, could only have acted under his dictation and instructions, as agent of the agent. When the Secretary affirms their undoubted credit, I mean not to impeach or call it in question; but I am not willing to rely on the mere assertion of such a fact, when involving the most important consequences to the country. If he has acted as he seems to have done, he has been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. He has made his selection, entered into his contracts, without proper caution; and then, in violation of law, taken money from the treasury, to enable the other party to maintain its solvency, and perform its part of the agreement. Resort to illegal means to maintain the ability of the banks is a strange evidence of their competency to discharge the duties assigned to them.

There is another cause of deep dissatisfaction with this act. Where is the authority of the Secretary to make this great contract, in which millions are concerned? If he had no legal right to make it, the contract is void; and your security, such as it purports to be, is gone; and every thing in relation to the safety of the public money rests on the honor and honesty of the receiving banks. I am willing to trust them as far, perhaps, as others. But this is not the kind of security which the laws demand. If the Secretary had the authority, whence is it derived? Where is the law that confers it? I can find none. The 6th section of the act of 1st May, 1820, (3 Sto. 1777,) directs that "no contract shall thereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfilment;" and excepting, also, for the subsistence and clothing of the army and navy, and by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those departments. Was this contract, then, authorized by a previous law? or is that difficulty to be overcome by the argument of the Secretary, that he was authorized to remove the deposits; and that "the power to remove necessarily draws after it the power to select the places where the public money shall be deposited?" This is a non sequitur in itself, and does not go far enough for his justification. The power to direct the deposits to be removed does not necessarily draw after it the selection of the places in which, and the terms upon which, it shall be kept. Unless Congress have conferred both powers on the same individual, they do not exist. The Secretary, like every other officer, is but the agent of the law—to act by the law, and not without law. The duty of deciding upon the propriety of a measure may be imposed on one officer, and its execution be intrusted to another; one may be required to decide when money shall be removed, while the responsibility for its safe keeping rests upon another. This is the case in numerous instances, and in all the departments. It is especially so in regard to the finances. The law establishing the Treasury Department gives to the Secretary the general duty of arrangement and direction, but creates other officers for execution. An exhibition of their relative duties will be required in the course of my remarks; for the present, it is sufficient to state that the Treasurer, and not the Secretary, is the officer bound to receive and keep the money, wherever the place of safe keeping is not expressly prescribed by Congress. He, and not the Secretary, is to decide in what particular places it shall be kept, and the conditions and contracts under which it shall be kept. The argument of the Secretary, that he must select the places, is not only inconclusive, but, if true, it does not go to the extent necessary for his justification. He must not only have the right to designate the places, but he must have the right to make the contracts by which the money is to be kept. Believing that he has no such power, I cannot but regard his act as a direct and open violation of the law of the land. He was in too much haste to execute his purposes before the meeting of Congress, to permit him to do what his duty demanded that he should do, and in that haste assumed powers never granted, and has put your whole treasury at hazard. You have no law nor any valid contract by which it is secured.

Removal of the Deposites.

The extent of power and influence which this act draws to the Secretary, and through him to the Executive, upon his avowed principles, is enormous, dangerous to the interests of the people and the liberties of the country. It places all the selected banks, and through them many other State institutions, at the mercy of the Secretary of the Treasury. He may, at will, require security for the public money, or he may require none. He may require the payment of heavy expenses, and compensation for his agencies, and fasten them on whom he chooses. He may decide, at pleasure, which of them must transfer money from one extreme of the Union to another, and when and where they shall transfer it—acts which they may, and probably will, be incompetent to perform; and he may discharge them, without warning, from the service of the Government. All this he may do for causes entirely unconnected with the business of the treasury, and in no way concerning the public interest. There is no responsibility upon him; they have no means of resistance. And his power of favoritism, in the deposit of money, distribution of duties, and compensation, is as unlimited as his power of injury and injustice; and he has every possible temptation to its exercise for the worst of purposes. Subservience to his will will become the ready and sure road to benefits. Sir, the very act is calculated to create an army of servile sycophants and supporters. Whether it will produce that result is yet to be shown. The promptness with which the representatives of some of the banks have volunteered their defence of him, and the manner in which his favor was received by at least one, give no very auspicious augury as to the result, but too clearly indicate the effect upon their dispositions. The Secretary was very promptly informed of "the high sense entertained by the directors of one of the banks of the honor conferred upon it by so distinguished a mark of his confidence," (p. 37)—a quick stooping to degradation.

This state of things is prescribed, not by the Legislature, but by a Secretary, and is not dependent upon and regulated by law, but by his discretion. And the man who presumes thus to act tells Congress that his acts are under the control of the President. He says, in effect, "I have no official will; the President may order me as he pleases; the whole is at the command of the President." If there has been a larger or more dangerous stretch of executive power and influence, I have not discovered it. If Senators are prepared to meet the consequences of such an assumption, they have but to approve the reasons of the Secretary. The day is not long passed by when it would have met the deep toned execrations of the present supporters of executive infallibility.

The law which created the bank, which directed where and how the public treasure was to be kept, and what was to be done, did not so regulate this subject. The intercourse between the Government and the bank, in relation to the public money, was fixed and authorized by law. The acts directed to be done, or omitted, were, under it, matters of legal right, not of executive favor. The law was paramount and triumphant. There was no temptation to favoritism or corruption. But, under the recent innovation, while such unlimited powers are exercised by the Secretary and the Executive, there must be favoritism and corruption. I have no faith to bestow on the purity of individual virtue, acting without law, in the midst of such temptations. Much less can I approve of conduct in a Secretary so violative of all law, and leading so directly to encroachments which are dangerous to the liberties which we enjoy.

Mr. President, another act of the Secretary, in connexion with the removal of the deposits, and in pursuance of the same purposes and objects, is the order to public officers and agents, who are in possession of public money, under bonds for its faithful disbursement and safe keeping, to place it in the banks designated by him. In a communication to the President of the 5th of October, 1853, page 40, the Secretary states, that "he has designated certain local banks," but without naming them, in certain cities, "as depositories of the public money," and that "arrangements are in progress to make a similar change throughout the United States;" that "public money, when placed at the disposition of a public officer, in order to be applied to the public service, remains the money of the United States while it continues in the hands of the disbursing agent, and is, consequently, subject to the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the place of its deposit." And he thereupon proposes that all such money shall be deposited in one of the banks having the deposits of the public money, if there be any such bank at the place of disbursement, and the nature of the disbursement will permit. The proposition was approved on the same day, and a circular addressed to the other departments for their direction.

Whence does the Secretary draw his belief, that money in the hands of an agent, for which that agent has given bond and security, and for the disbursement and safe keeping of which he is accountable, is public money which he has a right to control, and take the responsibility for it away from the agent? Where did he obtain this authority? Is it in virtue of his high office? He has, by this order, placed all the disbursing officers under the control and check—not of the Treasurer—not of the Comptroller or Auditor—not of the whole Treasury Department—but of himself and the President alone. He has also thrown the hazard of loss on the Government. If the disbursing officers obey the order, and the money shall be lost, the loss must fall upon the treasury, or gross and shameful injustice be done to them and their sureties. Suppose a case—and it may be fact and history more than supposition—that there are several large disbursing officers in Washington, who have kept their money in the Patriotic Bank, and they have been compelled to transfer it to the Bank of the Metropolis, and it should be lost, either in whole or in part, by the failure or depreciation of the latter; what must be the consequence? The release of the officers to the extent of the failure. No honest Government would compel them or their sureties to suffer: it must fall on the treasury. They are not left to judge of their own interests and responsibility, but required to place their money in a bank which the law did not create for that purpose, and which the law does not control for that purpose. Nor has the Secretary bound these banks, by his agreement, to receive or take care of this money. It is neither “entered to the credit of the Treasurer,” nor “deposited on account of the United States.”—(p. 39.) He has looked neither to the responsibility of the bank nor the agents. Is there not, then, absurdity, illegality, if not gross oppression, in the act? He seems to have no limit to assumed power over the public treasure, and no guide but the disposition to pour every thing into the lap of the favored banks.

But he here also seems to have violated positive law. By the fourth section of the act of the 3d March, 1809, paymasters, pursers, and other agents, are directed, when practicable, to keep the money in their hands, “in some incorporated bank, to be designated for the purpose by the President of the United States,” &c. The President alone has the power of designation, and they are to obey his order, and his only, when he shall give one. Here the Secretary declares that he himself had designated some banks, and it is not known whether the President was even informed which they were, and that he was proceeding to select others; and the order is that the agents shall make their deposits in such as he had selected, and in whichever he might select. It was an order to place their money wherever the Secretary might please, and to change it when he pleased. Was this a performance of the duty of the President, under the law? He may perform his duty through the instrumentality of his subordinates in the departments; but if he is commanded to do an act, does he obey the law when he authorizes a subordinate to do as he pleases; approves what he has done, without knowing what it is; and sanctions, beforehand, whatever he may do in relation to it? Is there no longer any authority in law? Is every thing swallowed up in executive discretion? I admit, sir, that this and a hundred other laws in our statute book are folly and arrant nonsense, if the doctrine recently contended for be true—that the President, in virtue of his authority to see the laws executed, has a right to look to all cases of discretion in executive officers, to command them to obey his will, and to dismiss them if they do not obey it. He might as well, under that doctrine, and without the aid of law, not only order agents where and how to keep their money, but when and how to obey the orders of a Secretary in regard to it, and discharge them for neglect. But that doctrine is unsound. It is the essence of despotism; the substitution of a single will in place of the will of the whole; and whenever it shall be approved by the American people, they will be slaves, who may sing psalms to their despot over their chains, but they will not thereby render them less strong, nor, in the end, less galling.

But, Mr. President, the Secretary has not been satisfied with his orders for the disposition of the future revenue of the nation; but he has drawn money out of the treasury, and used it without regard to legal provisions. He has given drafts, not signed by the Comptroller of the Treasury, to the Union Bank of Maryland, for two or three hundred thousand dollars; one to the Girard Bank for half a million; another to the Bank of America; another to the Manhattan Bank; and another to the Mechanics' Bank; each for the same sum, amounting, in all, to more than two millions of dollars. How much more may be in the same situation we are not informed. Senators will find in the appendix to the pamphlet on their table (pages 43, 44, and 45) a correspondence explanatory of this matter. When these drafts were made and issued we do not precisely know. The Secretary, in his “reasons,” did not condescend to inform us respecting them. He concealed the facts. I considered it, when his reasons were read to the Senate, and I saw the correspondence of the Treasurer and cashier—I consider it now—as a disingenuous concealment of an important fact, not merely useful, but indispensable, in forming an opinion in regard to his conduct. He gave orders to draw more than two millions of dollars out of the treasury, and yet does not inform Congress that he had so done. He plays a game of hazard with your money, and does not think it of sufficient importance to apprise you of it, or recollect that respect for you and your control over the treasury demand an explanation. We have, however, learned, without the aid of the Secretary, from another source, that these drafts were made, or at least some of them, and in the hands of the cashiers, about a month before the 5th November last. As to their character, we are informed, not through the Secretary, but by the letters of the Treasurer of the United States to the cashier of the Bank of the United States, that “they were not of the usual kind; they were issued by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be used in the event of certain contingencies; upon failure of which they were to be returned to the treasury, and cancelled.”

And, in the recent report of the Secretary, of the 30th December, in answer to a call made upon him, which has been read, but which, being in the hands of the printer, we have had no opportunity of examining, it is stated that “he has transferred money, in some instances, from the Bank of the United States to the selected banks, in order to enable them to defend the community against the unwarrantable attempts of the Bank of the United States to produce a state of general embarrassment and distress.”

They were then drafts, signed by the Secretary and Treasurer, for the money legally deposited in the Bank of the United States, to the amount of two millions three hundred thousand dollars, placed in the hands of the cashiers of several banks, to be used by them, if they saw fit. They were to be used on certain contingencies. What contingencies? They were not explained to us. Who was to judge of those contingencies—the Secretary? No; the banks. What security had the Secretary that they should not be misused? None. They were in the hands of the cashiers. Payment might have been demanded, and the money squandered; or, the cashiers escaped, and no possible claim could have been sustained against the banks under the agreement, or against the securities on the cashiers' bonds. The banks could not be answerable until the money was received by them and credited on their books; the conditions of the cashiers' bonds embrace no such trust. The Secretary has drawn, and authorized to be drawn, out of the treasury, between two and three millions of money, and placed it, without security, upon the contingency of certain individuals, believing that the Bank of the United States improperly pressed the community, (a fact on which he was not to decide,) to be used, if, in the management of the business confided to them, they should think that they were pressed, or be unable to relieve the community. What a precious guardian over the treasury of the country! What respect has he shown for the provisions of law!

These two millions and more were held by the cashiers of those banks to support their credit. It was a loan of so much of the public money for that specific purpose. Can any man make more or less of it? It was to pay no debt. It was to meet no claim against the Government. It was to do nothing which the laws of the Union had directed. It was a loan, to be used or not, at discretion of the parties, to sustain their credit, and enable them to transact their business.

Has the Secretary of the Treasury a right to loan two or ten millions of dollars for such a purpose? Are Senators prepared to say that such a power is in his hands, and to approve its exercise—and such an exercise—without the pretence or affectation of security? Suppose one of these cashiers had, during the month, drawn the money and escaped; the Bank of the United States would have been discharged for that amount, and even the cashier's bond would not have been broken. Your money would have been cast upon the waves, with no hope of its being drawn to the shore again. Your resort might, perhaps, have been to the bond of the Treasurer of the United States. The money was still on his books as belonging to the Government, as he tells you, and he was responsible for it until legally discharged; but you would have speedily found a credit given. It might have been done with much less disregard of law than has been exhibited.

If such acts be approved, you have no guard upon your treasury. The President or the Secretary may permit a cashier to draw from it millions upon millions of dollars, and, if he escape, your only remedy is like that against the deserted soldier—to mark him "run."

But, sir, in what an aspect does this present the Secretary of the Treasury before us! He first performs an act, highly questionable, to use the mildest phrase, in ordering the accruing moneys to be deposited elsewhere than Congress directed, and then performs this illegal act. To guard against the natural consequences resulting from his own improper conduct, he comes before us and apologizes for this act, by telling us that he had done something else which rendered this unavoidable.

If such things can be done under our present laws with impunity, if Congress and the people of this Union have been so utterly negligent as to leave the public treasury thus exposed, it is time that the evil was repaired, and stronger guards thrown around it. But, in my apprehension, Congress and the people have not thus neglected their duty. There are guards enough to prevent a Secretary from thus thrusting his hands into the treasury, and scattering it to the winds. Not the want of law, but the violation of law, has produced these results.

The argument of the Senator from Kentucky was conclusive and irresistible, to my mind, on this point; and I do not wish to detain the Senate by a feeble and more tedious exposition. The constitution, in section 9, article 1, has solemnly declared that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The law organizing the Treasury Department, on the 2d September, 1789, immediately after our Government went into operation, in the 4th section, declares "that the Treasurer shall receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same, upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, recorded by the Register, and not otherwise." These drafts are direct violations of both the constitution and the law. They were to take money out of the treasury; they were not in consequence of appropriations made by law; they were not to pay debts or to satisfy appropriations or claims; they were not signed by the Comptroller, nor in the forms of the law.

It is true, sir, that a boast has been made, and not now for the first time, that new guards have been thrown around the treasury in these days of reform, (or whatever else it suits the partisan to call it,) and that the treasury is now more secure, on this account, than in former times. What are these new forms—new guards? It is said that a change has been made in the warrants; that now all the proper officers sign them; and that they are sent with the name of the Treasurer; so that no fraud can be committed. A short explanation will show the fallacy and deception of this boasting. The act establishing the treasury, as we have seen, prescribes the mode and manner in which the officers are to sign, to draw money out of the treasury. From the moment of the passage of that law to the present, as I believe, the form of warrants has been substantially the same—unvaried in substance, and in strict conformity with the law; containing the name of the payee, sum, appropriation, &c.; signed by the Secretary, countersigned by the Comptroller, recorded by the Register, and signed by the Treasurer. No alteration has taken place in these respects.

After the officers, with the Treasurer, had signed them, either the warrants themselves were delivered to the claimants, or sent for them to the place of payment; or, in place of the warrants, checks of the Treasurer were sent.

To the branch bank here the warrants usually went, and were returned to the treasury on weekly or other settlements; to places at a distance the checks or warrants were sent as was found most convenient. In both cases, however, the Treasurer either kept the warrants, or they were returned to him, on settlement with the paying bank, and he kept them as his vouchers. The only difference, of which I am aware, that has been made, is that, in 1829, the Treasurer was directed always to send the warrants; and thus they are in the custody, for a time, not of the Treasurer, whose vouchers they are, but of the bank which pays them. It is only a difference as to the party who is to hold the voucher, until a settlement has been made. But as to security, there is no difference. Nor was it a matter of the slightest consequence, so long as the Bank of the United States, created by and responsible under the law, received, and paid, and kept the warrants. Now, I ask, where is the extraordinary merit of this luminous invention? Four years ago we heard it sounded, from Maine to Georgia, as evidence of skill, and paternal care over the treasury, and watchfulness against fraud; another reason for deep personal devotion to a man who knew no more of the matter, at the time, than you or I. Of such stuff, sir, is popularity sometimes made; and such are the trifles, lighter than air, imposed on partisan credulity!

The drafts of which I have spoken were a violation of the constitution and the law, and were given in despite of these warrants, not only in their original, but their amended shape. These new and boasted guards against petty frauds were insufficient to protect your treasury against the more stupendous inroad of executive discretion. They might prevent the filching of a few dollars, but could not restrain the unlocking of the treasury, when millions were to be subtracted.

These drafts also violated the agreement between the bank and the Treasury Department, made by Mr. Crawford, in September, 1819, by which a notice of thirty, sixty, or one hundred and twenty days was to be given, when money was to be transferred to different places—an agreement which has not, I believe, been insisted on by the bank, in ordinary cases. They were secret drafts—a fact which this officer had not the courage, or, if he had the courage, had not the candor, to state to Congress. They were to be paid upon sight, instantaneously, whenever the holders chose. A demand for more than two millions might have been made upon the bank at any moment; and, if not instantaneously paid, it must have been dishonored, and the pure and generous purpose avowed by the agent accomplished. And now, sir, the bank is charged with dishonesty for guarding against it. It knew—it could scarcely fail to know—from the plainest indications, that drafts were out; but their amount, and when and where they would be presented, was not known, and could not be, unless the Secretary, or one of his subordinates, had given the information. It was concealed, because the object required concealment. And when, under such a state of facts, the bank prepared to meet the blow of its covert enemy, fall when and where it would, it is accused by the Secretary of misconduct, and a violation of its charter. The accusation is worthy of the maker of contingent secret drafts. Sir, if this conduct be sustained, you have no guard upon your treasury. Your President and Secretary may take from your vaults whatever they please, and when they please, and dispose of it where they please, and you have no remedy. I repeat the inquiry—are Senators prepared to justify the act?

The apology made for this violation of law and duty is, that they were transfer drafts. What, Mr. President, is a transfer draft? It is this, and nothing more: a direction from the department to the bank to send a particular sum of public money from one place to another, where the Government needs it. If it has money in Philadelphia, which it wants in Lexington or Norfolk, it is a direction to send it to Lexington or Norfolk, that the checks or warrants of the department may be paid there. It is a draft simply designed to change the position of the money, but not to change the custody of the money. In its change, and in its new location, it remains under the same custody, upon the responsibility of the bank, and so continues, until it is drawn from its new location, in regular warrants from the department, for the payment of debts. If lost in the transfer, in passing from one position to another, or after the transfer, and before it is paid out, it is the loss, not of the Government, but of the bank. The transfer itself is the act of the bank. It may be directed, but it is not and cannot be performed either by the Secretary or by the Treasurer. They may, as we have seen, draw money out of the bank, and, after it is drawn out, use it as they please, and violate law while they do it; but, under the charter, the bank must make the transfer. It is a gross misnomer to call these drafts transfers. Who ever before heard of a transfer draft to change money from one side of a street to another? from one end of a town to another? to take money from one bank to loan to another to sustain its credit, or enable it to do even the high and meritorious act of protecting the community from oppression? Drawing money out of the bank, or treasury, for any purpose, is no transfer. The bank loses its possession. It is a payment by it—a payment of money out of the treasury; and then the responsibility for loss falls, not on the bank, but on the Government. A transfer can only be made while the same legal responsibility exists before, at, and after the transfer. These contingent drafts were payments of so much for the Government; and these payments were not made in the forms, nor according to the requirements of law. Sir, they may be called by any name that our contingent Secretary may select; but he ought not, by giving wrong names, to be permitted to deceive the public. He has violated the plain requirements of law, and should be held responsible for it. The law is ample to guard the treasury; it requires only to be faithfully administered. It is proper here to remark, that all these contingent drafts were not used; a part was returned to the treasury. They were made, it is said, to sustain the selected banks, and protect the community from the pressure of the Bank of the United States. Now, if it was proper to draw them for that object; and if the bank has continued its oppressions, as is hourly alleged, why were they not all used? Does no more pressure on the community exist? Has the bank done no more evil than that which could be repaired by two millions of dollars? Is the Secretary sincere in his exhibition of the conduct of the bank? Has he power to use the public money to resist it? And does he use only a part, when he might arrest wrong and oppression by using the whole? Was that his object? Credat Appella!

Before I pass from this subject, I must be permitted to remark that the time which the Secretary chose draws none of my respect towards him or his act. He knew at the time that he could not complete it before the meeting of Congress. He is even now, while we are deliberating, pursuing his object, and completing his arrangements. He knew that Congress would not approve the removal. For three years the question respecting the bank has been agitated in various forms; and, at the last session, this very subject was brought before Congress on the controlling recommendation of the President, and when his political friends were in a large majority; and Congress refused to yield to his wishes, and declared the deposits safe. Yet, in less than six months afterwards, the Secretary spurned their opinion, and did the act; and now comes to Congress to approve the contempt which he has heaped upon them, and expects fawning for the kick which he has given them! Sir, why did he thus scorn the opinion and will of Congress? It was, sir, that another, and, if possible, more signal act of scorn for the legislative power might be exhibited to the world. The deposits could not be removed by the joint action of the Executive and Legislature, without a majority of the latter in favor of the removal. But if that was made by the authority of the President or Secretary alone, they could not be restored; as a single word, veto, would prevent that majority from accomplishing their wishes. Two-thirds would then be required; and this, the word, the wishes of the President, and the force of party, would prevent. The act was therefore done; done before the meeting of Congress, for the sole purpose of preventing Congress, the majority of Congress, the Representatives of the people, from exercising their judgment and powers in relation to this question, and the management and control of the public treasure. It needs no development of the guilty purposes of guilty agents to see that this was the governing motive in selecting the time—for the haste with which the removal was made. In sixty-six days, Congress, authorized by the constitution and laws to decide this matter, would have been in session; and the act, I repeat it, was then performed to prevent the action of Congress. Sir, the power of Congress has been scorned—disregarded; and, through them, the people, whom they represent, abused. A trick, a cunning device, has been resorted to, to cheat the legislative power of the country of its rights. Those whom the people appointed guardians of the public treasure have been defrauded of their constitutional authority. The Secretary knew that the session of Congress was approaching. Why, then, did he do this act? Why does he now insult Congress by continuing thus to act, while we are here to attend to our constitutional duties? Search the records of history, from the earliest times to the present, and you can find no act of lower cunning, or haughtier scorn, by any usurper, towards the legislative body. Who, before this, has ever dared thus to contemn the power which the people had, by their solemn charters, bestowed on their Representatives? None, sir, none. If it be the will of the people thus to surrender their own powers in the hands of their constitutional Representatives, and to justify the trespass upon them, so be it: I will not be accessory to the justification. If the charter of the bank were to expire in fifty days, it would be due to the relative powers of our Government, and the honor of Congress, to order their immediate restoration.

On Thursday, Mr. S. continued his remarks as follows:

Mr. President: I yesterday attempted to present my views of the acts performed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the laws and principles applicable to them; and made some remarks on the time selected by the Secretary as calculated to prevent and avoid the action of Congress. The purposes of the Executive have been confirmed by subsequent acts. Within a week, while we are deliberating on this question, we are told that orders have been issued forbidding the bank, or some of the branches, to pay the pensions; and transferring this service to others. It was originally assigned to the commissioners of loans and the agents for paying pensions, by the act of the 4th of August, 1790. It was afterwards transferred, by law, to the Bank of the United States, by the act of the 3d of March, 1817. By this transfer, the Government was relieved from an annual expense of not less than forty thousand dollars. The bank is now forbidden to perform the duty; and the Executive, of his own authority, or his subordinate, has constituted the selected banks commissioners of loans and agents for this purpose. The law expressly commanded what is now forbidden. Your statute is repealed, and official duties imposed by executive mandate. I ask for his legal authority. I demand to know if there is to be no limit to these trespasses upon the legislative power? An attempt to transfer these duties was made three or four years ago, resisted, retracted; but is now repeated in more offensive form, as the natural result of the previous misconduct in removing the deposits.

I have stated that a large amount of money had been drawn from the treasury, and distributed among the favorite banks. Surely, at the time when the Secretary was loaning the public money so freely, all the departments of the Government ought to have been full-handed, without need of pecuniary aid. Yet it so happens that one of those departments, without authority of law, has borrowed, upon six per cent. interest, more than four hundred thousand dollars. By a report of the Postmaster General, just laid upon our tables, we are informed that he has borrowed, since the 28th of December, 1832, $350,000, which is unpaid; and $50,000 more, which has been paid; and overdrawn to an unascertained amount, but supposed, by estimate, $50,000 more; and we all know that contracts with the department are unsatisfied, to a great extent. The time when these loans were made, and the banks by which they were made, are worthy of observation, as explanatory of some parts of the conduct of the Secretary.

One hundred thousand dollars were loaned by the Manhattan Bank, between 28th of December and 1st of April, while Congress was in session, and immediately after its adjournment. For four years preceding this event, Congress and the country had been regularly assured, even by the President himself, that this department was in a flourishing condition, and managed with great economy and skill, by a most faithful officer; and those who doubted or denied were denounced in no very measured terms. At the opening of this session, in that very month of December, when a part of this money was borrowed, the President assured Congress, from the report of the Postmaster General, which he transmitted, "that that department continued to extend its usefulness, without impairing its resources, or lessening the accommodations which it affords in the secure and rapid transportation of the mail." Sir, have Congress been fairly and honestly dealt with on this subject? Has not imposition been practised? I do not say intentional, so far as the President is concerned. He may have been, and probably was, utterly ignorant of the true state of facts. But the truth has been told; the people and Congress have been deceived. While praises were bestowed, and we were ordered to believe them, that department was insolvent. And while Congress was in session, it borrowed money, without the permission or knowledge of Congress, and in disregard of law and duty.

On the 28th of April, 1833, $50,000 were borrowed of the Western Bank of Philadelphia. On the 5th of June, $50,000 more of the Bank of Maryland. On the 25th of October last, at the time of the loan by the Secretary of the Treasury to the banks, on the 1st November, immediately after the Secretary's loan, $50,000 of the Commonwealth Bank of Boston; and, on the 31st December last, four weeks after Congress was in session, $100,000 of the Manhattan Bank.

Some of these, perhaps all, are among the favored banks; some of them held the contingent drafts, and others were in correspondence with the agent of the treasury, when these loans were made by the Postmaster General. The time, on which the Secretary dwells so emphatically, is no longer to be wondered at. It corresponds well with the wants of the Government, if it does not with the rights of the bank and the interests of the community. Are these things to be tolerated and approved? Sir, the fraud of this whole matter is stupendous and appalling; the disregard of law, and contempt of the legislative branch of our Government, intolerable. Are Senators prepared to approve it all by their votes?

Having looked at the acts of the Secretary, it becomes necessary to examine the principles which he avows, and the reasons he has given for their justification. It is due to him, and much more to ourselves and our institutions, that this examination should be full and rigid.

I must be permitted here to remark, that, in my examination of these principles and reasons, I have not permitted myself to regard the question before the Senate as an issue between the President and the Bank of the United States. If the President on one side, and the bank on the other, have formed an issue, let them try it. It does not become the Senate to try it for them, or to become a party to it. We are not to look at the consequences upon an individual, whether he holds the office of President or not. To the incumbent of that office, who is speedily to pass from power, it can avail little, personally, unless he acts under strong passions and prejudices, and seeks the perpetuation of official power in the hands of favorite partisans. We are not to look at the consequences to this bank, except so far as its rights may have been assailed by a violation of the terms of its charter. It will soon cease to exist, if it be not the will of Congress that its existence be prolonged for the purposes of the Government—and that will be a question of magnitude and difficulty enough for the day when its decision may be required. But we are to look to the effects upon the Government and institutions of the country, and the rights and interests of the people. We are investigating principles and reasons immensely more important than the interests or wishes of any President and of the bank combined—of a magnitude deeply affecting the future well-being of a great nation. The supremacy of the law, the sacredness of the constitution, the rights of the people, are matters concerned in the issue before us; and we are to look to it that these do not suffer by the misconduct or the malignant passions of rulers.

I propose to admit, for the present at least, that the reasons offered by the Secretary are sincere, and that he acted upon his own judgment, not by the command of his superior. It requires, indeed, some faith to make the admission, when we reflect upon the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, and add to it the language which we find in the letter of Mr. Duane, of the 23d September, that he "was to consider himself directed to act on the responsibility of the President," and that, if he would stand by him, it would be "the happiest day of his life." It requires still more faith when we compare the paper read to the cabinet with the reasons of the Secretary. The language, the ideas, the facts, the reasoning, all indicate a common origin—the dictation one head—be that head whose it may, whether the President's, the Secretary's, the agent's, or some unknown person. Without stopping to inquire either into the similarity or parentage of these documents, or into the feeling which could have produced this state of happiness, on accomplishing such a purpose, after such a life of usefulness as he has led, and the acquisition of so much glory as we are assured that he has won, I take the act as the Secretary's, and the reasons as his justification. If he has acted incorrectly, the mandate of power can furnish no apology.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

The Secretary assumes, without proof, certain principles as true. If they are false and unsound, no system of honest logic can deduce safe conclusions from them. He creates some difficulty in their examination, by a confusion and alternation in the use of the terms "Secretary of the Treasury," and "Treasury Department," as if they conveyed the same meaning. There is great distinction between them. The Treasury Department is a creature of the law and the constitution, and consists of several officers, whose separate and respective duties are prescribed; of whom the Secretary is but one, and with no more undefined and unlimited powers than the others. Each has his sphere of authority and service; and neither can properly interfere with the rest, except in the mode and to the extent which the law has established.

In page 2 of the report, it is affirmed that "the Treasury Department being intrusted with the administration of the finances of the country, it was always the duty of the Secretary, in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, to take care that the public money was deposited in safe-keeping, in the hands of faithful agents, and in convenient places, ready to be applied according to the wants of the Government." The principle, thus announced, in its length and breadth, is unsound. If it be true that the Treasury Department is intrusted with the administration of the finances, does it follow that the Secretary alone is to perform the high functions thus claimed, in the absence of legal provision?—that he is to discharge important legislative powers and duties? Certainly not, unless the law creating him authorizes it. He doubtless means that the power claimed is a necessary emanation from the nature of his office. "It pre-existed the bank charter, and was reserved by it. If Congress do not legislate respecting the places of deposit and safe-keeping, he must supply their defects." With all the respect which I can feel for the Secretary, the position seems to me to be absurd, and an assumption of undelegated authority. The act establishing the department, and creating his office, gives him no such power. [Here Mr. S. read the first and second sections of the act of 2d September, 1789; the first establishing the department, the second creating the office of Secretary, who was to be deemed head of the department.]

Does this claimed power arise from the first duty enjoined, "to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit?" He is but to digest and prepare the plans, not to execute them. They are to be sanctioned by Congress, and their execution to be directed by Congress—the high legislative power which is to determine respecting the revenue.

From the second—"To prepare and report estimates of the public revenue, and the public expenditures?" The same comment applies to it.

From the third—"To superintend the collection of the revenue?" The revenue itself, and the mode of its collection, must, of necessity, be directed and prescribed by the Legislature; and the Secretary can have no duty in regard to it, but to superintend its collection in the prescribed mode, and to see that the will of Congress is obeyed and executed.

There are other duties mentioned in this section; but they can have no connexion with the power claimed by the Secretary. From what branch, then, of his official duties does the power arise? From none. It is as purely a legislative power as any which ingenuity can devise; vested in Congress, of a high character, and with which no inferior officer can interfere, except so far as he may be expressly directed. Such direction is not pretended. All his general authority exists in that law. His office has neither been enlarged nor contracted from that day to this. He seems to have forgotten that he is the creature of the law, with such capacities as it gave; that he is not the department, and has not all the power vested in the department, but that there are other officers with their powers and duties. One of these is the Treasurer, and to him this very duty of safe-keeping is expressly assigned. The fourth section requires the Treasurer to "receive and keep" the public money, and compels him to give bond in $150,000 that he will receive and keep it safely. Like all other officers and agents who hold public money, he, and not the Secretary, is bound with sureties, "to take care that the public money is deposited in safe-keeping, and in the hands of faithful agents, and in convenient places, ready to be applied according to the wants of the Government," which wants may be indicated to him through the Secretary. Place is a necessary part of keeping; if it fails in safety, the officer—the Treasurer—must answer for it, unless the law directs the place, and then the officer is not responsible.

The history of the department corresponds with this view. Before any place was designated by Congress, the Treasurer kept the money where he saw fit, and was answerable. When the Bank of the United States was chartered, in 1817, Congress required that it should be deposited in it, and for its safety, while there, the Treasurer is not bound to answer. But if, from any cause, it be taken from thence, without the order of Congress where it shall be kept, the rights, and duties, and responsibilities of the Treasurer revive; and in their exercise he cannot be controlled by the Secretary, who may, indeed, direct him that the Government needs the money in any given place, (as Baltimore, for instance,) but for its transfer and keeping there, until used for the Government, he must himself respond. An order from the Secretary to place it in any given situation, or to let it out of the place prescribed by Congress, can be no protection to him against the forfeiture of his bond. The contingent and other drafts which removed the money were not legal authority. If the money be lost, his bond is broken. Such, if he had consulted them, would, I am confident, have been the advice of the two Secretaries who preceded the present one.

The power in dispute is a legislative power—purely legislative. Congress has the right to say who shall exercise it; and, having granted it to the Treasurer, it is a usurpation by the Secretary, for which no reasons can apologize, no necessity excuse. He has assumed the very essence of legislation—to deal with, to control, to manage the purse of the nation. And even if it be proved that the power was executive, it would not relieve him. An executive power, to be exercised, must be conferred; if not conferred on him, he has no right to assume it. But, sir, the Secretary proceeds to tell us, in substance, that this power was reserved by the bank charter, without limitation or restriction; that Congress cannot interfere with the subject until he has acted; that, in his action, he is to judge of the general interest and convenience of the people; that, although the money is safe in the Bank of the United States, yet, as it has violated its charter, it was his duty to remove the deposits; and that the President has the supervision and execution of the laws, and, therefore, a right to control him in the duty which he has to discharge in relation to this law.

This is a simple statement of his opinion; and it will be at once perceived that, as he considers his right original, from the nature of his office, so that of the President results from his general authority to see the laws executed.

"The right is reserved by the bank charter." Then it existed before the bank charter. "It is unlimited and without restriction." Then Congress has no authority of interference. The Secretary expresses his wonder that Congress should have given him such a power. In this wonder I cordially join him, if his notions have any resemblance to the truth. But I am aware of no such surrender of power by Congress to him or any other executive agent. His error is that he has assumed, without proof or argument, that which did not exist. And I must here be permitted to remark, that, while the Secretary complains of the bank enlarging its discounts, in order to compel Congress to recharter it, he assumes this ungranted power, and exercises it; to compel Congress to act in unison with his views, he turns round and does an act, which he believes, and which is boasted of before the whole nation, as changing the deliberation of Congress from the question of removal to that of restoration; as compelling the majority of Congress to yield up its rights, and subjecting it to the veto power. Whether the complaint against the bank be well founded or not, the assumption of the Secretary is unpardonable. And if his complaint be true, Congress has been, between these conflicting parties, placed in a predicament neither honorable to its character, nor salutary to the exercise of its powers, unless it shall firmly sustain its own authority, which I trust it will do. The constitution and laws demand that it should.

With regard to the supervision of the Executive, I remark, whether the Secretary acted under the command of the Executive or not, his own responsibility is not changed. His responsibility is created by the law, and can neither be thrown upon nor assumed by another. "The President commanded, and I did it"—"Do, and I will protect you, and it will be the happiest day of my life"—are no apology, or justification. They do not, in the least, remove the guilt of misconduct. The President cannot, under our laws, and agreeably to our system, take upon himself that which the law has laid upon another, whatever may be his choice or his desire. There are only two modes in which responsibility and its consequences can be removed from a guilty agent. One, where the commander at the head of his forces, with sword in hand, protects his subordinate—a mode better fitted for eastern despotisms than American liberty; the other, where he possesses popularity so overwhelming, that, when he says a thing, it is therefore believed; when he does it, it is therefore applauded. Such a man may say "Do, and I will protect you," my approbation shall be sufficient to make others approve; my popularity shall be your shield. I will admit, sir, if it will be any gratification, that no man who ever lived had better right to say I will take this responsibility on myself. We have seen enough to assure us that, before his popularity, even constitutional principles have given way in men who were deemed honorable and honest. None ever made his followers change opinions more rapidly. None ever trampled on covenanted rights more, and found more ready sacrifices in adulation and applause. But, sir, let us beware. It is that very kind of popularity which leads most directly and easily to the prostration of liberty. It is the paved road to despotism, which offers no obstacle to the progress of the victor.

Mr. President, if there does now exist in this country a power which can, by its single volition and word, relieve officers acting under the constitution and laws from their responsibility, and this with regard to the treasury itself, we already have an absolute, unencumbered despotism, beyond which no other can advance. What is despotism, but the existence in the hands of a single individual of the power and right to say to all subordinate agents, you are to act on my responsibility, and by my opinion? Can the Russian go further? Can the Turk? Are Senators prepared to sustain the principle? If they are, and it be sustained, we have had a revolution already; "hitherto bloodless," as the Senator from Kentucky has remarked, but it will not in its continuance be bloodless, when the people, amidst throes and convulsions, shall seek the restoration of their rights.

Sir, if the language to which I have adverted can be used to your Secretary, it may to your Comptroller, your Register, your Auditor, your Treasurer; and the Executive can dispose of the treasure at his will. Every possible obstacle is removed from before the vaults of your treasury. I have always understood the system of our Government, and so I have read the short but eventful history of my country, that it was the fixed purpose of those who fought for, and of those who created, our institutions, so to arrange them that the purse and the sword should be forever disunited; and the Executive should not, by possibility, touch or control one dollar of the public treasure, unless he was not only permitted, but commanded by law. There was not, during the periods in which our State and General Governments were formed, one single approved opinion which did not recognise this doctrine. Separate the purse and the sword! separate them!—was the language of those times—their union is despotism! This principle is on every page of our history, and was intended to be carried out in the formation of the legislative and executive branches of the Government. Their powers were defined as much with this as any other view.

And, sir, the law creating the Treasury Department was formed in the same spirit. It was necessary—could not be avoided—to leave it, in some sense, an executive department; but every provision was inserted which could tend to make it subservient to the legislative, and not the executive will. The Department of State, created in July, 1789; the War Department, created in August, 1789; and the Navy Department, created in April, 1798, are purely executive. The officers at the head of the two former are commanded, in the same words, to "perform and execute such duties as shall, from time to time, be enjoined on or intrusted to them by the President of the United States, agreeable to the constitution," relative to matters pertaining to their departments. The officer at the head of the latter was commanded "to execute such orders as he should receive from the President of the United States," relative to matters connected with the naval establishment. And they all communicate with the President, and not with Congress. The Legislature makes its calls in regard to their duties, and gives its orders through the President, and receives their answers, and the reports of their conduct and situation, from him. Not so the Treasury Department. It takes care of the public money. But how? As the Legislature directs. It disburses the public money. But how? As the Legislature commands. It reports the state and condition of the treasury, and the situation of the finances. But to whom? Not to the Executive, but to Congress. Congress calls for information, plans, systems of finance. But on whom, and through whom? Not on or through the Executive, but immediately and directly upon the Secretary. He is required to look to the disbursement of the public money. But by whose orders? The President's? No, sir, no; by the command of law. He cannot himself take one dollar out of the treasury, but in the forms prescribed—the countersigning of the Comptroller; the record of the Register; the signature of the Treasurer; and "not otherwise;" words useless in the construction of the act, except to show the rigor, and caution, and anxiety of those who framed it, in regard to the use of the public funds, and their desire to prevent all executive interference with the treasury. Why was not the bond to receive and keep the money given by the Secretary, if he was meant to be the keeper of the money? Why are all who hold and disburse money required to give bonds, if the Secretary can dispose of it as he pleases? Why did the Treasurer select his own places and agents for keeping the money before Congress prescribed the place and the agents, if the Secretary had the power? The design of our laws is obvious; the relative duties of the officers are apparent. They must not be set aside and repealed, because the Secretary may imagine that the interest and convenience of the people demand it. Of that interest and convenience Congress, and not the Secretary, will judge. If one dollar of the money drawn out shall be lost, the tribunals of the country will teach the Treasurer that he, and not the Secretary, must find it, and the executive mandate will be insufficient for his protection. The design and the words of the constitution and the laws, in separating the Treasury Department, as far as practicable, from executive control, will in them meet its just illustration and support.

But it is said that this course of reasoning is of no avail, because the President has the power of dismissing all except judicial officers, and, therefore, has power to discharge the Secretary, unless he thinks as the President thinks, and acts as the President directs; and that, by this means, he has control over all the actions of all the officers under the Government. Is this, sir, true? Is this power of dismission thus supreme and irresistible? If it be, it is a strange anomaly in a free Government, and under free institutions; and no time should be lost in erasing it.

I do not mean, at this time, to discuss the existence of the power of dismission, or to question its constitutionality. The resolutions do not seem to me to call for it; and the time may shortly come when we shall be driven to the investigation, by an imperious sense of our obligations and duties. It is the practice under it, and the principles and motives by which its exercise should be regulated, if it does exist, to which I would call the attention of the Senate.

It was first brought into discussion on the organization of one of the departments, in 1789. Parties were divided upon it, and then first measured their strength and intellect. The majority of the federalists were in favor of its existence in the President alone, without the co-operation of the Senate, the co-ordinate power in appointments. The anti-federalists, afterwards called republicans, were opposed to its existence, and believed they saw danger in its exercise. Gerry and others pointed out, with the spirit of prophecy, the malignant use which might, and, in corrupt times, probably would, be made of it. Madison and others, in the purity of their own hearts and purposes, did not believe in the danger. They thought that its exercise, for any motive but the support of law, and the faithful administration of official duties, would justly subject the President to impeachment. They did not foresee the coming events which were to take place at the close of forty years from that day. There was not then a man in the Congress of the United States who believed that this power could or would be used for mere personal or party purposes, for personal or party revenge; much less to obtain control of the treasury of the country, by the discharge of the officer placed over it by Congress, because he would not consent to exercise his discretion in the mode which the President might dictate, and within seventy days of the meeting of Congress.

The federalists prevailed in that discussion by a small vote, and the practice since has been in conformity with the decision. The power has been exercised by all the Presidents, but to a very limited extent, except by the present. In no instance—by none of them—upon the avowed ground that none but personal partisans of the President should be permitted to hold office; that the triumph of party drew after it, as its appropriate incident, the dismission of incumbents who did not join in the elevation of the single occupant of executive power, although their merits were undisputed. Sir, this is an odious enlargement and perversion of a questionable power. The spoils of party, thus secured, are the triumphs of corruption over virtue and the constitution. The power of dismission, if to be exercised at all, should be exercised for competent cause; and that competent cause must exist in the law, and by the commands of the law; must be connected with the actual discharge of the duties required by law; to prevent the performance of acts expressly forbidden by law; to secure the performance of acts expressly commanded by law; to relieve from fraud and mental incapacity to discharge the duties arising under circumstances which could not otherwise be controlled. It is, perhaps, a useful, but temporary agent, to guard against evil, until the legislative body, in its several branches, shall be enabled to act. But where discretion is vested by Congress in an agent, it can never, with propriety, be applied in such way as to control the will of Congress—to take from their agent and trustee the right to judge of their wishes and intentions. The Executive can never say how the officers of the law shall discharge their duties. If it exercise the power of dismission, it must be after and for their acts, and to remove them from doing further mischief.

If the President may say to one officer, you must do your duty in this or that mode, he may say so to every other. If to a Secretary, then to a marshal, who holds his office by the same tenure. And, by like exercise of authority as that which we are now considering, he may direct a marshal how he shall execute his writs, and whom he shall summon on juries; and thus, not our treasury only, but our fortunes, reputations, lives, are in his hands. Where, then, where is our security? where our protection? where our legal liberties? where the trial by jury—the last and most efficient guardian of the citizen in his dearest interests? It is subject to the control of power; its value is destroyed; it is gone forever. There is no right or privilege which this construction of the power of dismission will not reach. It changes all the provisions of your laws into the will of one man; you have remaining only a theory—a pretence of freedom, with the essence and practice of tyranny. You may boast of your liberties, but they are in the hands of an individual. You may pass laws, and define the actions of your officers, but the execution of the laws will not be regulated by yourselves, but by the whims, the caprice, the passions of one man; and all your purposes may be defeated by his word. Unite to this construction of the power of dismission the exercise of the veto, which the constitution has granted, and human ingenuity cannot devise a purer system of unrestrained, unlimited power. The Executive has swallowed up the legislative functions, and there remains but the feeble barrier of the Judiciary, which must speedily fall before it. Are the people of this country—I ask with the earnestness which I feel—are they prepared to sanction such doctrines—to meet such results? If they are, they are already prepared and fitted for slavery. Will Senators sustain such principles?

If the exercise of this power be now permitted, it will be no apology to aftertimes, to posterity, that we believed the existing President would not abuse it. It is not necessary for us to assert that he would. We settle principles, not with reference to any one man and his merits, but to the principles themselves, and their effect upon our institutions and liberties. Besides, who knows who shall succeed, or the extent to which the successor may carry this dangerous power? There is not a man on earth to whom I would confide it, in the extent now claimed by the advocates of the Executive. And if, at this moment, there be party devotion strong enough to sustain it, then is your Government already revolutionized. The conclusion of my own mind, and which I desire to convey to those who, with myself, are to decide this question, is, that it is an abuse of power by the President to dismiss an officer charged by Congress with a trust, because he will not consent to execute it by the executive standard of construction; because he does not do the will of the President, but the will of Congress; and I regard such an act, not as a triumph over a Secretary, not as a triumph over a bank, the mere creature of the law, but as a triumph over the law itself; a triumph over the rights of the people; a triumph over the constitution and laws of the land.

But I return to the power which the Secretary says pre-existed in him, as Secretary, and repeat that it could not pre-exist in him, because there was no absence of legal provision; for it was given by law to another officer. The Treasurer, in the absence of other legal provision, is bound "to receive and keep" the money, and to select the places of deposit, as a part of receiving and keeping. He must keep it safely; the places must therefore be on his responsibility. If the power existed before the 16th section of the bank charter, it existed in the Treasurer, and not in the Secretary.

I recur again to the principle of the Secretary. He says it is a power reserved, without limitation or restriction; of course it is not created nor enlarged by the bank charter. It is now what it was before that law was passed. He argues that this charter is a contract; that there is no limitation to the power in its words; and that—what?—therefore that there is no limit to his power, nor to the motives by which he shall be governed in exercising it.

If this be true, as respects the Secretary and the United States Bank, it is true in no other instance in law, usage, or the concerns of human life. In construing contracts, whether general in their words or not, we confine ourselves to their objects, and do not go beyond the subject-matter to find motives for construction or action. We are governed by the intent of the parties, and by what they have respectively agreed to do; and our construction must be reasonable as regards both, and not such as may suit the convenience or interests of only one of them. If they have confined their contract to certain specified objects, we cannot look to other objects to find reasons to govern our decision upon these. If a party performs the conditions of his contract, no conduct of his, in relation to other matters, can affect our decision. The trustee, or umpire, who is appointed to decide upon a contract, and admits that its terms have been kept by one of the parties, and yet decides against him because he has acted incorrectly in matters which are not mentioned, exceeds his authority, violates his duty, disregards the injunctions of law, and acts dishonestly. In the instance under consideration, where there are mutual covenants by the Government and the bank, and the Secretary is authorized to decide in relation to one of them, there is no principle of common law or common justice which will authorize him to look beyond the covenants, out of the contract, to find motives to govern him. The parties meant, honor and good faith require, that his action should be confined to the terms and objects of the contract. He must look to them for his motives, and the grounds of his action. He must make a decision, reasonable in its character, and equally regardful of the rights and interests of both.

Any other individual, not in office, might have been agreed upon by the Government and the bank to perform the duty of deciding upon the removal of the deposits. Does any man imagine, will any man affirm, that he would have been at liberty to find motives out of the charter for his decision? to have exercised an unlimited license, which should be regulated by feelings or objects not embraced within the contract? to have subjected himself and his actions to the will of the President alone? that his power would have been unlimited and unrestricted, except by the wishes of the Executive, and that they should conclude him? I cannot persuade myself that one Senator would maintain these propositions. Then why shall they be maintained in relation to the Secretary of the Treasury? Is the contract changed by the fact that he is the individual agreed upon to perform the trust? The logic which shall sustain the distinction will merit admiration for its ingenuity, but not applause for its support of law or morality. It is precisely because it is a contract—and one, too, of a high and solemn character, affecting the faith and honor of the Government—that the Secretary is not permitted to take its words alone, without regard to its objects, and infer a license of action and decision which knows no restraint. He was bound, by every principle of fairness and duty, to look into the history of that contract; to examine the purposes of the parties; and to limit himself by its spirit and intentions, and by the actions of the parties in relation to its stipulations.

The Secretary could not act correctly without doing this, nor can Senators truly estimate his conduct without a similar examination. I hope the Senate, therefore, will bear with me, while I make a brief reference to the history and objects of this contract, with a view to just conclusions upon the Secretary's principles, and reasons, and actions. The contract is the charter of the Bank of the United States, created by Congress, of its own unsolicited will, to accomplish certain defined and specified objects of national interest; the whole of those objects being perfectly understood and explicitly stated.

It was unsolicited by those who subsequently became interested in its provisions. None of them applied for it; none asked it as a favor to them. It was a voluntary act of the Government, so far as they were concerned, though not voluntary, I admit, in relation to the necessities of the Government itself. It was forced on Congress, but not by the stockholders, as the best mode, in their opinions, of removing the evils under which the nation was at that time laboring. It was suffering incalculable injuries from the insecurity, and inequality, and unsoundness of the currency, and from the want of a fiscal agent to aid in the financial action of the Government, and to manage its pecuniary concerns with advantage. To remove these evils, some modern quackery, some combination of State banks on safety-fund principles, or something else of that kind, might have been resorted to; but the wise and discreet men who then filled public stations were not skilled in such devices, and they determined to create a bank with a capital competent to the objects, and bound to exert its influence to remove the suffering, and perform the fiscal action which was necessary. In 1815 they formed a charter with these objects. The then President, Mr. Madison, returned it to Congress, with his reasons for not approving it. He waived his constitutional objections, but returned the bill on the ground that it would not answer its objects, in restoring a sound currency, and performing the duties required of it by the Government. At the next session the public difficulties had increased to an alarming extent, and there was no alternative; action could not be postponed, and the present bank was created, designed to effect two objects: 1. The restoration of a sound state of the currency; 2. The management of the concerns of the treasury—the creation of a fiscal agent. To effect these, Congress prescribed its own terms; and held out to all the people of the Union a pledge of its faith, that, if they would subscribe to the bank, and undertake the responsibilities which it imposed, the benefits of that charter should be fully and faithfully yielded to them. All those who chose did subscribe; Congress offered—it is not too much to say, solicited them to undertake it. Shall it now be said that for slight causes—for any causes but a failure to keep the contract on their part—that these subscribers shall be deprived of their benefits? that there is an unrestrained license in the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard the objects of the contract, and, looking without it, to cheat them of their privileges whenever he pleases, and for whatever cause he pleases? It would be worse than punic faith. Congress is bound, in honor, to prevent it, if attempted by any officer, for any cause but a violation of the agreement, and that violation established by law in the mode agreed upon by the parties.

The benefits offered were, the act of incorporation, by which their joint funds might be used for their profit; a partnership by the Government to one-fifth of the whole amount and relative proportion of directors; and the deposit of the public money, on which they could discount while it remained there. The duties demanded on the other hand were, to pay one and a half million of dollars; to pay specie; to restore the currency—an Herculean task; to keep the public money safely, and furnish it for the Government wherever it was wanted, from one extreme of the Union to the other, without expense or loss. There was no added condition, that the owners of the stock should surrender their rights as freemen, should be of this or that party, should support this or that man for President. Congress presented no such terms then, and it will be false to itself if it permits them to be prescribed now. The terms of the contract were all explained, and I know of no honest or just principle which can justify a refusal by the Government to fulfil the conditions, and leave the public moneys in the bank, so long as the bank shall fully satisfy all that it promised to perform as the terms on which it was to keep them. The bargain was offered by the Government, made by the Government, and must be kept by the Government. Whether it shall do so is of comparatively little moment to the personal and pecuniary interests of the stockholders. By bad faith towards it, a number of orphans and widows and the helpless may be injured, and their wrongs be remembered in the account against national injustice; still the great mass of stockholders can probably bear it without much suffering. But this evil is swallowed up, and may be forgotten, in the more extensive injuries which will result from violated faith, from disordered currency, from lost confidence at home and abroad.

The bank was bound to the performance of certain duties; if it failed, a remedy was provided in the contract. After it had discharged them, it had a perfect right to seek its own profit, by all fair, and honorable, and legal means. It was bound to do so, on every correct principle. The Government itself, as a partner, had a right to expect it. It appointed its directors to look to this object; and it was for this, and this only, that they were appointed; not to take care of the deposites—not to give secret information—not to be spies and informers—not to control the whole management of the bank, and complain if their opinions did not prevail. They represented one of the partners; and the sole effect of their dissatisfaction should be, if Congress concur with them, to sell their stock and cease to be partners; not to withdraw the deposites while they were safe, and all the duties of the bank in relation to them fully discharged. The interest of the nation in the stock, and the propriety of leaving the deposites there, are constantly confounded by the Secretary, the directors, and others, but are distinct in their nature, and the principles applicable to them. It may be wise in the Government to sell its stock when it finds it to be its interest to do so; and yet every regard for good faith may require that the deposites remain. Mismanagement, less profits than might fairly be made, might justify the one but not the other, if the deposites be safely and correctly used.

The Secretary, acting for both parties, or for Congress alone, could not properly reason otherwise on the subject than Congress should reason; and he ought not to have confounded the stock with the deposites, in his action as their representative, or trustee, or umpire. Did it occur to those who passed the law, or to those who subscribed, that the concerns of the bank were to be regulated by these directors, and its transactions governed or influenced by them further than their opinions and votes would reach? Did it occur to them that they were to act as informers under executive appointment and order? secret spies, who were to give information to the President, without the rest of the directors being aware of it? Sir, no man would have subscribed his money on such terms. No honorable mind then dreamed of such degradation of principle and action. On the contrary, Congress and the subscribers knew that it would be important and necessary, at some periods, for the Government to be informed respecting its proceedings and transactions, as they would affect the stock, the deposites, and fidelity to the terms of the charter. They therefore expressly provided modes in which this knowledge should be acquired, by monthly and other reports, by committees of Congress, by agents expressly appointed for that object. But they did not provide for placing the directors under the secret orders of the Executive, to make partisan reports and partial statements on such facts as they could secretly obtain without the knowledge of the other directors. There are ample means in the power of the Government to know every thing which is done, and which is proper or important to be known, without their humbling the Government directors by turning them into agents to discharge the lowest services to which men can be degraded. The very order to the directors to do this service was a trespass on the rights of the bank, a violation of the contract.

Mr. President, has the bank performed the conditions of the contract? If it has, the Secretary had no right to take away the deposites, no matter how unlimited the words by which his power is recognised. That it has performed them fully, amply, there can be no just question. I am not its advocate or apologist. To almost all who have ever been in its direction I am a stranger; with not five of them have I been on terms of intimate acquaintance. I have never had a dollar from its vaults, and never but once have I been within its walls. I have no cause for partiality towards it, and have never been affected in my interests by it, except in the way that every other citizen of the Union has. I am here to pass upon its rights; to do justice, and nothing more; and to this I am bound by the highest and most solemn earthly obligations. And I cannot perceive in what it has failed to comply with its engagements to the Government. It has fulfilled them all, and more. It has paid the million and a half into the treasury; it has transferred the funds of the Government wherever it has been requested, without risk, without expense. More than three hundred millions of your money has passed through its hands, without the loss of a single dollar. It restored your currency, in four or five years, from a depreciation of from five to twenty per cent., until Congress, by its committees, have declared that it was as sound as that of any country. All its duties have been performed; all the facilities which the Government asked or expected have been furnished; so that Secretary after Secretary, administration after administration, have bestowed upon it the highest eulogiums. Senators have only to refer to the documents published to the world by this body to confirm these assertions.

In transferring your funds, it has saved millions to the Government; in restoring the currency, it has cast millions into your treasury. By one single operation, you saved between six and seven millions. It received twelve millions of State bank notes in 1817; and you promptly paid, by that means, nine millions of debt several years before it could otherwise have been discharged. The Bank of Columbia gives an example of this process, and of the losses to which you would have been subjected.

[SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 8, 1834.]

It owed you more than a million of dollars; about one-half was transferred to the bank, and immediate credit given for it, and the bank has thereby lost more than one hundred thousand dollars. It became trustee for the balance, to collect it for the joint benefit of itself and the Government. There is, perhaps, four hundred thousand dollars still due, on which you may yet lose one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And you will lose all—if I am correctly informed, every dollar—which was not so transferred. It was by a process similar to this, in other cases, that this abused bank restored your currency, and saved your money.

Sir, it is now, even when the Secretary assumes the discharge of his high power, admitted by him that your money in the bank is safe. It is admitted by all, even by the reader of the state paper to the cabinet, that the deposits are safe—nay, too safe: for there is too much specie in its vaults. Where, then, is the failure in performing the covenants which can justify the removal? Shall we adopt the doctrine of the Secretary, and say that any motive, any object, may justify the act, whether connected with the conditions of the contract or not? In what an odious light this principle exhibits Congress! As a mere cheat, sir! The amount of the argument is this, and this the language which Congress must use, if it approve the act: It is true, we offered you the deposits to tempt you to enter into the contract; you accepted; but we cunningly inserted a provision that our agent might deprive you of them whenever he chose. We promised you the benefit of them, but we used such language as to permit us to trick you out of them whenever a Secretary could be found to order their removal. You have, it is true, kept your contract, but that is of no importance; we shield ourselves under the words of the agreement to avoid performing ours. Sir, it is mockery. The approval of such reasoning would exhibit a depreciated standard of public and private morality which I hope does not yet exist.

But the Secretary does not stop here. As if to add to the insult, he claims the power to remove the deposits whenever, in his judgment, the convenience and interests of the people require it in any degree. He is thus constituted the judge of the interests and convenience of the people, and the slightest reason is to justify him in violating the charter, when the faith and honor of the Government may be implicated by the act. By what rule is he to judge? The convenience of the people! It is the stale apology to which tyrants and usurpers have always resorted for the violation of the requirements and sanctions of law. The Secretary says the bank cannot complain. Now, as there are two parties to the contract, if the bank cannot complain, let the Secretary do what he pleases, has Congress any right to complain? If one party must be silent, must not the other also? And did the bank believe that, by its charter, such power was granted to the Secretary? Did the Senator, then a member of the other House, who drew this section, believe it? [Mr. WEBSTER. No—certainly not.] Did any of those Senators, then members of that body, who voted for the act, believe it? Not one. They all regarded it as a solemn contract, to be kept, like all other contracts, in good faith by one party as well as by the other; and never imagined that the Secretary, under the general words used, could violate it at will.

Sir, it is necessary that Congress should look to their legislative rights. A power has been claimed over the whole treasury of the Union. The control of that treasury is one of the highest legislative powers granted by the people to Congress. It cannot, must not, be construed away. There are, indeed, those who believe that a surrender of this control would be utterly unconstitutional and void. The argument, it will be observed, stands thus: By the contract, the Secretary has unrestricted power to remove, or not to remove, the deposits. Congress cannot act until he has acted. The Executive has a right to control the Secretary; and thus Congress has surrendered its legislative power, and cannot exercise it except at the will of the Secretary or Executive. Now, sir, I have by me an opinion, given in relation to a grant by a State Legislature of exclusive powers to a company to construct rail-roads within defined limits, and to prevent competition; an extract from which I will read, although I do not concur in the conclusions of the writer.

"It must be acknowledged that there would appear to be high authority for regarding this power as an incident to the power of legislation. In the act of Congress incorporating the Bank of the United States, there is an agreement, on the part of the United States, not to authorize any other bank out of the District of Columbia during the existence of that charter; and similar pledges may be found in similar cases, in the legislation of different States, where the constitution has not expressly conferred on the Legislature the power to make them.

"But, with every respect for the distinguished men who have sanctioned such legislation in the General Government, or in the States, I cannot think that a legislative body, holding a limited authority under a written constitution, can, by contract or otherwise, limit the legislative power of their successors. The power which the constitution gives to the legislative body must always exist in that body until it is altered by the people, and cannot be restricted by a mere legislative act. If they can deprive their successors of the power of chartering companies of a particular description, or in particular places, it is obvious that, upon the same principle, they might deprive them of the power of chartering any corporations for any purpose whatever; and if they might, by contract or otherwise, deprive their successors of this legislative power, they could surrender any other legislative power whatever in the same manner, and bind the State forever to submit to it. The existence of such a power in a representative body has no foundation in reason or in public convenience, and is inconsistent with the principles upon which all our political institutions are founded. For if a legislative body may thus restrict the power of its successors, a single improvident act of legislation may entail lasting and incurable evil on the people of a State. It may compel them to forego the advantages which their local situation affords, and prevent them from using the means necessary to promote the prosperity and happiness of the community."

This extract was not written by R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury, but by R. B. Taney, Attorney General of the United States, within twenty-one days of the date of the order for the removal of the deposits.

Mr. President, the Secretary, under the charter of the bank, holds a mutually delegated trust, which he is to execute, according to the meaning and objects of the contract, for the benefit of both parties, and upon principles which are applicable to all officers and to all official duties, to all powers, and to every trust. The original power of the legislative body still remains the same. The sole intention was to create an agent, which, in the absence of Congress, might guard against danger. But neither Congress nor the Secretary has a right to violate the conditions of the charter. Congress would not, and it is our duty to arrest the Secretary in his attempt to do it. But the Secretary endeavors to sustain his course by a resort to precedent, to usage, and practice. I have not yet had the benefit, on this point, which would arise from reading his answer to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, just printed and laid upon our tables, and may not have all the light which that answer will afford. But I present to the Senate what I believe to be the truth in relation to this subject. The Secretary offers one, and only one, authority; and that is the postscript of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the Mechanics' Bank of New York, of the 13th of February, 1817, as proof of the usage and practice of the department. I have not been able to find, in the history of that postscript; enough to show that even one Secretary of the Treasury has entertained the opinion expressed by the present, much less to justify or apologize for him on the ground of usage.

The bank was chartered on the 20th April, 1816. The subscriptions were made in July, 1816, and it went into operation in January, 1817. Before the subscriptions were made, and before the close of the session at which the charter was granted, and also before the charter went into operation, while Congress had full control over the subject, a joint resolution, with the force of law, was passed, requiring and directing the Secretary to adopt measures to cause, as soon as might be, all duties, taxes, debts, &c., payable to the United States, to be collected and paid, in legal currency, treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or notes of banks payable in legal currency; and fixing the 20th February then next (1817) as the day after which the payments ought to be so made. The object of this resolution was the restoration of specie currency; and Mr. Crawford was directed, as a means of restoring it, to require payments to be made in the mode prescribed. Under this resolution a large correspondence took place between the Secretary and the State banks. They had resolved to endeavor to restore it by the 1st of July following; it was his duty and desire to restore it by the 20th February. On the 26th December, 1816, he addressed a circular letter to them, which is a guide to all the subsequent correspondence. This letter, a copy of which is before me, states that the Bank of the United States would go into operation on the 1st of January, and be ready on that day to receive the public moneys deposited in the State banks; that, before he decides on handing over these deposits, he wishes to know if the State banks will adhere to their determination not to resume specie payments until the 1st of July. If they do, he will promptly order the deposits to be paid over; but if they resume by the 20th February, the day fixed by Congress, no part of the deposits shall be transferred, unless to sustain the Bank of the United States from any pressure attempted to be made upon it. And he closes by stating that "there exists no reason to expect that the resolution of the last session of Congress, relative to the collection of the revenue after the 20th of February next, will be rescinded." It will be perceived, at once, that this circular relates to the restoration of specie payments on the 20th of February; that it is written under, and by virtue of, the resolution of the 30th April, 1816, and not under the charter of the bank, which had not then gone into operation; that the whole authority for the letter was the power granted and the duty enjoined by the resolution. It will also be perceived that it relates to the money then in deposit in the State banks, and not to money which had been deposited in the Bank of the United States, and which was to be withdrawn from it. To these deposits, the bank, when it went into operation, made claim, and requested the Secretary to transfer them. He admitted that there was justice in the claim, but as it was not absolutely required by law that he should transfer them, and as it was important to use them in the best mode to enable the banks to resume specie payments, he declined; and it is to these deposits that I understand the postscript of Mr. Crawford to apply. The Mechanics' Bank was one of those which found difficulty in breaking the arrangement for the 1st July, and wrote to the Secretary on the 9th January, 1817, soon after the date of the circular, and in answer to that circular, stating the grounds on which they could not comply with the proposition of the Secretary to resume on the 20th February, and adding, if the resolution should not be rescinded or altered by Congress, they would reconsider their decision. It was in relation to the propositions and difficulties suggested by this letter of the Mechanics' Bank, and to the propositions which were in debate between the Bank of the United States, the State banks, and the Secretary, about the transfer of the deposits previously made in the State banks, that the letter and postscript of Mr. Crawford, of the 13th February, 1817, was written. They had no relation to deposits made in the Bank of the United States, nor do they furnish any assertion of authority by Mr. Crawford to touch deposits accruing after the charter went into operation. The body of his letter expressly refers to the circular; and the assertion is, of a right to transfer those deposits, to equalize the benefits in the efforts making by the banks to restore specie payments. It is too explicit to have been misunderstood by the Secretary, if he had examined it with proper caution and adequate knowledge of the operations of the treasury at that time. The letters and documents to which I have referred may be found by Senators in document 140, being an answer of Mr. Crawford to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th May, 1822; and I think I may affirm, with confidence, that the postscript relied upon does not sustain the Secretary in the course which he has adopted. Whether he has been able to find any other sayings of Mr. Crawford, or of some other Secretary, which will give plausibility to his assumption of power, we shall discover when we read his recent communication. In the mean time I refer Senators to Mr. Crawford's letters of 28th February, 1817, and 17th March, 1817, and his report of the 27th February, 1823, giving an account of all the transfers made by his directions from the date of the charter; and I think the conclusion from them will be found to be irresistible, that he did not claim even to select the banks in which deposits were made; and that his transfers were either from State banks to State banks, or of the old deposits; and, above all, that he did not claim the unlimited power which has been recently exercised.

On Friday, Mr. S. continued his remarks as follows: I am warned, Mr. President, by my personal feelings, and by regard for the time of the Senate, to contract, as far as practicable, my remaining remarks.

Mr. Crawford's opinion, as I have represented it, seems to be confirmed by his answer to the charges made against him in 1822 and 1823, an occasion on which he acquired reputation by the ability with which he defended himself from a vigorous assault upon his integrity as a man and an officer. In his letter of 8th May, 1824, to the committee, he states that he had selected some of the western banks as places of deposit, having an understanding with the Bank of the United States, and that the act was useful to it. The letter of Mr. Cheres, approving the course of the Secretary, is dated 5th September, 1819, and is full and explicit. Three of these banks, at Chillicothe, Cincinnati, and Louisville, were in places where there were branches. He omitted to report the fact to Congress through inadvertence; but he states that the bank, "whose interest it was the object of that provision of the charter to guard," had full explanation, and approved it.

The committee, consisting of Messrs. Floyd, Livingston, Webster, Randolph, Taylor, McArthur, and Owens, do not disapprove the act of the Secretary, or his reasons, but justify his conduct; and they state that a practice, which had sometimes prevailed to direct the operations of the treasury "to the support of different moneyed associations, whose affairs required support, to defeat combination against them, and preserve equilibrium, was no legal employment of the public funds. It was nothing but a gratuitous loan."

The present Secretary will derive little support from this history. But should it appear that Mr. Crawford did entertain, or that, in one or a few instances, he had acted on that opinion, in the difficult circumstances in which he was compelled to arrange the relations of the financial department with the national bank, and aid in restoring a sound currency, under the orders of Congress, I am not willing to receive such opinion and acts as conclusive, in the construction of the charter. As the opinion and acts of Mr. Crawford I should respect them, but not admit that they were obligatory. The general practice of the Government since 1816, the obvious principles applicable to the construction of the charter, and the opinions of Congress in various forms, are much more persuasive upon my judgment. All these have been violated and disregarded by the Secretary. He has applied accidental and temporary arrangements, and an opinion in the postscript to a letter, to a power granted, if it exist at all, by contract, and which reaches the control of the whole treasury of the Union at all times. The Secretary relies on slight evidence when it concurs with his own views and principles, but is not quite so prompt to regard higher evidence when it is adverse to them. It would have been well if he had manifested equal respect for the abundant proof of the constitutionality of the bank, and the opinion of Congress as to the safety of the depositories. The Senate has not reasoned heretofore as the Secretary reasons. The Committee of Finance of the Senate, in 1829, had several resolutions referred to them, the object of one of which was to compel the bank to pay some compensation for the depositories; and the means of compulsion were the withdrawal of the depositories by the Secretary. They reported that it was inexpedient to act on these resolutions; and thus reason: "The 16th section enacts that the depositories of the money of the United States shall be made in the bank and its branches, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case he shall lay before Congress the reason of such order or direction. It is admitted that the first branch of the section is conclusive, as to the right of the bank to the depositories without charge to it; but it is argued that the second part qualifies that right, and that the authority given to the Secretary to withdraw the depositories gives him power to do so in case the bank should refuse to give further compensation for the use of those depositories. If that had been the object the words would have been, in the opinion of the committee, explicit as to a point so very material. The committee see, in the power given to the Secretary, a discreet precaution; and the words, they believe, convey only the idea, that if, at any time, the Secretary shall be of opinion that there will be a danger of loss to the United States by its money remaining in the vaults of the bank, he may remove it for safety, and report his reasons to Congress. No other construction can, in the opinion of the committee, be given to that part of the 16th section. The power to withdraw the funds by the Secretary has never been deemed necessary; and it may well be doubted whether Congress can interfere, in any way, until he shall act under the power. The idea that Congress have given, by inference, to the Secretary of the Treasury, a power to exact money from the bank by a threat of withdrawing the depositories, cannot be entertained by the committee."

Of this report one thousand copies were printed for circulation.

If Congress have not given to the Secretary the power to exact compensation for the use of the depositories, have they given the more odious power of depriving the bank of the whole depositories, whenever a Secretary can be found ductile enough to be commanded to believe that the interest and convenience of the people require his high prerogative protection? The committee affirm that the power was given to secure the safety of the money; and that committee consisted of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, Mr. McLane, Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, Mr. Branch, and

Mr. Silsbee. The same committee again, upon another and distinct reference, made the same report on the 12th of January, 1832. It then consisted of Messrs. Smith, Tyler, Marcy, Silsbee, and Johnston. In each committee there was a majority of the friends of the present Executive. Sir, it is but a short period from January, 1832, to September, 1833. I find no evidence that any one of the Senate then questioned the soundness of the opinion of the committee, and shall be glad to learn, in the progress of this discussion, how far there has been a change of opinion here or elsewhere, and on what grounds.

But the right to transfer the depositories is urged as an independent ground on which the power of the Secretary is to be vindicated. It will be a sufficient answer to this argument to refer to the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the charter. The fifteenth declares that, "whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States and the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange." And the sixteenth requires the public money to be deposited in the bank and its branches, where there are any. Now it is obvious that the duty of the Secretary is to require the transfers; that of the bank to make them. He is to direct the place where the money is wanted for use; the bank is to be at the expense of putting it there. The object of these transfers is also designated—the payment of the public creditors. The transfer and the payment are embraced in the same provision, and rest on the same condition—both to be directed by the Secretary; both to be done by the bank; and the power of the Secretary might as fairly be inferred from one as from the other. To infer the power to deprive the bank of the whole benefit of the depositories, at will, because there is a power to require transfers for distribution in payment of debts, is but another evidence from what slight grounds power can be inferred by those who desire to exercise it.

The power intended to be given to the Secretary was, perhaps, salutary; and there may, perhaps, have been some want of caution and precision in the wording of it; but if this be so, which I do not admit, an ample apology for Congress is found in the fact, that no one then imagined such principles of construction as have, in these reforming days, been discovered and approved. The men who had held the office before that time—Hamilton, Wolcott, Dexter, Gallatin, Campbell, Dallas—although they were versed in official concerns, and the length of the service of each outran that of four who have recently followed them, had not exhibited such skill in construing their powers, and those of the Executive, as to put Congress effectually upon its guard.

But, sir, if the power be conferred, and was reserved, what was it? 1. To order the depositories to be made. This must, from its nature, be directed, not to the bank, but to inferior officers and debtors, where to pay or place the money, and must be prospective, and relate to moneys to be subsequently acquired. 2. The transfer—which relates not to change of possession in the bank, but to a change of the place where the bank shall hold it. Neither amounts to nor authorizes the withdrawal or taking money out of the treasury. This is a totally different act, and governed by different laws and rules. The constitution and the law governing it have been read to the Senate. I have no anxiety about the definition of the word treasury. That of the Senator from Kentucky is correct. It is that place, one or many, where the money is put, and is to remain until drawn out according to the provisions of law. In this light it is regarded in all our state papers and documents, in the messages of the President, the reports of the Secretary, the proceedings of Congress, and the laws which are enacted.

Whenever money is in the hands of the Government, has been paid to it, and not paid away, it is said to be in the treasury. Before the bank was formed there were more than ninety State banks in which the money was placed, and these were all one treasury; and withdrawing money from any one of them was taking it out of the treasury; and if taken out without the forms of law, if not paid on legal warrants, it was a violation of law; and so it is since the bank was created. That is the treasury now, in the same way that the State banks were before; and if the Secretary withdraws one dollar of it, with or without the executive sanction, it is a breach of the law. The true doctrine of the executive right to interfere with the money of the nation is this: While it is in the treasury the Executive has no power to touch or control it. After it is drawn out, according to law, and placed in the hands of executive officers to be expended, the right of the Executive, such as it is, commences. What it then is, I will not delay the Senate by examining further.

Under these views, Mr. President, of the acts and principles of the Secretary, I am compelled to dissent from him. He has, in my opinion, done acts for which he had no legal authority. His order to place the future receipts of the nation in the selected banks, his order to the disbursing agents to place their money in the same banks, and his taking the money, already in the treasury, out of it, to loan to his favored banks, are all violations of the law—gross violations—for which I can see no satisfactory excuse in any just principles under our system of government.

I now ask attention to his reasons for the removal. They seem to be composed of mistaken facts and false principles.

His reasons are of two kinds. 1. Relating to the time. 2. To the misconduct of the Bank of the United States. Under the first he argues that the public general interest required it, without the delay of sixty days to consult Congress. Under the second, that it was demanded as a penalty on [the bank. In relation to the time, he attempts to prove four propositions. [Report, page 11.]

The first is, that it was the duty of the department not to act upon the assumption that Congress would change the law, but to regulate its conduct on the principle that the charter would expire in 1836. His reasoning in its support is in pages 3 and 4. Now, sir, I admit freely that the Secretary, like all other officers, was bound to act under the law, as he found it—as it existed. He had no right to speculate one way or the other. He was to perform his duty, and not presume that Congress would not, any more than that Congress would; and this is especially true, as Congress was about to meet, to whom the legislative power on the subject belonged.

But why would he not anticipate a renewal of the charter? Because, 1st, Justice did not require it. 2d, Public opinion forbade it. Justice did not require it, because it was an exclusive privilege, at the expense of the rest of the community, enjoyed for twenty years! Is this so? Was it so in the origin of the charter? Every citizen of the Union was at liberty to become a partner in the concern, on the terms offered by Congress. None were prohibited; none excluded. Those who did not choose to accept them have no right to complain that others, who did, have derived benefit from them. I admit, with the Secretary, that the present stockholders have no peculiar right to peculiar privileges, and may not claim a renewal, except so far as the interest of the Government may be promoted by having a bank, and it may think proper to renew this if it have faithfully performed its duty. But if the charter were not renewed, and a new one were formed, the same state of things would exist as now does, in relation to this point, and must always exist, while there is a bank. It is an objection, not so much to the renewal of this charter, as to the existence of any bank. The report of the committee of the House in February, 1832, places this matter in its true light. But, sir, who constituted the Secretary the judge of this question? Who gave him the right to discharge the duties of Congress, and decide this matter? What authority has he to say that it is or is not wise to create a monopoly? to grant exclusive privileges? that Congress ought, or ought not, to renew the charter? If such notions are to prevail, it might be well for us to take the advice which partisans have given—go home, and let matters be better managed without us than with us.

But has this bank been an oppression to the community? I repeat, sir, that it is not so. You have saved, at a low estimate, from forty to sixty millions by its operations. The transactions of your financial concerns have cost you nothing; three hundred millions have been received, transferred, paid, without the loss of a dollar; your currency rendered the very best ever known in any nation in modern times; your contracts have been facilitated; the intercourse of your citizens, in all the relations of life and business, promoted and rendered easy and profitable; the very bonds of your Union strengthened, by enabling the people in the extremes of the nation to transact their business with each other, with almost as much facility as if they were embraced within the narrowest compass. Sir, I do not allude to these things as urging the merits of the bank, nor with any view to any question hereafter to arise as to its recharter. It has only the merit (and it is certainly not a small one) of having, faithfully to the Government and its own stockholders, discharged its duties. The credit is due to the wise men who formed the bank as a fit instrument of benefit both to the Government and people. But these things show that the want of justice and the expense to the rest of the community were at least a questionable ground for the confidence of the Secretary in the exercise of his discretion.

But he could not anticipate the renewal, because he says, "I am firmly persuaded that the law which created this corporation, in many of its provisions, is not warranted by the constitution; and that the existence of such a powerful moneyed monopoly is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and to the purity of our political institutions." We are left to our guesses as to the grounds of his firm persuasion. I shall not stop to inquire either when this firm persuasion had its origin, whether long since, when his political and constitutional opinions were formed, or within the last two or three years, within which time many of our citizens have felt much new and overwhelming conviction about the unconstitutionality of the bank, and found their zeal on this topic so much augmented, and have laid their original opinions as a fit offering at the footstool of power and patronage. Nor, sir, shall I now inquire into the correctness of the opinion expressed. The question before us is not whether Congress have constitutional power to create this or any other bank, nor whether it is dangerous to liberty. It has been created. It is in existence. It is the law of the land. But I do inquire by what right an officer, created by law, and bound to discharge duties under any of our laws, assumes the authority to question their constitutionality, or to found his actions upon his belief that they are invalid and void? He is directed to perform a duty under a law, engages in its performance, and then finds a motive for his conduct in the assertion that it is not binding upon him. Sir, to what will not this lead? Might not the Secretary, by the same rule, have said that the charter, the contract on which he relies as allowing to him unrestricted leisure of motive and action, was void, and therefore he disregarded it altogether, and removed the deposits because they were unconstitutionally placed where they were? It would have been equally proper, and would have saved him some trouble of argument.

But he forgot, sir, that he was exercising a power under this very law. If unconstitutional, how could it confer any power on him? or justify any action which he performed, however unlimited its words?

If the Secretary may act and reason thus, every other officer, high and low, may do the same; each may deny the validity of the law which binds him to do what he is unwilling to do. Each may, like the Secretary, assume the power of Congress, and render unnecessary the existence of the judicial tribunals. The President had better look to it: he may find his subordinates somewhat troublesome to him, with such notions. Or, are only those to act on these principles who conform to his opinions and execute his purposes?

Sir, it is quite instructive to hear this firm persuasion thus pronounced after forty years of our national existence have gone by, during three-fourths of which a national bank has been in operation, and which have been not only the most fortunate, but the only fortunate portions of our financial history. The first Congress, enlightened by the counsels of Washington and Hamilton, and others who had profited by the light elicited when our constitution was formed, had no such firm persuasion, but created a bank. Another Congress refused to propose amendments to the constitution, in order to obtain the power, principally because it already existed. Three others have passed bank laws, one of which contained a large majority of political friends of the Executive; committees of another Congress, similarly constituted, have affirmed the power. In favor of this very charter, we find the names of such men as Lowndes and Gaston, Ingham and Oakley, Pleasants and Pickering, Barbour and Stockton, Roberts and Daggett, and others whom I might name, if they were beyond the sound of my voice. The Legislatures of more than one-half of all the States have approved the exercise of the power. Every President, except the present, has done the same; for even Mr. Jefferson put his signature to one or more laws to create branches, and facilitate the action of the first bank. He did not, at least, while acting under the law, deny the constitutionality of the law, and assume that as a motive for his conduct. Every Secretary of the Treasury, from 1789 to 1833—Hamilton, Wolcott, Dexter, Gallatin, Campbell, Dallas, Crawford, Rush, Ingham, McLane, (one of the present cabinet,)—all admitted, not merely its constitutionality, but its necessity to the finances of the country. The Judiciary of most of the States have admitted it; and, above all, it has been sustained by that elevated tribunal which is the ultimate judge whether legislation be constitutional or not—elevated, sir, not more by its constitutional powers and dignity, than by the learning, the purity, the firmness, the patriotic spirit, which have guided its deliberations and controlled its judgments, securing to it the profound homage of this and other nations.

Sir, after all this, is it not a process of unusual modesty, in a subordinate and temporary officer of your Government, to act, in such a case, on his firm persuasion that all these have been in error, and that a future Congress could not entertain opinions which have been thus sanctioned and illustrated?

We are assured by the Secretary that public opinion has settled this question, and that this settlement is now matter of history. This megrim of the brain has crept into the belief of more than one in high places. It is not perhaps wonderful that it should be fixed immovably in one spot; but that others should entertain it, and act upon it, as if it were law, to govern their actions when executing law, is not a little surprising. What is the proof which the Secretary refers to? That the issue respecting the recharter and future existence of the bank was tendered voluntarily by the bank, and accepted; that pains were taken to "frame the issue," and that it was tried by the presidential election. Is this true? Have the people of this Union, in the performance of their highest and most sacred function, that of election, descended to the degradation of trying an issue between the bank and a candidate for the presidency? Have they made all the great questions, arising out of their constitution and the policy of the Government, subservient to such an issue? forgetting them all, and deciding this alone? For myself, I admit no such degradation. When did the bank frame the issue with so much care? I know of nothing which it has done, and nothing is alleged but the expenditures for printing, which are complained of, and its application for the renewal of its charter. The former were certainly not very effective means of either framing or trying the issue. If Senators will examine the accounts they will find $179 91 paid for newspapers; not as much, for the time, as we pay for the papers of six members of Congress; not enough for a daily paper from the States where its branches are located. They will find, I believe, $6,453 29 for pamphlets of the highest merit, fit for the instruction of all classes, and about $9,848 21 for reviews and addresses. This, sir, is a small sum with which to bribe a whole people, newspaper editors and all, in an election. But, sir, the answer is, that these expenditures were made with the professed, and, I see no reason to doubt, the sincere object of defending the bank from continued, vehement, persecuting, and injurious assaults upon it, by which the value of its stock was depreciated, and the owners of that stock injured. An estimate of the injury may be made by observing the loss which the public treasury and the people of the United States have suffered. When the President and his friends first made their attack upon it, your seven millions of stock was worth eight and a half million. It stood somewhere between 125 and 130, and the first assault reduced it so much that you lost by it $750,000. Subsequent assaults have continued the process, and you have now lost a million. If they are further continued it will be reduced to par, and you will lose one and a half million. Fortunately you cannot lose more; neither official vengeance nor private malignity can reduce it below par, and bankrupt it. It is now able to pay, and must continue able to pay, its stock, in full count. If, sir, when these assaults were made, the bank had been perfectly silent—stood still—made no effort to protect the property which it held as trustee for others, it would have failed to perform its duty. In private life such an agent would have been branded as faithless and unjust. Any State bank, thus negligent, would have lost its credit, and subjected itself to scorn and ruin. In what does the Bank of the United States differ from them? They are equally trustees for others. There was an equal obligation on them to protect their rights, and disprove the false assumptions on which the assaults rested.

"But they made a voluntary and premature application for a renewal of their charter." If this be true, does it prove any thing more than that they misjudged as to time, and were in too great haste to be assured of their fate? How did they know? Who had told them that this would form an issue between them and the President? Had he? No, sir. He had not. Up to that hour his final decision in regard to the bank was matter of speculation only; and at least one-half of his friends not merely asserted that he would approve a recharter, but they actually electioneered for him on that ground. A contrary allegation was charged as a political finesse of the adversaries of the President. It was so in the middle, the west, and the north of the Union—every where, except where the charter was considered unconstitutional. And, sir, they were right. In his message of December, 1829, he uses this language: "The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will, most probably, apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy, in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating the bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

He then proceeds to suggest the propriety of considering whether a bank may not be founded on the credit and revenues of the Government. It is unnecessary to speak of the suggestions respecting the currency and a new scheme for a bank. It so happened, that the first was flatly denied, and was certainly incorrect; and the latter scouted, by even his own devoted friends, in and out of Congress. The suggestions were such, that none, or almost none, were found so brave, or so pliable, as to sustain them. There may have been many conversions since, for aught that I know. There are very operative means of producing conversions of opinions in these our days. But, sir, I put it to the candor of every man, if the President did not then say that it was time the question of recharter should be considered—if he did not tell the bank so, as well as Congress and the people—if he did not invite the bank to have it settled, so far as its settlement depended upon it. It could not be too soon presented to the consideration of the Legislature. Precipitancy was to be avoided. If the bank, on reading that message, had sent a memorial to Congress, would it not have been a compliance with the expressed wishes of the President? Would any man then have thought it criminal? or an intentional formation of an issue between it and the President? Subsequent events have induced its enemies to give it this aspect. The bank did not then apply. In December, 1830, the call was renewed. In December, 1831, it was repeated, with the declaration that, as he had done his duty in urging the subject, he would "leave it, at present, to the investigation of an enlightened people and their representatives." It was after all these calls, that the bank did precisely what the President had recommended, present it to the consideration of Congress, and ask the decision of the question, and a renewal of the charter, if, in their opinion, the public interest required or permitted it.

The matter was before Congress—under its consideration—at the moment when their memorial was presented. If it was brought there by a friend, was it criminal to unite with that friend in his wish to have the question decided? If by an enemy, was it wrong in resisting the intended destruction? If for good, to aid in its accomplishment? If for evil, to ward off the blow? Was it premature, when the President, on his high official sanction, had declared that the question ought to be settled? Was it premature, when, in three annual messages, he had urged its seasonable decision? Or, sir, was it not premature in 1829, 1830, and 1831, because it might then have been supposed that the bank could be destroyed; and did it become premature afterwards, when it was discovered that this object could not be accomplished, and that time was wanted to weaken the bank by secret investigations and public slanders, and to move the machinery of party to subserve the purposes of private and personal hostility? On what, sir, does the Secretary build his grand argument, that he was bound to force the bank to wind up? Is it not the near approach of the end of the charter? And yet it was but little more than one year before, that the bank asked to be informed whether the charter would be renewed, and that was so premature as to be criminal. It was not premature in the Secretary, in August and September, 1833, to trample on all laws to compel the bank to wind up; and yet it was odiously premature to have the question of winding up settled in the spring of 1832. Such is the consistency and the reasoning of a Secretary of the Treasury. This whole matter is an insult to the common understanding of the people. I have too much regard for that understanding to believe that they can be deluded by its absurdity.

Up to this period; up to the passage of the bill to recharter the bank; up to the veto on that bill by the President, the question as to the ultimate action of the President was unsettled. I appeal to history and the records of this Government for proof of my assertion. Did that veto change it? I admit that the President, in that veto, declares the bill unconstitutional, on account of some of its provisions, but not for want of power in Congress to create a bank. For, with the most paternal kindness and benevolence towards the ignorance of Congress in the discharge of the duties which the people have confided to them, he assures them, "had the Executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed." The President—the Executive—called upon by Congress to furnish a plan by which Congress shall manage, and control, and regulate the finances of the country! Admirable modesty and knowledge of the relative rights and obligations of the executive and legislative branches of our Government!

But, sir, in all this, due regard was observed not to close up the question. For we are assured that, after the veto, "a general discussion will take place, eliciting new light, and settling important principles; and a new Congress, elected in the midst of such discussions, and furnishing an equal representation of the people, according to the last census, will bear to the Capitol the verdict of public opinion, and, I doubt not, bring this question to a satisfactory result." What Congress was to bear this verdict to the Capitol? The present—that now in actual session in that very Capitol—members elected amidst those discussions—of which, sir, I am one! We were to bear the verdict! Had the Secretary heard it when he acted? Did the Executive wait to hear it? How did they know what we should say? How know that a majority would not be of opinion that the bank ought to be rechartered? or that even two-thirds might not be found to oppose, on this point, the executive will, should that will resist their views in managing their constitutional guardianship over the treasury? Could they not wait sixty days for that verdict for which they had promised to wait? Was the country on the brink of ruin, sliding down the precipice into the gulf of irretrievable bankruptcy, that its drowning honor and perishing fortunes must be thus rudely rescued? Sir, that message was a solemn promise by the Executive to let this question be settled by Congress, and to submit to it. What else can the words mean, but that the people would consider the subject, and their representatives decide it? Did the President intend to trifle with the people? to profess regard for their opinions, as expressed through Congress, and yet to scorn those opinions by his actions? Was he giving out Delphic responses? Did he "palter with us in a double sense?" No, sir; he meant then what he said, however ill the promise has been kept, under the influence of those who have surrounded him. The people so understood—they so believed. It was to be tested whether, without new arguments or new facts, legislative assemblies, chambers of commerce, and the great majority of the people of these States, had changed their opinions upon the new lights which subservience to party and devotion to men have afforded. Nay, it was even reasonable to suppose that the President himself might yield his official opinions to the deliberate, well-considered opinions of a majority of the people, and to permit their judgments to govern in this land of majorities, and under institutions which have so long sanctioned the existence of such a fiscal agent. It had been so before. Mr. Madison had yielded his doubts, upon principles and for reasons which do equal honor to his head and heart, and which are well developed in his letter of 25th June, 1831.

He thought it was wise to regard the question as settled, after all that had occurred. He knew and felt that, under all Governments, misera est servitus ubi jus est aut vagum, aut incognitum. The lesson he teaches is worthy of imitation, not only from its intrinsic merits, but from the character of him who teaches it. He is worthy, sir, of the deepest homage and the closest imitation. He has devoted a long, a pure, and a useful life to his country. He has left the impress of his virtues and his talents on your constitution and your laws, in all their history; and he now exhibits one of the most dignified, and lovely, and venerable specimens of a philosophic and patriotic old age that the world has ever been permitted to witness.

Mr. President, the assertion of the Secretary, that this question was finally and irreversibly settled, is not only opposed to fact and to the respect due to Congress, but it is not respectful even to the character of the President himself. It turns upon the allegation that the President was elected because he was opposed to the bank. It supposes disingenuousness in him in his messages to Congress; and that this single merit, this hostility to the bank, was the cause of the preference of him by the people. Had he, then, no other merits? Was there no other cause why he should be preferred, without even remembering his opposition to the bank? Had he rendered no services to his country; fought no battles; gained no glory; suffered no privations; made no sacrifices? Had he no constitutional principles to secure regard? no acts of reform to win favor? Must the people have voted for him for this merit alone? Does any man believe that he received a single vote on this ground, which he would not have received had there been no quarrel with the bank? No, sir; I do not thus estimate the intelligence of the people, nor the motives of their approbation and support. The President was chosen for other and stronger reasons, however unfounded and misguided I may regard them. His election was no reason on which the Secretary can be justified in making the great movement which affected, not our finances alone, but all the business and prosperity of the country. And he can find no apology in it, unless he assumes the odious position, that the President's will is law, and his opinions the unerring guide of legislative action.

The two next positions of the Secretary are, [Rep. p. 11,] that the deposits ought not to remain in the bank until the charter expired in 1836; and, as the Secretary only could remove them, it was his duty then to act. In relation to his exclusive power, I have said all that I intend. The reasoning of the Secretary, to be found in pages 4 and 5, as I understand it, is this: that the deposits always amount to several millions; their sudden withdrawal, at the expiration of the charter, would create inconvenience, and make the deposits unsafe, so that it could not return them to the Government; that its outstanding notes would lose their value when not received for Government dues, and holders at a distance suffer by their depreciation; that a sound currency must in the mean time be created; that this can, under his direction, be accomplished by the State banks, but could not be hastily substituted at the expiration of the charter.

Now, sir, I profess to have very little financial skill or knowledge. I have not made it the study of my life; but few and passing moments, amidst other employments, have been devoted to acquiring it. But, as I am compelled to form and express, by my vote, an opinion on the financial reasons of the Secretary, such views as I have must be my guide in that vote.

In the first place, it occurs to me that the Secretary has mistaken the time when the affairs of the bank are to be wound up. Its charter, for certain purposes, expires in 1836; but for paying its debts, and calling in its claims—in other words, settling up its concerns—it has two years beyond that period. The 21st section of the charter so expressly provides: "Notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits for the final settlement of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but not for any other purpose or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." It has, therefore, four instead of two years to accomplish the work of which the Secretary speaks, and we must apply his reasoning to the four, and not to the two years. This provision, to my mind, indisputably proves the intention of Congress that the bank should discount, should do every thing, make profit, and possess all its privileges, until 1836; that the deposits should be enjoyed up to that time, and it should not be compelled to close its business transactions before the full end of twenty years, the time mentioned in its charter. It is a charter for twenty, not eighteen years. The time subsequently given for winding up was designed to enable it to act to the last moment, and to relieve it from the difficulties under which the old bank labored for want of such a provision. I find in this fact, in this provision, a full answer to the whole argument of the Secretary as to time—a conclusive reason to believe that he has violated the intention of Congress and the chartered rights of the bank. Congress gave the bank twenty years, and did not authorize the Secretary, by his volition, to deprive it of two years of that time.

In the next place we must apply the reasoning to a solvent, rich bank; able to pay all its debts, and count down its silver and gold, on every demand. This solvency, though not long since questioned by its adversaries, is now admitted by the President—by the Secretary—by all. And what its difficulties in 1819 or 1820 have to do with its present condition, I am unable to discover. We are speaking of it in 1833—now—and what it must be in 1836 under proper management. If it were even compelled to wind up at this moment, the official reports of the Secretary prove that it is entirely able to pay deposits—debts—every thing, and have a large surplus. I need not repeat the figures in the statement of its situation on the 1st of this month. It had in bills, and notes, stocks, specie, and debts from State banks, about seventy-two millions, besides its large surplus contingent fund, and about three millions in real estate; and all the claims which could be made against it for stock, notes in circulation, and debts, did not amount, I think, to more than sixty-seven millions. It had more than ten millions of specie in its vaults in December, and that specie constantly accumulating. It has no cause to fear any attack. It can pay its debts, and restore to its stockholders their money, and much more. In winding up its concerns, and calling in its dues, its specie must, by necessity, constantly augment. It will require its payments from debtors, and State banks to be in specie, that it may answer the claims upon it at home and abroad, from creditors and stockholders.

Apply, then, the positions of the Secretary to such a bank, having four years to close its concerns; or, if you please, having only two.

The sudden withdrawal, at the expiration of the charter, of the deposits. How could those deposits be unsafe? more unsafe then than now? Why withdraw them suddenly? Why with more haste than the claims against the Government would require? But, with whatever haste, why should not the bank be able to pay them? They must be paid before the stockholders, and the whole means of the bank, stock and all, to four times their amount, would be answerable for them. They had in December about forty millions, subject to the payment of their eleven millions of public and private deposits. The same amount of deposits which alarmed the Secretary have been paid, and suddenly, too, by the bank, more than once, and no bankruptcy or pressure has ensued. They never have been, and never can be, more safe than at the precise moment that the bank closes its active business, and no longer puts any of its concerns at hazard. It is so with all solvent trustees and agents, and must be so with the bank. But, sir, the Secretary need not be disturbed by the anticipated loss of the deposits. If we may trust his own reports, and if matters proceed as they have done for the last two or three years, there will be little or no money to deposit. The augmented expenses of administration and the insolvency of departments will relieve us from any cause for apprehension on this subject.

Again: should the notes of the bank, not being received for Government dues, depreciate, and holders at a distance lose by them? The receipt of these notes by the Government is doubtless useful to their circulation, but it is not their only nor chief value. This is already proved by the depreciated condition of the notes of some of the selected banks, at a distance from the places where they are issued. They are below par. The chief value consists in their being payable in specie whenever demanded; their circulation throughout the Union, wherever business or pleasure requires them; and because, from the nature of the commerce and trade of the country, their tendency is to the commercial cities—to the sea-board, where they will be cash, or its equivalent, to all who hold them. After new issues shall have ceased, they will and must be sought by all in the interior who have transactions upon the sea-coast. The amount of them now in circulation is stated at eighteen or nineteen millions—at this moment probably twenty millions. They form about one-fourth of the circulating medium of the country, and are never greater in amount than appears in the reports of the bank to the department. They will be lessened, of course, by the prudence and caution of the bank as it approaches its dissolution; but, even if they were augmented, the causes before stated would ensure their continued credit. I wish the Secretary had instructed us how notes thus situated can depreciate below their nominal value; or how a bank, thus strong, would be unable to pay its deposits, public or private. Nothing but the utter and entire ruin of its debtors, and of the State banks, which owed it five millions of dollars on the 1st of January, could produce the predicted evil. It is perchance possible that the prophet, and those who sustain him, may be powerful enough to occasion the fulfilment of his prophecy; but they must reach it through the destruction of the credit and confidence of the country, and the prostration of commerce, and dealing, and prosperity in the community.

The amount in circulation is large in itself, but small when compared with the capital of the bank. In the reports of Mr. Crawford, several years after it was created, this point is developed and discussed. It has been greater before and since the present Secretary reasoned about it. Its withdrawal, and closing up the concerns of the bank, will of course be felt whenever it may be performed, though with the utmost caution and moderation. It must be so in closing any large banking institution, or any large mercantile establishment; but, left to itself, unforced by the mandate of power, it would be less felt than the pressure which now afflicts the community. The bank would not be obliged to withdraw from the active employments of the country means greater than it has now been compelled to do. Its debts and credits, to the amount of the former, would but change hands, in the shape of some new circulation, and the balances due to it be paid in specie, or what would be received as equivalent by its stockholders. The amount to which it has curtailed its business within the last five months has been stated at twelve millions—I know not on what evidence. The statements and the reports from the Secretary show no such fact. It has been reduced, in about that period, somewhere about nine millions; but its own circulation has not been diminished. The sum mentioned has been withdrawn from active use; for there was no substitute supplied by our financial Secretary: there can be no substitute in the present state of things. The State banks are incompetent to supply it. But, in winding up, it would not be compelled to withdraw from active use one-half nor one-fourth of that amount, in the same time; and these would be replaced by other circulation. What would be the value of that circulation, and how far it would subserve the convenience of the people of the country, is quite a different matter. There would be enough—its quality no man can tell. We had an example once on this point. When the old Bank of the United States was closed, other banks grew up like mushrooms in a night, and perished almost as soon. They threw out abundance of paper; but it was not money, nor the equal representative of money. Your currency increased, in four or five years, from about forty-five to much more than one hundred millions; and the consequences on the prosperity of the people and the Government need not be described to him who has not memory enough to recollect them, or virtue enough to desire to guard against them. Absolute, unavoidable, uncontrollable, grinding necessity compelled us to seek a remedy. It was found, by the wisdom of Congress, in the charter of this bank, and in the restoration of specie payments—the restoration of money to the country. In less than five years, the circulation was reduced from nearly one hundred and ten to about fifty-five millions; and the effect has been told in years of private and public prosperity, until ignorance or folly blasted it. I am also unable to perceive why evils produced by the winding up of the bank, in two years, in 1836 and 1837, should be greater than in 1834 and 1835? Why should they be greater, when the bank and the country, by the regular process under the law, are prepared for the operation, than when the Secretary, suddenly and unexpectedly, forces it upon them? We ought to have been instructed upon this point.

But, sir, although I cannot see why these notes should be depreciated, and these evils result which the Secretary so clearly foresaw, I think I can perceive why the stock itself may not bear, in market, the same price as when the charter had longer to run, and why it will not do to judge it now by "the infallible price current." As its charter approaches a close, it is not a place for permanent investments, whence fair profits and interest may be expected for years to come. It will then be an article to be purchased only at its actual transfer value. It will bring just so much, and no more, as the buyer believes will be paid to him when the stock is taken up and cancelled; and this will be the nominal value of the stock, and the proper proportion of surplus profits. But, sir, it would be quite as fair to apply the price current to the stock of a bank just about to expire, and compare it with those which have longer time to run, as it is now to make the same comparison between the Bank of the United States and others, after all the weight of official and personal hostility has been made to bear upon the former, and the treasury of the Union has been poured into the lap of the latter. It is not strange that those who reason by such lights should reach false conclusions.

But, sir, the Secretary is to make a substitute for our legislative fiscal agent, and for our present indiffererent currency. He is to perform the high duty of Congress, and prescribe a much better and sounder circulation—a much better, more economical, and efficient agent. And how? By substituting State banks, and notes of State banks, and making them receivable as the notes of the United States Bank now are. By law, the notes of the mother bank and the branches are received every where from those who have payments to make to the Government. An inhabitant of Maine can pay the Government, in Maine, with a note issued in New Orleans. He cannot, indeed, go to the branch in Maine and demand specie for it, (for the note he holds does not promise to pay specie there, but where it was issued;) but he can pay Government dues with it. The complaint that these notes are not payable every where in specie, on demand, I should designate as absurd, if courtesy would permit. The law makes no such requirement, and no bank, with branches so scattered, and with the commercial relations existing between the different portions of our wide-spread country, with any amount of capital, could long accomplish it. All that it can do is to provide specie for the issues at each place. This it has done. If notes of the New Orleans, Lexington, Savannah, and other branches, were all payable in specie every where, it would put the safety and honor of the whole institution in the power of any enemy who might collect notes enough to exceed its specie at any one place. The enmity of the treasury, or of a few individuals, would have found a ready prey under such circumstances. The run upon the branch at Savannah would not have cost so much trouble and money. This mode of payment was once attempted by the bank, and a committee of Congress, of able and intelligent men, who examined its concerns in 1819, looked to this as one of the causes which embarrassed the bank in 1819, and as injurious to the institution and the interest of the country; and committees of the House in 1830 and 1832, sustained by the House, affirmed the same view of this matter. But charges against the bank do not become stale. They are repeated again and again, with all the complacency of new discovery and invention.

To create an equal substitute, the State bank notes must be received every where for Government dues; those of Maine in Kentucky, those of Buffalo in Charleston. To accomplish this, either the Government itself must become responsible for these banks, or the banks themselves must become responsible for each other; otherwise the notes will be, as they now are, and as they were from 1813 to 1817, at discount. The Government must receive them for its dues at par, and pay them out at the discount of from three to fifteen and twenty per cent. Individuals will only receive and pay them at their commercial value. Are we prepared to pass a law, taking upon ourselves the solvency of these banks, and agreeing to receive them at par from our debtors? Will the banks become responsible for each other? The misconduct of a single one might prostrate the whole. Will their charters permit it? Will their stockholders consent? Sir, neither by contract nor by law can the Secretary render these notes receivable every where, much less can he make them payable in specie every where. They will and must depreciate; and as the Government lost between forty and fifty millions by their depreciation in the war, and the people were annually taxed by this cause more than six millions of dollars, so will it be again in time of peace as well as war.

In saying these things, sir, I am not to be understood as intending to depreciate the State banks. I admit their general solvency so long as the business and currency of the country is in a natural and sound state. I admit, also, their entire competency to accomplish the objects of their creation within the limits of action and agency which were contemplated by those who formed them. But they were intended to be local: their nature and capital do not fit them for the purposes of the Secretary; and whenever they shall be substituted, you will find them as you have once before found them. You have had annually repeated, for years, in the treasury reports, an item of between one and two millions of unavailable funds. These were State bank notes, and not worth a farthing. The Secretary would soon find a repetition of this item, swelled enormously, upon his scheme going into operation.

Is it not graceless to complain against the bank that it does not pay specie where it has not promised to pay it, and when its charter does not require it, and yet propose to substitute for it that which can neither pay specie every where, nor be receivable where it is wanted?

Is it not inexcusable that the Secretary should, of his own authority, attempt to substitute for the fiscal agent of the Government, created by law, agents heretofore found incompetent, and whose employment has created such distress in the country?

But this is not the worst of the scheme. The Government deposits its money in these banks to much more than their whole capital, and the security is left at the option of the Secretary! Now, what security is proposed? In the last report from the department we have a document which explains it; it is the report from the agent, who was also the principal; for he was invested with full powers to make any proposition he pleased; and whatever he approved was adopted by the Executive.

Will the Senate hear the plan of security for the public money of the Union? [Report of Amos Kendall to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 4th September, 1833, page 11.] "When asked what kind of security would be most satisfactory, I did not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the personal responsibility of the directors would be the very best. It would show their own perfect confidence in the safety and success of the undertaking, and it would not only afford the Government an ample guaranty for the safety of its funds, in addition to the capital and character of the banks, but would satisfy the public mind. When it is seen that the managers of the State banks are willing to pledge not only the capital of those institutions, but their own property and character, it will be impossible to doubt that the deposit is as safe in their keeping as human precaution can make it. It is understood that the security intended to be offered by the banks east of Baltimore is of this description; and in case any of their directors shall decline giving it, they will be substituted by some of the richest stockholders. In case I had failed to procure the assent of any of the banks in all of the principal cities to the giving of security, it was my purpose to propose the payment of an interest of one or two per cent. on the average deposit, to constitute a fund to meet any possible losses. If this plan should be thought advisable, I have no doubt of its entire practicability!"

Let the Senate, let Congress, let the people, hear and approve this plan for the safety and management of their money, illegally and unconstitutionally plundered from the treasury—this substitution of the executive will for legislative action! Is it wonderful that Congress was not to be consulted before this scheme of consummate folly was adopted? Is it strange that Mr. Duane should regard it "a breach of public faith," "vindictive and arbitrary;" "not conservative or just;" as disrespectful to Congress, who were about to assemble, and who have pronounced the deposites safe; as calculated "to shake public confidence, and promote doubt and mischief in the operations of society;" as "crude and unsafe;" as dangerous in the hands of a Secretary dependent for office on executive will, by making the banks "political machinery;" as destructive of national credit and reputation; as designed "to promote selfish and factious purposes!"

Personal security of some of the directors and stockholders of these banks, for our public money, to the amount of millions! "The payment of one or two per cent. upon the average deposit, to constitute a fund to meet any possible losses!" Am I to reason on such a scheme before an American Senate? Sir, human ingenuity could not offer a grosser insult to the human understanding. Your money is safe, perfectly safe, and admitted to be so, and you are to take it away, and venture it on personal security of individuals, and on a safety fund, to meet losses which you are to create by the change! The folly and madness of the act is only equalled by the confidence with which it is urged upon us. But, sir, you, the Congress of the Union, were not even to be permitted to judge of the scheme before it was executed. Your Secretary has already executed it, in part. Your money has been ventured, and without consulting you, and without taking the security; for he yet has none, and of that description he never will have. Directors and individual stockholders are not idiots; they will refuse the security when it shall be demanded. The executive power has plundered your treasury, and presents you such personal security as he can get, and a safety fund in its stead. And we, sir, we, on our solemn oaths, are to answer that we approve his course. For myself, never! Let Congress approve, and not only will your money be squandered, but your constitution violated, your laws contemned; and, in the room of law, you will have the executive will, acting upon and controlling an army of moneyed mercenaries, and regulating a money power, which, united with the sword, can jeopard your liberties whenever he pleases. The vindication of the law, at the hands of Congress, can alone arrest this result.

We have had experience upon all the points connected with this part of the Secretary's reasons. But, sir, I begin to doubt the truth of the old maxim—that experience is an efficient teacher to public men and Governments. The history of the old bank ought to have been full of instruction to the Secretary. It had a capital of six millions; it had a circulation, in proportion to its capital, nearly three times greater than the present: a large proportion of its stock was held abroad, and the holders were to be paid in specie. It had not an hour given to it to wind up its concerns. It continued its active operations to the last hour of its existence, and was compelled to appoint trustees for that purpose. Yet, sir, not one of all the views of the present Secretary was realized, so far as we are informed by its history. Its notes did not depreciate; specie became hourly more plentiful in its vaults; there was abundance of circulation, such as it was. The immediate distress was small; the evil was consequential. When Congress was deliberating on the propriety of its renewal, one of the principal difficulties arose from the fact that it had been allowed no time to settle its concerns, and it was feared that this circumstance would create distress to the stockholders and to the community. This difficulty was, with assumed carelessness, alluded to by the astute Secretary of the Treasury in a conversation with an agent of the bank. The agent incautiously remarked that the bank could appoint trustees, and would thus be enabled to avoid these evils. "Thank you, sir," said the Secretary; "you have relieved us from our only difficulty." The charter was permitted to expire; trustees were appointed; the settlement was made; and not one of the anticipations of our present Secretary was then realized. Not one of these irresistible causes of hasty action in him was then found to exist.

Under this head, the Secretary gives us another view, to prove it a question of time, and that there could be no delay. [p. 7.] The argument is this: The election of President and non-renewal of the charter were known in December, 1832; and the bank ought then to have curtailed. It had discounts in December, 1832, of sixty-one and a half millions; and in nine months afterwards, in August, 1833, of sixty-four millions; being an increase of two and a half millions. An agent was then appointed to inquire, in the four principal commercial cities, whether the State banks would receive the deposits, and perform the duties of the Bank of the United States. This ought not to have changed the action of the bank, as, by inquiry of the Secretary, it might have learned that all the deposits would not be withdrawn, but that the process would be gradual; that the amount of revenue bonds falling due, and the cash duties, enabled it to be liberal; but yet, in three months, before 1st of October, it had curtailed its accommodations four millions. That it received two millions additional deposits, which, added to the four millions, made its curtailment, in fact, six millions; that a part of this was specie, for it was increased $639,000; that the balance due from State banks increased two millions, rendering them unable to protect the community, as they were compelled to look to their own safety; and that thus a pressure was produced by the bank, which it was necessary to arrest before the meeting of Congress.

I have seldom, if ever, seen a larger share of misapprehended facts and misapplied reasoning within the same compass. It commences with a false assumption, that the bank knew that it would not be rechartered in December, 1832. I trust I have shown that this could be known only on one principle, which is, that, as the President was opposed to it, and his will was law, therefore there could be no renewal. Is the bank to be condemned for not crediting this conclusion? Yet, it is upon this fact that the whole reasoning of the Secretary rests. If, in December, 1832, the bank was not bound to act on the belief that a decision had already been made against it, then his reasoning altogether fails.

But further. He complains of the increase, from January to August, of two and a half millions. The periods are unfairly selected. To learn correctly the extension or contraction of the business of a bank, in different years, it is necessary to compare the same periods of the year. In the business of all banks this is the case, and between January and August no fair comparison can be made. It is peculiarly so with the United States Bank. The great mass of its issues, discounts, and purchases of bills, depends on the course of trade and business between the north and the south, and this country and Europe. Every man, whose thoughts have extended as far north as Maine, as far south as New Orleans, and as far east as Europe, is perfectly apprized of this, and cannot be ignorant that, between times of purchases in the south and remittances from the north, there never is, there never can be a fair comparison. Why, then, did the Secretary select these periods? Was it to do justice to the bank, or to frame an apology for an illegal act? But the increase was not greater than it had frequently before been between the same periods in other years; and if the Secretary had taken the trouble to look into the returns of the bank, and the reports of his predecessors, he would have found such facts as these. In 1831, between the same months, there was an extension from about forty-six millions, to more than fifty-seven millions—nearly twelve millions. In 1832, from January to April, only three months, an increase from sixty-eight to seventy and a half millions, nearly two and a half millions—as great as is complained of in nine months in 1833. And there are various other instances of a similar character, through all the history of the bank. The same results, also, are manifest, by comparing its circulation at different periods.

So, also, the Secretary complains of the contraction of accommodations between August and October last. Yet, if he had made the same comparison, he would have found equal and more extensive diminutions at other times, which were unfelt by the community, and which were never thought to be evidence of misconduct, nor attributed to improper motives. One instance is to be found in the preceding year, 1832. From August to October, of four and a half millions, that is, from 68,000,000 to 63,693,000; almost double the amount complained of in 1833.

Now, sir, I complain of this concealment. Did not the Secretary see and know these things? Then, why did he attempt to impose on Congress the simple fact of the extension and diminution, in this year, as evidence of improper purposes and objects in the bank at the times they were made? The whole history of the bank is filled with similar facts, not in relation to the notes and bills only, but of every species of property and interest which the bank holds. And it is so with every other bank. Besides, who ever before heard that we were to estimate either the wisdom or virtue, or the fully and vice of a bank, by simply taking the amount of its discounts, at different times, without inquiring into the causes which produced them; the state of its active means; the funds under its control; the wants of the community in its commercial and other transactions? Does the Secretary state? Did he know how all these circumstances operated upon the bank? Whether they justified its conduct, without regard to the motives which he attributes? Not at all. It was sufficient for him that the bank had 61½ millions out in January, and 64 in August; and he infers that it must, of necessity, have been regardless of the solemn decision against its charter. It had curtailed four millions by October, and therefore it intended to oppress the community. If our Louis is satisfied with such reasoning, he will find that he has discharged a Necker and substituted a Calonne.

But, while we are comparing these expansions and contractions which are so offensive to the Secretary, I desire attention to a fact which is worthy of note. The expansions in 1831 and 1832 are attributed, in both the remarkable papers which have issued from the Executive, to a design in the bank to acquire political power, and affect the presidential election. I wish self-love could permit certain individuals to believe that there could be any motives to action but such as relate to friendship or hatred of themselves. Sir, when did the presidential election take place? In the fall of 1832. When was the largest extension? Through 1831, and up to April, 1832. During that time, certainly the most vehement and active part of the electioneering campaign did not take place. It was after April, 1832. Now, in April, 1832, the amount of these discounts and accommodations was greater than at any moment during the existence of the bank. They reached to nearly seventy and a half millions; and from that moment, while the contest was hottest, as the election was approaching, while the canvass was going on, there was a steady and rapid diminution; so that when the election actually occurred, they were only $63,693,000—a decrease of more than six and a half millions in about six months. The bank is accused of attempting to influence the election by extending its discounts; yet, when the election might be affected by it, (if it could, indeed, be affected by these means at all,) it reduces six and a half millions. Why, sir, do these officers suppose us ready to receive any absurdity which they may choose to assert?

Is it not unpardonable that such impositions should be practised by grave official documents, and the people misled thereby, because they have not the means of correcting them? If the increase from January to August was criminal, was the diminution afterwards also criminal? Shall the Secretary complain in August that the bank would not wind up its concerns, and then, when it did immediately afterwards diminish its business, charge that very act as a crime? Shall he avow his intention to force the bank to close, do an act which compels it to look to that object, and then charge it as unprincipled for doing the very thing which he required it to do? Is such conduct to be tolerated and approved?

But, sir, what right has the Secretary to complain that the bank extended its business? Did it injure us or our interests? Were the profits upon our stock less? Were our deposits rendered unsafe by it? These things are not pretended. Our profits are increased; and, if possible, so is our security, provided the business of the bank be not extended beyond its means; and of this the bank was the proper judge. An examination of the transactions of the bank will show that there has always been remarkable caution and skill in the extension and curtailment of its business: both being adapted to the active means in its possession at the time, and to the wants of the community. A comparison of its conduct, in this respect, with the known history of the country, would justify high commendation. But this is not my purpose. It is sufficient that it has been a faithful agent and trustee, and that the reasons of the Secretary, as applied to it, are unfounded.

The Secretary tells us that the bank reduced its accommodations in August and September last about four millions of dollars. There were then in the bank nine millions eight hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars of deposits. Now, sir, what was the situation of the bank at that time in relation to these deposits? It had previously discounted upon them, and, to the proper extent, furnished thereby accommodation to the public. But the moment had come when it was necessary to withdraw all the accommodation which rested upon them. If they were to be taken from the bank, it could not, it had neither the right nor the power to discount upon them. It would have hazarded its own safety, if it had. It had been warned that they would be withdrawn; nay, at the time of its curtailing the four millions, they had been in part withdrawn, and the process was going forward. How, then, could the bank, without total disregard to its own interests, continue accommodations founded upon funds which it had not, or, if it had, was immediately to lose, before the discounts could be returned? It was impossible.

The Secretary says that it might have been liberal to the wants of the commercial community, because, in addition to the ordinary receipts from bonds on previous importations, the season for cash duties was at hand, and the receipts from both sources would be large. But, sir, would not they be deposits still, and subject to the same removal as the other deposits? Besides, the Secretary takes the months of August and September, and speaks of diminution then, and of receipts from bonds and cash duties then. Yet, among the papers which he sent to us, is the copy of his order to the bank to deliver up to the collector "all the bonds to the United States, payable at or after the 1st October," dated 26th September, 1833; and the order to the collector to take the bonds and deliver them to the Girard Bank, and to make no deposits in the United States Bank after the 30th September. And this order is dated on the 26th September also. The bank was to be liberal on the bonds and the cash duties; and these are both taken from it, and the decision to take them away was made on the 18th September, and executed on the 26th, although the purpose to remove them was avowed long before. I leave these facts to the reflection of every ingenuous mind.

The Secretary complains that there was a severe pressure on the community. Why then did he do an act which he must have known would increase that pressure? His assertion is now gravely denied, and we are assured that it is mere imagination. The Secretary is right, and his advocates wrong, in this difference between them. Sir, no pressure? Are the murmurs which reach us on every breeze, and burden every mail, mere fancy? Your stocks of all kinds are depreciated—even the price current tells us that. Your works of internal improvement are arrested. Your agricultural products, in the south and in the north, have fallen in price. Your merchants have countermanded their orders. Your manufacturers have diminished their work, and are in danger of insolvency. The interest upon money has risen from six to twenty-four per cent. in some instances. There is a paralysis of enterprise. Nor let it be imagined that it reaches only your commercial cities and large manufacturing establishments. The merchant cannot purchase, nor the farmer or mechanic sell, and laborers are thrown out of employ by thousands; and, unless arrested, and speedily, it will, and must, reach through all interests and all classes of society. It will, in its progress, fall most heavily on the humble, and the laborious, and the poor—on men of small capital, your farmers, your mechanics—your working men. Their daily bread will be affected by it, for their occupations and their wages will be diminished or taken away, and their feelings will, ere long, be heard in tones not pleasant to the ears of power. "Their griefs, and not their manners, will reason" then. Already have anxiety—apprehension—gloom—dismay—pervaded the community, and the dread of the future is more appalling than the suffering of the present. Shall we shut our eyes to these facts, or deny them at the bidding of power, and justify them by the machinery of party? No, sir, there is guilt—deep guilt—resting upon the authors of this distress; and the indignant frowns of an injured people ought to rest upon them. Who are they? and where are they? Let us not mistake them, and cast our denunciations upon the innocent.

Did the bank do this mischief? Then let punishment fall heavily upon it. But, in my deep and solemn conviction, the guilt does not rest there. No act of the bank, previous to August last, had injuriously affected the public. It had not curtailed. Its course was liberal and just, and met the applause of all. The community was in a state of quiet prosperity. At that moment, an agent was appointed to accomplish the ruin of the bank. The determination to remove from it its chartered rights, and privileges, and benefits was originally suggested in the neighborhood of Wall street, and had for months been announced, but was for a time disbelieved by the whole community.

Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the friends of the Executive declared it impossible, and that the imputed intention was a false accusation. But it was pursued steadily, until it was understood to be the wish of the President, and then it was justified by partisans, and declared probable. Still it was disbelieved. But at length semi-official authority declared that the purpose was fixed. The cabinet was consulted, the counsel of a majority was disregarded, and the decree was passed. The sure destruction of the bank—its inevitable overthrow—was then proclaimed; and, with malignant triumph, it was represented as a crouching suppliant at the feet of the treasury. But, sir, the edict was powerless. Then, and not till then, did the bank make one movement which could, by possibility, lead to any pressure upon the community. And then only did it do what was indispensable to its safety. Let any man read the dates of the papers which have been communicated, and tell me if this statement be not true. As early as the 3d of June, the President communicated to Mr. Duane his consultation of the cabinet; and soon afterwards the determination of the President was publicly known. And it was a determination, not for a partial removal, as the Secretary affirms; no such partial removal was mentioned; it was entire; the reasons for it demanded that it should be entire; the object could not be accomplished, unless it was of the whole deposits. What could the bank do, but refuse to extend its issues, and prepare for the blow? Was it to rely on a partial removal? to discount on money which might be taken from it at any moment? to leave its numerous branches, without preparation, exposed to the vengeance of exulting enemies? Will any man seriously assert that it should have relied on the fairness of its foes? Look to Savannah. That branch was considered weak in specie. Its notes were collected, purchased at a premium, and three hundred thousand dollars were presented in a single day—just in time, sir, for the news of its insolvency and dishonor to reach Washington at the opening of the session. The vile purpose was not accomplished, but it is evidence of the consequences to the bank, had it failed to prepare for the emergency. And shall we be told that the bank, and not the department, produced the pressure? It is perfectly apparent, from the documents before us, that the first movement was by the Executive; that the necessity was thrown upon the bank; and that it curtailed only so far as the withdrawal of the deposits, and the security of itself and its branches, imperiously required. In deciding who produced the present public calamity, I ask, and desire an answer: was there not a state of great prosperity in business, until the agent was appointed, and the determination to remove the deposits was made? If this determination had not been made, was there a necessity, a possible motive, for the bank to do one act which could injure the existing prosperity? any motive to curtail, and thus harm itself? When that determination was made, when the deposits were to be withdrawn, could the bank continue to discount on those deposits? Must it not, of necessity, curtail to the extent which it had discounted on those deposits? When its destruction was avowed, was it not absolutely necessary, at least, to stand still, or to prepare for the attack, and put itself and its branches in a situation, not only to deliver up the deposits, but to meet every demand upon it and them? Sir, let public resentment fall where public resentment is merited.

But I deny that the mere act of curtailing by the bank, of four, or even ten millions, did or could produce the pressure under which we suffer. The same amount, and in the same time, has been curtailed without any such effect—nay, even without the country being aware of it. I refer for proof to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the statements of the bank, and to the history of the times. You have a circulation of about seventy-five millions, and an annual circulation of between three and four hundred millions; and can the withdrawal of four millions in the time mentioned, and in the ordinary operations of business and commerce, reach and agonize every interest of the country? No, sir, the cause is different; it lies deeper, in the very nature of credit and currency, where the Secretary has made no search; it is not produced by the want of money in the country; it is here, all here, as much as in August last; it has not been consumed. But, sir, you cannot get it. And why not? The reason is obvious. Credit and confidence constitute the essence and vitality of all circulating mediums and of all moneyed transactions; and credit and confidence have been destroyed by violations of your constitution, and by the trespasses of your Executive upon the legal rights of those who deal in your circulation, by breach of faith, and by the interference of reckless malice and ignorance in the management of your financial concerns. The bank had not the power to produce it. It was the alarm given to moneyed men, and to banking institutions, when they saw the determination to destroy the United States Bank by illegal means, and to restore the state of currency which existed from 1811 to 1816. They would not hazard their money; they kept it closely, either to preserve it against danger of loss, or to speculate upon the miseries of others, when sacrifices should be required. Each prepared to guard himself from those around him. Distrust produced curtailments and refusals to lend. The panic and the pressure spread instantly, rapidly, widely; and will continue to spread wherever the circulation of your currency reaches—from the proudest mansion to the humblest cottage—from your cities to the outskirts of your population—unless justice be done, and confidence in the faith and honor of your Government and the administration of your finances be restored. No attempt to cast the blame on others will answer; no edicts of authority are equal to its restoration; no caucus management, no voting to sustain a party, or to manifest devotion to a man, will relieve the country, and save your merchants and manufacturers from insolvency, and your farmers, and mechanics, and laborers from distress. You might as well attempt to arrest or guide the electric fluid in its course, without the aid of the philosopher of nature upon the principles of nature, as to control the credit and confidence which are essential to your circulating medium, by the mandate of power, or the discipline of party.

Sir, the Secretary, and those who ruled him, ought to have foreseen the results of his movements, or they are unfit to touch the currency and finances of the country. The President ought to have employed no such agents to deal with the most delicate and difficult of all the concerns and interests of human society. He who undertakes to manage the currency ought to understand its nature and the instruments he uses. Would you repair or tune a piano with a blacksmith's hammer, or bleed a sensitive female with a butcher's cleaver? The treasury of the nation and the finances of the country should not have been made the weapons and instruments of political warfare—the thongs with which to chastise political adversaries, and the cords by which to bind partisans to the support of party, or premiums to reward their fidelity. But the evil has been done, and it must be repaired by calling back credit and confidence; by vindicating the authority of the laws in the restoration of the deposits; by wiping out the stain from the national faith; and by the legislative power providing such fiscal agents as its wisdom shall dictate, and making such enactments as shall give security to the future. What these are, it is not now necessary for me to discuss.

The Secretary proceeds to assign his other reasons growing out of the manner in which the affairs of the bank have been managed, [Rep. page 11.] I intended to examine them fully, but causes obvious to the Senate restrain me. I shall notice them rather to draw general conclusions from them than to expose them in detail. The Secretary founds his argument upon the fact that the bank is a fiscal agent of the Government, and was not created for private benefit, but has violated its duty by concealing its proceedings, and by doing acts criminal to the Government; that it has also sought political power.

It is a fiscal agent, but it is at the same time a corporation for the private benefit of the owners. As agent, its duties are prescribed by the charter. While it performs these, the Government has no right to complain. It is on no principle bound to do for the Government more than the law requires. That is the contract by which the agent was appointed, and his letter of instructions. All these it has done; the Secretary does not deny it. And the records of your Government, since 1817, are full of reports and proceedings of Congress—of reports of Secretaries of the Treasury; of messages of the Presidents—even of the present President; declaring, in unequivocal terms, its entire faithfulness and skill in performing all that the law prescribed, and all that the Government had a right to demand. Such ample testimonials in favor of any institution are nowhere to be found. Senators may readily refer to them; and I therefore confidently affirm that it has, in no respect, failed to do its duty to the Government, under the law. But it is, also, a corporation for private benefit, made so for the express purpose of being a fiscal agent. After it has rendered its dues to the Government, it has a legal and unquestionable right to seek its own interest; and if it performs any service for an individual, or for the Government, it may claim, and is bound to claim, proper compensation for it. In this respect it is like other individuals and corporations. An illustration may be found in the charge by the Secretary respecting the French draft, the circumstances of which are known to those who take the trouble to read. The Government drew a bill on France, and desired the bank to buy it; it declined, because it was not necessary for its interest, but offered to collect it, as it did bills for others. Was the bank bound to buy? It is not pretended. It was not one of its duties as fiscal agent. But the Government urged, and it did buy, and paid the money; it bought as an individual, and from the Government as an individual; it had, therefore, all the legal rights of the purchaser and holder of a bill of exchange: one of these is, damages if it be not paid. The bill was sent to England, thence to France; was not paid, but dishonored, and was paid for the bank in France: so that, for a considerable period of time it had paid for it twice—once here, and once in France. Upon what honest or legal principle could an individual have denied payment of the damages? None. In what do the rights of the Government differ? Is it absolved from the rules of common honesty and common justice? May it do properly what would dishonor a man in such a transaction? Such are not my opinions of its duties, nor of the regard which it owes to law and justice. Nor is the denial conformable to its practice. It has again and again paid damages on protested bills. If I am not misinformed, there are, at this moment, bills upon one of your departments, which is waiting for funds to discharge them, and on which the department has promised to pay interest and damages. Then why not in this case? But it has not only paid damages, but, where it has been the holder, has uniformly, and with unbending firmness, always demanded them. The records of your treasury show a multitude of cases of this description, and, among others, the familiar one of Stephen Girard.* And, sir, there is no apology in the fact that the Government had deposits in the bank at the time. The statements of the bank disprove it, and, if they did not, the case would not be altered. Those deposits were the right of the bank, by law, for which it had paid, and on which it had a right to discount, until they were drawn out for the payment of the debts of the Government.

With regard to the action of the bank in what is said to be postponing the payment of the public stock in April and December, 1832, the Secretary refers to the knowledge of Congress and its acts. And there I am willing to let it rest, without comment on the facts. But did it not occur to the Secretary, while he was assuming his high authority, that he was, in this very complaint, casting additional insult upon Congress? Did it not occur to him that this subject had been investigated by Congress with care, and its judgment pronounced, that the bank neither sought nor requested a postponement; and was, in effect, acquitted of blame? How dare he, by repeating the accusation, thus insult a Congress in which the friends of the Executive had control? How long will Congress bear to be thus bearded, under the sanction of the Executive, by men who live upon the executive breath, and whose lives are fleeting as the changes of the executive passions?

So, also, sir, the complaints about the exchange committee. This subject of exchanges, and the action of the bank in regard to them, was commenced in July, 1817; and a correspondence, at great length, held by Mr. Crawford with the bank on the subject, and, after some opposition from him, which was subsequently waived, a plan of exchanges, foreign and domestic, was adopted, which has, with few and unimportant variations, been pursued, in form and substance, to the present time. The active operations under the plan, however, did not, I believe, commence, in consequence of the situation of the bank, until 1820. But every Secretary of the Treasury has been acquainted with it, and approved it. The committee of investigation of 1819, on which were Spencer, Lowndes, McLane, Bryan, and Tyler, had this, with all other matters, before them, and found no cause for condemnation. It is not even mentioned in the long list of grievances which Mr. Spenser thought demanded that a scire facias should issue; nor to be found in amendments proposed,

* The case of John M. Ebrek, in 1819—'20, also illustrates your practice and principle. He endorsed, gratuitously, and without consideration, a bill on the house of Willinks, of Liverpool, for two thousand pounds sterling. The house failed; he wrote to his friends to protect the bill; but, uncertain whether his orders would be in time, he applied to the department, and offered to deposit the amount in the treasury, with interest from the time of the purchase, to be returned to him if the bill was paid in England—or to give security, at once, for the whole amount, as soon as advices should be received, with interest and charges of protest and postage. Yet both offers were refused, and he was required to pay, and did pay damages. He met the same fate on a second bill on Groning. When an innocent endorser is thus treated by the Government, how can it—how dare it—complain that a purchaser from it also asks damages? Is it not gross injustice? unworthy disregard of its own honor and reputation for fair dealing? Yet such is the complaint made by the Secretary and the President against the bank, and for which its chartered rights are to be disregarded. It is sufficient to create disgust in honest and fair men.

[SENATE.]

at that time, to restrain the bank. In every investigation and discussion since that time it has been the subject of comment, and yet Congress has not thought it proper to interfere; and now the Executive and a Secretary of the Treasury found, on their omission, a reason for violating the rights of the bank, and assuming to do what Congress declined to do.

But the Secretary complains that, on this point and some others, there was concealment from the Government directors, and thus, from the Government—meaning always by that word the Executive. Sir, if the directors did their duty, there was no concealment. The rules adopted in 1817 prescribe the number of directors, in addition to the president and cashier, who shall act on this subject; they are to meet daily; to purchase at rates fixed by the committee. The security on the bills is prescribed to them. Even if one member objects, there is to be no purchase; and once a week a statement of the exchange department is laid before the board of directors, and is admitted to be so done by the four directors, in their letter of the 22d April, 1832, to the President. How unfounded, then, the accusation that the board violated the charter, by permitting less than seven to transact the business of the bank, and concealed, improperly, its exchange transactions.

But the Secretary complains of another case of concealment. I give credit for the shame which prevented him from mentioning the case by name. He refers us to the letter of the four directors, in which it is found, and in which alone it ought to be found. Any official executive document would be disgraced by it. With regard to that case, I only state that the inquisition, by which it is developed, was secret; founded on a missive from the President, which he had no authority to write; not avowed; traitorous to their fellow-members; a violation, direct and positive, of the words of the charter; a base inquiry, manifestly governed by party resentments, to be used for party and vindictive purposes, meriting the scorn of honorable minds. A true estimate of the objects of that investigation, and of the new lights afforded to the Executive to justify his action against the bank after the refusal of Congress, may be formed, when it is recollected that the four directors communicate, in answer to the injunction of the President, information only on two subjects: the action of the exchange committee, and the accounts of Gales & Seaton. These were the subjects of import which called upon the President to descend from his high station to turn inquisitor, to find motives and reasons for this discharge of official duty; and these, sir, the financial reasons of a financial officer, which compelled him to trespass on the rights of the bank and insult the legislative power!

But, sir, the bank used its money for political purposes. And here again the Secretary selects the arbitrary periods of January, 1830, and May, 1831; and makes a moderate mistake of nine or ten millions. He alleges that, in January, 1830, the bank had only about $42,400,000 of debts due to the bank; but in May, 1831, $70,400,000; an extension of $28,000,000. Now, if any Senator will take the trouble to cast up the items of discounts and bills, the public debt, and the balances from State banks and foreign houses, he will find an amount of about 52 instead of $12,000,000 of the means of the bank in active use in January, 1830. And, if the same process be applied to May, 1831, there will be found less than $62,000,000, leaving, as the difference between them in accommodation to the public, less than 10 instead of $28,000,000. And to justify this increase, he will find in May, 1831, $1,406,000 of specie in its vaults more than in January, 1830; $2,828,000 more of deposits; $1,762,000 more of State bank debts; $211,000 less in real property; a difference, in all, of more than $6,000,000 to justify this extension. And if the simple rule of three had been applied by the Secretary to the different items, he would have found that the extension, in proportion to its means, was very little, if any, greater in May, 1831, than in January, 1830; and that, for any difference which did exist, the commercial wants of the community at those periods would form an ample reason to any well-informed financier, without attributing the fact to the desire of acquiring political power, or preventing an individual from being elected President; a motive of action in the bank which seems to be the sleeping and waking dream of certain minds. The Senate know, if the bank had refused the extension of its accommodations at that time, the merchants, the public, the Government, must all have suffered inconvenience and injury.

The only remaining evidence, which I now recollect, of the misconduct of the bank which was detected by the inquisition, and which proves an effort to gain political power, and forms a reason with the Secretary, relates to the expense account; and the only questioned matter in that is, its publication of certain papers, prepared by others, and circulated by it, in its own defence. Now, this subject was investigated by Congress, under the auspices of the friends of the Executive, and their powers under the charter were ample for this purpose, although the same powers are not given to the Executive. Congress did not think fit to act upon their investigation of the facts; yet they had scarcely left Washington before this inquisition was established under executive patronage. And what was discovered? Nothing but what was upon the books, and must have been known to the investigating committee. The first cause of complaint is, that the president of the bank was authorized by resolution to expend as much money as he pleased, even the whole capital of the bank, to buy presses, bribe editors, publish pamphlets, &c. Sir, is this true? or is it false? The resolution of the 30th November, 1830, was founded on a suggestion that an article in the Quarterly Review, on banks and currency, written by Mr. Gallatin, might be beneficially circulated; that of the 11th of March, 1831, that benefits would result from a similar circulation of other articles which had issued from the press; and it authorizes the president of the bank "to cause to be prepared and circulated such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information in regard to the nature and operations of the bank."

Nothing is said of buying or bribing presses; nothing of all the terrific purposes which haunt the Secretary. The president's duty was to have prepared and circulated documents and papers; and their character is defined; they must relate to the nature and operations of the bank. Such a trust would have been bestowed by any board of any bank on the president, or a committee of directors, in whom they had any tolerable share of confidence; and here especially so, as the expenditures must appear in the expense account, which is regularly submitted to the dividend committee, on which it so happened, I believe, that one of these malcontent directors was. By this process the control of the board was complete. How, by any fair construction, can this resolution be extended beyond the defined object? How can it be regarded as placing the whole capital in the hands of the president? Honest men, in executing it, would never construe it thus. They would be confined to reasonable expenditures for the specific purpose. And, until I saw the unlimited power drawn by the Secretary from the general words of the charter as to the removal of the deposits, I never imagined that any sensible and correct agent, invested with power on a given subject, would infer a right to so general a license of motive and action. The construction of the Secretary of this resolution of the board is a fit companion of his construction of the terms of the charter.

This form of resolution is common in all cases where discretion is confided; and there are other examples in this bank. I will not refer to that respecting counterfeits, because it seems to be misconstrued as offensive, and as creating comparisons which I have no disposition to make or sanction. But another instance of the same kind is found in the resolution authorizing the president to take steps necessary to protect the western branches from a run made upon them. The authority in such cases cannot be restricted by the words of the resolution; it is restricted by its nature and objects, and by the fidelity of the agent acting under it. What was done under this resolution? Have Senators looked into the list of publications—Gallatin's Essay; Tucker's Review; Clarke and Hall's Bank Book; reports of committees of Congress; speeches of three members of the Senate, Clay, Webster, and Ewing; bank documents; review of the veto message, and of a Senator's speech; some addresses to Legislatures; and copies of three newspapers, containing a part of these, and perhaps of some other articles?

These are all that I find in the precious developments of these executive but not governmental agents. The expense, we are told, indeed, on executive authority, amounted to some $80,000; but there was a slight mistake of some $30,000 in the items and the addition. The average expenditure for three and a half years was a little more than $14,000. And, of the whole, about one-half was for printing and distributing congressional reports and speeches, and but about $2,000 for papers containing these essays, &c. And was it criminal to do this? Is there harm in circulating the Essay of Gallatin, and that of the accomplished scholar and political economist, Tucker? I wish the bank had sent copies to the Secretary, and that he would have condescended to read them before he acted. Is there crime in distributing reports which Congress had thought it proper to print by thousands, at the expense of the public treasury, for the same object—the information of the people? Is there guilt in publishing any or all these papers, and those speeches with the rest which shed lustre upon the Senate itself, and will elevate the respect for American intellect wherever they shall be read throughout the civilized world? They must have strangely constituted minds who can complain of this, and must hold no enviable position when such documents are considered by them as offensive to their party and party purposes. But, sir, I recollect that John Sergeant, as a member of the board of directors, happened to be the person by whom a proposition was made for printing the congressional reports, and that his name is dragged in by these directors in their honorable and manly estimate of what is right in communicating facts for executive information and action. Sir, why was this? Was it out of love for fair dealing, and for the sake of justice and truth? Or was it to play upon party and political passions and prejudices? Why does his name appear upon the records of the inquisition? He had, sir, been a prominent politician, a candidate for a high station under your Government, associated with another, of whom I may not utter a word, although, here and elsewhere, I shall feel all that is justly demanded from patriotic and virtuous feeling for services to my country of the best and noblest kind. It may be, sir, that these facts influenced these directors, when they placed his name as an agent in these publications, and without inquiring what was the nature and extent of that agency. But, sir, the movement will produce no effect favorable to their wishes with the people, whatever it may do with those in power. They know well that the name of John Sergeant cannot be associated with illegal, dishonorable, or dishonest purposes. For myself, I rejoice that I was permitted to give him my suffrage. He is a man, mild, amiable, unassuming, unostentatious; yet firm, decided, and energetic: "not early won to fawn on any man;" always candid and frank, with no concealment of views, no management and finesse to bind partisans to his control; profound in legal and constitutional knowledge; pure in private life as in public morality; a republican by birth, feeling, education, principle; a patriot, ardently devoted to the best and highest interests of his country; with a character totus teres atque rotundus. And should the time ever come when he shall wear the honors of his country, even the highest, he will wear them without a stain. I beg pardon of the Senate for my deviation from the strict topics of debate; but I could not restrain this slight expression of respect and friendship for a man who is eminently worthy of both, as he is of the regard and confidence of his fellow-citizens.

Sir, have matters arrived at such a crisis, in this free land, that the publication of such documents as those which I have mentioned is to be criminally punished, without law, by the Executive? That an individual may not circulate papers relating to his character and proceedings with impunity? If so, let it be so recorded by our vote, and let the people know it. Let them be told that official documents and able discussions may not be sent to them, unless they advocate the Executive. And let them be told further, that, if a corporation presumes to defend itself from any imputation which one man and his partisans choose to throw upon it, its legal privileges, its chartered rights, may be taken away, without trial, and at the nod of power.

Mr. President, the bank had not only the legal right, but the moral obligation rested on it, to defend itself. It has, at least, the privilege which we allow to the lowest wretch in the community, to whom neither our laws nor our feelings deny the privilege of self-defence, or the permission to publish a denial of the guilt charged upon him. But, sir, if the bank has acted incorrectly, if it has violated its duty and its charter, there is a full and ample remedy provided by the charter itself. But how? By the power of the Executive? No, it is not intrusted to him; but by the tribunals of the country, upon the motion of Congress or of the Executive. The 23d section, drawn by Mr. Daggett, provides that, when there is reason to believe that the charter has been violated, a scire facias may be sued out of the Circuit Court of the United States for Pennsylvania; that, after it has been fifteen days served, before the commencement of the term, the case may be examined by the court, and a forfeiture declared: provided, that every issue of fact joined between the United States and the corporation shall be tried by a jury; and there may be a review by the Supreme Court. Is this law a dead letter? Was this provision inserted for no object but that the Executive might trample it under foot? When Congress have provided a mode of punishment by court and jury, may the Executive disregard it, and inflict punishment of another kind, without trial? The President, in his annual message, alleges that there was not time for this proceeding before the expiration of the charter. Is this so? He knew the facts in April, 1833—at least in August, 1833—and the charter does not expire until March, 1836. The court sat in October last, and, in one year, the final decision might have been had. The late Attorney General ought to have informed the President better. But if the allegation was true, is that a justification? The subscribers to the bank ventured into the contract, on the faith of this provision, by which they supposed their rights were protected; and if it be not sufficient for its object, if it fails, can the Executive, of his own mere motion, supply the defect? This assumption to punish the bank, in violation of this law, is one of the most gross and contemptuous acts of disregard of legal restraint to be found in our or any other history. It is an act of undisguised despotism. It spurns the high constitutional right of trial by jury and the laws of the land, and places on the judgment-seat the vengeance of irritated feelings, of selfish prejudice, of party passion. I entreat, I implore Senators that they will not, for any present purpose, for any passing object, give countenance, in this home of constitutional liberty, to this dangerous usurpation.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[SENATE.]

Mr. President, I have discharged my duty, with no common pain, by presenting my opinion of the reasons which the Secretary has assigned for ordering the public money to be removed from the bank, which had, by law and solemn contract, been made the place for its deposit—the temporary treasury of the Union—for its safe keeping. I do believe that those reasons are insufficient, and the principles which he avows dangerous to liberty. It is a solemn duty in Congress to express its strong condemnation of the act—to restore the money—and, as far as practicable, to maintain the faith of the Government. It is not the less necessary that we should act promptly and efficiently because it has been done under the pretended sanction of the law. There are no more dangerous encroachments against free institutions than those which are made under misconstructions of law, and appealing to its authority. Nor, sir, is there any tyranny more odious and terrific than that which preserves the forms of free government, while all its powers are centred in the will of one man.

But we are told, though all that I have said may be true, that we—the Senate—may not express our judgments upon these resolutions; we, to whom the law requires the reasons of the Secretary to be submitted for our decision, may not pass on those reasons, if we think the act a violation of law and duty. Why, then, sir, submit them to us? Why this mockery of legislation? And why may we not denounce and condemn such conduct? We are told, because the President or Secretary may, by possibility, be impeached, and we must be their judges. Andrew Jackson impeached! and R. B. Taney, a favorite agent and officer of his, who acted under his orders, brought to our bar! Sir, are these suggestions made in a spirit of irony and sarcasm at our supposed impotence? Who are to move an impeachment? Will it come? Can it come? When, in our history, was a triumphant President, at the head of a triumphant majority, impeached? When an instrument of his—a partisan of that majority? No, sir, this terror is reserved for minorities. Look back to the annals of impeachments, and let them answer on this point. But suppose an impeachment were to be moved, does that destroy our legislative power of action? I do not so read the constitution of our country. The people have ordained that this body should possess and exercise some of the highest functions of all the co-ordinate departments of the Government, and they have not provided that the necessity of exercising one should take away the others. The constitution of this body, in that respect, demands the highest attributes of intelligence and integrity in its members. May it ever sustain its powers, unsundered, uncontrolled, uncontaminated.

We are compelled, hard as is the task for the human mind and heart, to pass daily and hourly from legislative to executive duties; and the latter often arise from our own legislative action. And so it may be with regard to our judicial powers; for so the people willed it, and, I believe, most wisely. The representatives of equal States, we must worthily, as such representatives, discharge all our duties; and, above all, we must not permit a remote contingency, that we may sit as judges, to deprive us of our largest and most important power under the constitution—that of legislation. The time may come, sir, when a combination of both these powers may be indispensable to the safety of our liberties, our laws, and our constitution. Though we may not choose to assert that it has already come, yet it may not be distant, when some spoiled child of fortune, with no merit but that of seizing boldly on popular prejudices, may reach your highest executive station; may draw around him, with some wise and good, many of the profligate, the corrupt, and the desperate; may seize your treasury, and usurp the powers and duties of the Legislature; and, under perverted construction of the laws, and expressions of profound respect for the public good, and love for the convenience of the people, may disregard the whole spirit of your institutions; and yet may gain proselytes by the favors and rewards of offices and contracts, and hold in dread his opponents by the fear of punishment; when his word may be truth, his opinions law, and adulation to him the highest merit; and when the miasmatic minions which are generated and nourished in the corrupted atmosphere of corrupt power shall float on every breeze, carrying moral and political pestilence through the whole circumference of the land, and when pressed by the friends of freedom, in the confidence of the strength which he has secured, he may exclaim, "Is not the King's name forty thousand names?" And he shall be answered—

"Fear not, my lord; the power that made you King
"Has power to keep you King, in spite of all."

Then, sir, then, shall such a President and his subordinates be permitted, by the mere act of violating law, to deprive the Senate of its powers, and thus paralyze the whole legislative action of your Government; for, without the Senate, the House of Representatives has no legislative capacity? Shall they, the more guilty they are, be the more powerful in arresting you in the discharge of your high and almost sacred functions? No, sir, no. The Senate will not—cannot—sanction the suicidal doctrine.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHEPLEY presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Belfast, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

In the course of the day, after the transaction of some other business,

Mr. PRESTON moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the petition presented by Mr. SHEPLEY was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. He desired this petition to lay on the table for the present, in order that time might be allowed to reflect upon it. If referred to the committee, there would of course be a report, and he wished to prevent any such action without due reflection.

Mr. SPRAGUE said it had been customary to send petitions of this character to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and he hoped that this petition would be allowed to take the same course.

Mr. PRESTON expressed his ignorance of the fact that such had been the usual course of these petitions. Such fact did not appear on the proceedings, as far as he was acquainted. He persisted in his motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS suggested that the Senator from South Carolina need not be apprehensive of any agitation being produced by the reference to this committee. That committee had frequently had this subject before them, and had, after due reflection, decided that these applications were made by humane individuals, who were misinformed as to the actual condition of the District. The reference was in accordance with the usual practice of the Senate, and would be productive of very little trouble.

Mr. SHEPLEY observed that when he presented the petition, he thought there would have been no objection to its being referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and to have taken the customary course of that body, or he would not have felt disposed to press it on the consideration of the Senate. He, however, trusted the petition would be so referred, and that it would receive a fair, candid, and impartial hearing.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose only to remove an impression which the honorable Senator seemed to have imbibed, that the petition would not meet with the due consideration of the committee. He was entirely under a wrong impression, for it would receive the same attention that had always been given to the numerous petitions and memorials on the same subject. He (Mr. C.) knew that much ignorance prevailed among those individuals who had presented memorials on this subject, as to the actual condition in this District of that class of persons whose condition they were desirous to ameliorate. The Committee on the District of Columbia had good means of ascertaining their condition, and, therefore, would arrive at a correct judgment as to the matter.

Mr. PRESTON expressed his satisfaction at the explanation made by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and withdrew his motion to reconsider.

FOREIGN PRESENTS.

Mr. POINDEXTER, after referring to the recommendation of the President, in his message of January 6, concerning the disposition of the presents made to our foreign agents, and now in the possession of the Department of State, said he had risen to offer the following resolution, of which he asked the immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a schedule of the several articles received by the ministers, consuls, or other agents of the Government of the United States, at foreign courts, as presents from the Governments at which they were respectively accredited, and by them deposited in the Department of State; specifying each article, and its estimated value, and the name of the minister, consul, or agent, to whom the present was made.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON DEPOSITES.

Mr. WILKINS rose to move the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the second report of the Secretary of the Treasury (made a few days ago.) Since that paper had been supplied from the same quarter, and contained a continuation of the reasons contained in the first report for the removal of the depositories, and was intimately connected with the original report, he thought the same number should be printed for circulation.

Mr. CLAY said he objected to the motion, and hoped it would not be entertained. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had confined his motion to the printing of the documents, he (Mr. C.) would have made no objection; but he would now repeat what he had before said, that the Senate had called for documents in illustration of the reasons which the Secretary had previously submitted, and, in lieu of documents, he had given a new argument. It was an uncalled-for argument, and unauthorized; an argument which he had no authority to address to the Senate in answer to the call which had been made upon him. He (Mr. C.) objected to the printing of the report, because it would be an implied sanction of the assumption of an executive officer that, when a call was made by either branch of the Legislature for documents, he had a right to offer an argument. The Senate had not called in this case for an argument and it was not properly before them. But, as the hour for the special order had now arrived, he would move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. WILKINS acquiesced, stating that he was not aware that the hour for the special order had arrived, and that he had no disposition to interrupt the pending discussion.

The motion was then agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed this subject, and Mr. SOUTHARD continued his speech, (as given above,) until the usual hour of adjournment, without having concluded.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE NEW TARIFF.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate of the construction which has been given by that department to the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," and also to furnish copies of such instructions as may have been given to collectors, regulating their duty under the said act.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked for the consideration of the resolution at this time, it being important to obtain early information as to the construction put by the Treasury Department on the tariff act of 1832. Different constructions had been put on the act, and it was important to determine which is the correct one.

Mr. CLAY expressed his gratification with the presentation of the resolution under consideration by the gentleman from New Jersey. He had himself received information from two of our most important northern ports, according to which a most unexpected and unjustifiable construction has been given by the Treasury Department to the compromise act of the last session. It will be recollected by the Senate, that, by the act of 1832, cotton fabrics are subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, and to a further duty, in the form of minimums, of 30 cents and 35 cents. The compromise act of the last session provides for a biennial reduction of 10 per cent. upon all duties imposed by previous acts. It dispenses with no existing duties upon protected articles, but, from the 1st of January, 1834, subjects them all, without specifying their denomination, to the reduction for which it provides. During the passage of the act, the opinion was expressed, both by the gentleman from Massachusetts near me, [Mr. WILKINS], and by myself, one supporting and the other opposing the bill, that the contemplated reduction would operate only on the 25 per cent. ad valorem, and not on the minimums, in the case of the article of cotton, which would remain unaffected. He (Mr. C.) had heard with some surprise, before the meeting of Congress, that, notwithstanding this contemporaneous interpretation of the act, Secretary McLane had decided that the reduction applied both to the minimums and to the 25 per cent.

But, sir, I cannot find language to express the astonishment excited in my mind by the reception of intelligence yesterday, confirmed by concurring information received this day, that the Treasury Department has undertaken, by interpretation, to dispense altogether with the minimums, and, by one fatal spring, to bring the cotton duty down from about 80 per cent. to 24½ per cent. ad valorem! If this information be true, (and he still hoped there might be a mistake about it,) certain ruin and inevitable destruction are, at this moment, impending over the greater part of our cotton manufactures, and especially the important branch of the printing business. And if such an interpretation as is supposed has been given, we cannot too soon know it, nor too promptly apply the proper remedy. Should a remedy be necessary, I shall call, with entire confidence, upon the good faith, the honor, and the probity of Congress, and particularly upon the Southern portion of it, to preserve our work of peace unviolated, and to avert the threatened destruction of great and pervading interests. For himself, (said Mr. C.) he was desirous to see the act of the last session executed honestly and faithfully, and to see a fair experiment made of the system for which it provides.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the subject under consideration had never come to his knowledge until this morning. He had learned this morning that a construction, such as had been stated by the Senator from Kentucky, had been put on the law of the last session; and he agreed that such a construction, on the part of the treasury, would produce the prostration of the entire cotton manufacture, except, probably, that of those of the coarse-est quality. Such was the character of the information which he had received this morning from those who had seen this construction, and seen it with wonder and dismay. It was true, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that, when this bill was before the Senate at the last session, he (Mr. W.) had expressed the opinion which the gentleman had attributed to him. It was equally true that he had, at the time, considered it as a question on which the minds of gentlemen might reasonably have doubts. He spoke, at the time, to the Senator from Delaware near him, [Mr. NAUDAIN,] and also to the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. TOMLINSON,] asking them to express, in writing, their construction of the act. They complied, and their construction agreed with that of the Senator from Kentucky and himself. But he then explained to them that there was another construction—a very improper one, he agreed—but which might be put on this act; and it was this view, among many others, which led him to oppose that act of compromise. He was very sure that there was no such construction in the mind of the Senator from Kentucky, and that nothing could be further from the intention of the gentlemen around him, who had voted for the bill, than to sanction such a construction as that to which he referred. Still, it was not improper for him to say that he pointed it out as possible. He agreed as to the absolute necessity of calling for the imputed construction, and if it should be found to be true, then, unless Congress gives immediate relief, cotton interests are struck down by this one deadly blow of treasury construction, and millions on millions would be insufficient to repair the mischief which would thus be done. It was a construction which had come upon those interested like a shock, as if all these great interests had, by one attack, been undermined and sunk into the earth.

Opposed as he had been, and, in candor he would say, opposed as he still was, to the bill of the last session, even when rightly construed, he could not justly charge upon the act such a construction as that now imputed to have been put on it by the Secretary. He knew no such construction was intended; although he had seen that, by possibility, such a construction might be put upon it. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted, and that the Senate would have the official construction of the Secretary. He also hoped that it would turn out that a false impression had been made on the minds of those who were most immediately interested, and that their apprehensions would prove to have been without foundation or truth.

Mr. FORSYTH said it would have been kinder to censure what was done, after it had been ascertained what had been done. He suggested a limitation of the inquiry to the act of the last session, in order to avoid any unnecessary delay.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN replied that the resolution had reference only to that act, and that the comprehensiveness of the title of that act had led the Senator from Georgia into an error.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a wish that the Senate should rather proceed with the important business before them, unless it was the wish of Senators, in which case he would not oppose the motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated that the business before the committees rendered it necessary to have to-morrow for their deliberation. He wished as much as any one that the business before the Senate should be decided on; and he did not know that he should make a similar motion after to-day.

Mr. FORSYTH put a question to the Senator from Massachusetts, with a view to know when he proposed to make his motion to commit the report.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a desire that the discussion now pending should go on, as, after the full examination which the subject was now undergoing, there would be no occasion for any long deliberation of a committee.

Mr. FORSYTH indicated a wish that the subject should be sent to the Committee on Finance. He wished merely to know in what form the question was to be put for the final decision of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER reminded the gentleman that this subject had been taken up, and made an especial order, before the appointment of the committees. He still believed that it would be the preferable course to refer this matter to a committee. But when was he to interpose his motion to that effect? What gentleman was he to cut off in the midst of a speech? Who was he to prevent from making a reply to any speech which he desired to reply to? He stated that he had a wish that the subject should be referred to the Committee on Finance; but, after the topic had been so fully examined and exhausted, as it would be in this discussion, there would be no reason for its detention before the committee.

The motion was then agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the deposits.

Mr. SOUTHARD then resumed his remarks, (as given entire above,) and continued until 3 o'clock, when he concluded.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose, and said that he wished to be heard on this subject, but as the hour was too late to-day, he would move that the Senate now adjourn; but withdrew the motion, and,

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After spending some time therein,

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1834.

The CHAIR communicated the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 13, 1834.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, directing "the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate of the construction which has been given by that department to the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports;' and also to furnish copies of such instructions as may have been given to collectors, regulating their duty under said act," I have the honor herewith to transmit a printed copy of the letter of instructions from this department to the officers of the customs, dated April 20th, 1833, stating the principles on which the duties were to be calculated under the act of the 14th July, 1832, and that of the 2d of March, 1833, modifying said act; and also a printed copy of the instructions given by the Comptroller on the 26th ultimo.

No other instructions have issued from this department in relation to the subject mentioned in the resolution.

Under the construction of the law, as given by the department in the circular letter of April last, the duties on manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part, are to be calculated according to the act of July 14, 1832; and the act of the 2d of March, 1833, reducing the duty, will operate upon the rate of duty calculated on the minimum principle; and instructions will further be given to the collectors accordingly.

No decision has been made by the department since that of April 20, 1833, before referred to.

SENATE.]

Construction of the new Tariff.

[JAN. 13, 1834.]

I understand from the Comptroller that his instructions were intended by him to carry into effect that decision, according to what he supposed to be its intention.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, &c.

R. B. TANEY.

To the Hon. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY said he was glad to see that the error which had been committed in the interpretation of the law of the last session was now to be corrected by the new instructions which were forthwith to be issued. It appeared that the Comptroller and the Secretary of the Treasury had, by a wrong interpretation of the act, undertaken to dispense with three-fourths of the duty on cottons, instead of one-tenth of the excess beyond twenty per cent. That such was the interpretation put upon the law, and which was about to be carried into practical operation, there could be no doubt, for he had received a large number of letters on the subject; and, among the rest, one from an officer concerned in collecting the revenue of the United States, stating his surprise at the construction which had been put upon it, and enclosing a copy of the instructions he had received. He (Mr. C.) would again repeat that he was glad to hear that the error which had been committed was acknowledged, and about to be rectified. He trusted that instructions would speedily be sent forth to avert the impending mischief, which threatened and was about to lay the axe to the root of one of the most important branches of the manufacture in the country.

He would move that the communications that had been made should be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, to give them an opportunity of looking into the subject, and see what ought to be done.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to add to the motion an order for the printing of the report. He hoped the mover would accept of this modification.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to suggest that the report ought to go to the Committee on Finance. It applied to a revenue subject, to a mere regulation of a financial character. He should move, therefore, to amend the motion, by sending the report to the Committee on Finance. It was obvious that there had been no decision of the Treasury Department, except that which was made in the rule laid down in April last. That publication was made, in order that every notice should be given, and that, if there was cause for complaint, complaints should be made. It appeared that the construction now complained of was not the act of the Secretary, but resulted only in a mistaken construction of the rule by the Comptroller. This error was now corrected. The gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken when he intimated that the Secretary and the Comptroller had a set of regulations, the object of which was to prostrate the great manufacturing interests of the country. He concluded with moving to amend the motion, by making the reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY said, that, with reference to the precise committee to which the report should be sent, or whether it should be sent to any, if the Secretary of the Treasury intended to do what he said he did, it was not material. But, according to the practice of the Senate, it ought to go to the Committee on Manufactures. The immediate object of the minimum principle was the protection of the manufacturing interests. The question was, whether the minimums were not intended to be preserved by the act of the last session. As this subject appeared to have the strongest bearing on the manufacturing interests, he thought that the Committee on Manufactures was the proper committee. As to the error itself, the gentleman from Georgia might apportion it as he pleased between the Secretary and the Comptroller. But how had it happened, as the instruction was issued as late as April last, that the Secretary had not been able to find time to look into it, or even to examine the construction of that rule by the Comptroller, which had been made as much as three weeks ago? Had the Secretary been so exclusively occupied in the removal of the deposits, in looking out for private banks, and making his bargains with them, that he could not find time to attend to the proper duties of the Treasury Department? The rule, it seemed, was published in April last. But the public attention was seldom called to the operation of measures until they were about to go into operation. It was only at the moment when this construction was going into effect that one loud cry of surprise and indignation was heard from the north to the south. It was a criminal neglect in the Secretary that he had not made an earlier correction of the error.

He expressed his gratification to hear that new instructions are to go forth to save our cotton manufactures from the impending destruction. He hoped the report would be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, that they might see that the error was corrected, and that there was no other or greater error committed in the new instructions which were to correct it.

Mr. FORSYTH expressed his conviction that the Secretary had been properly employed in the performance of his legitimate duties. He (Mr. F.) would not throw out any conjecture on this subject, after the Senator from Kentucky himself had been so specific on the same. The Secretary had not looked into this subject, because it was not the province of the head of the department to look into the execution of the details of office. His duty was to prescribe the duty, and it was left to the subordinate officers to attend to the details. It was morally impossible for the Secretary to act on a principle which required of him to see every order which he issued carried out through its details. Such duties would require more than ten men to perform them. He (Mr. F.) was anxious that the error, which was obviously an error of judgment, should be fixed on the right person, because it would do him no harm. The reference of the subject would be peculiarly appropriate to the Committee on Finance. According to the construction put by the department on the law of the last session, the minimums were to be swept away. Their only use was to ascertain what was the true rate of the duties payable after January next. On account of the infinite varieties of value, the rate of reduction fixed by the act of the last session had caused great difficulty and confusion among the officers of the revenue. A rule had been found necessary to prevent this difficulty, and such rule should be supplied by the Committee on Finance. On this ground he had presented his motion to amend.

Mr. CLAY begged leave to say there was not the slightest earthly difference, as intimated by the gentleman from Georgia. The act of the last session provided that there shall be a biennial reduction of 10 per cent. of the excess of duties beyond 20 per cent. Sir, (said he) you have no more to do with the old law than with the new one; you have only to ascertain what are the duties on any particular article, and, having found the aggregate, you proceed to deduct 20 per cent., and then, taking 10 per cent. from the difference, you arrive at a correct result. Mr. C. had in his possession a calculation, which he had accidentally left behind him, made in figures by a collector of the customs, which set the subject in so fair a light as not to be mistaken. You have, Mr. C. continued, only to go to the act of the last session, apply the rule he had laid down to deduct 10 per cent. from all the duties over 20 per cent. as by the existing law, and you cannot go wrong. With respect to the apology made for the Secretary of the Treasury that it was impossible for him to examine into the details of all the business of his department, he (Mr. C.) must say that there were some of them of such vital importance, that he might—ought—to find time to look into them. For instance, when new laws were going into operation so important as those connected with the finances, the revenues of the nation, it was the imperious duty of the Secretary not only to give general instructions to his subordinates, but to instruct them in the proper mode of conducting the details of the business committed to their charge. But, sir, (continued Mr. C.,) how is it that the Secretary of the Treasury, who cannot find time to direct the details of a business so important as the revenues of the country, can yet find time to assume the whole of the duties of the Treasurer of the United States, which he did when removing the public deposits from the bank? He had supposed that the Treasurer, who had given bond, had the whole custody of the public treasure; and yet the Secretary assumes his duties, takes the entire control and direction of them, and bestows on them his undivided attention, while he suffers the Comptroller, a subordinate officer, to issue instructions on a subject of the last importance to the public interest, spreading ruin and dismay throughout the manufacturing districts.

Mr. FORSYTH said it was not his intention to defend the Secretary of the Treasury, as the gentleman seemed much disposed to find fault. He would only say that the Secretary had laid down the rule, under the law, for the guidance of the subordinate officers of the treasury; and the Comptroller, giving an erroneous construction to it, had committed a mistake in his instruction for carrying out the details.

Mr. CLAY had one word only to add. It would be recollected that, when the act was passed, two great systems of valuation were proposed and discussed. One was the home valuation, and the other was the invoice or foreign valuation; and the act of the last session recognised the latter after the year 1843. The collector was bound to make the calculation in every case.

Mr. PRESTON preferred that the reference should be made to the Committee on Finance, as the one most appropriate for the consideration of the subject. So far as he was concerned, he was for carrying into effect the law of the last session in perfect good faith, according to the construction given to it at the time it was passed; and he was confident that such was the wish and understanding of the South. As to the reference of the subject then under consideration, it was a question, he conceived, peculiarly of revenue, and ought, therefore, to go to the Committee on Finance. The law might have been intended, in part, for the protection of manufactures; but it was more intrinsically a revenue law, and could only be appropriately considered by the Financial Committee.

Mr. CLAY then observed that, to avoid further discussion at this time, and with the intention of offering a resolution calling on the Secretary for the new instructions to be issued to the collectors of the customs, he would move to lay the report on the table. When the answer of the Secretary to this resolution should be received, the Senate could then more readily decide whether it would be necessary to refer the subject to any committee.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that it would be as well to send the subject at once to the Committee on Finance, without taking up further time.

Mr. CLAY replied, that the Secretary had informed the Senate that he was about issuing new instructions to the collectors; he wanted to see those new instructions, and therefore persisted in his motion.

Mr. CLAY's motion was then adopted without a division.

THE DEPOSITE QUESTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolutions of Mr. CLAY, on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, as the special order of the day; when

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and said that the statement of this case might be given in a very few words. The 16th section of the act incorporating the bank provides that, wherever there is a bank or branch of the United States Bank, the public moneys should be deposited therein, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that, in that case, he should report to Congress, if in session, immediately; and, if not, at the commencement of the next session. The Secretary, acting under the provisions of this section, has ordered the deposits to be withheld from the bank, and has reported his reasons, in conformity with the provisions of the section. The Senate is now called upon to consider his reasons, in order to determine whether the Secretary is justified or not. I have examined them with care and deliberation, without the slightest bias, as far as I am conscious, personal or political. I have but a slight acquaintance with the Secretary, and that little is not unfavorable to him. I stand wholly disconnected with the two great political parties now contending for ascendancy. My political connexions are with that small and denounced party which has voluntarily wholly retired from the party strifes of the day, with a view of saving, if possible, the liberty and the constitution of the country, in this great crisis of our affairs.

Having maturely considered, with these impartial feelings, the reasons of the Secretary, I am constrained to say that he has entirely failed to make out his justification. At the very commencement, he has placed his right to remove the deposits on an assumption resting on a misconception of the case. In the progress of his argument he has entirely abandoned the first, and assumed a new and greatly enlarged ground, utterly inconsistent with the first, and equally untenable; and yet, as broad as his assumptions are, there is an important part of the transaction which he does not attempt to vindicate, and to which he has not even alluded. I shall now (said Mr. C.) proceed, without further remark, to make good these assertions.

The Secretary, at the commencement of his argument, assumes the position that, in the absence of all legal provision, he, as the head of the financial department, had the right, in virtue of his office, to designate the agent and place for the safe keeping of the public deposits. He then contends that the 16th section does not restrict his power, which stands, he says, on the same ground that it did before the passing of the act incorporating the bank. It is unnecessary to inquire into the correctness of the position assumed by the Secretary; but, if it were, it would not be difficult to show that when an agent, with general powers, assumes, in the execution of his agency, a power not delegated, the assumption rests on the necessity of the case; and that no power, in such case, can be lawfully exercised which was not necessary to effect the object intended. Nor would it be difficult to show that, in this case, the power assumed by the Secretary would belong, not to him, but to the Treasurer, who, under the act organizing the Treasury Department, is expressly charged with the safe keeping of the public funds, for which he is responsible under bond in heavy penalties.

But, strongly and directly as these considerations bear on the question of the power of the Secretary, I do not think it necessary to pursue them, for the plain reason that the Secretary has entirely mistaken the case. It is not a case, as he supposes, where there is no legal provision in relation to the safe keeping of the public funds, but one of precisely the opposite character. The 16th section expressly provides that the deposits shall be made in the bank and its branches; and, of course, it is perfectly clear that all powers which the Secretary has derived from the general and inherent powers of his office, in the absence of such provision, are wholly inapplicable to this case. Nor is it less clear that, if the section had terminated with the provision directing the deposits to be made in the bank, the Secretary would have had no more control over the subject than myself, or any other Senator; and it follows, of course, that he must derive his power, not from any general reasons connected with the nature of his office, but from some express provision contained in the section, or some other part of the act. It has not been attempted to be shown that there is any such provision in any other section or part of the act. The only control, then, which the Secretary can rightfully claim over the depositories, is contained in the provision which directs that the depositories shall be made in the bank, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury; which brings the whole question, in reference to the depositories, to the extent of the power which Congress intended to confer upon the Secretary, in these few words—"unless otherwise ordered."

In ascertaining the intention of Congress, I lay it down as a rule, which, I suppose, will not be controverted, that all political powers under our free institutions are trust powers, and not rights, liberties, or immunities, belonging personally to the officer. I also lay it down as a rule, not less incontrovertible, that trust powers are necessarily limited (unless there be some express provision to the contrary) to the subject, matter, and object of the trust. This brings us to the question—what is the subject and object of the trust in this case? The whole section relates to depositories—to the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds. With this view they are directed to be made in the bank. With the same view, and in order to increase the security, power was conferred on the Secretary to withhold the depositories; and, with the same view, he is directed to report his reasons for the removal to Congress. All have one common object—the security of the public funds. To this point the whole section converges. The language of Congress, fairly understood, is, we have selected the bank, because we confide in it as a safe and faithful agent, to keep the public money; but, to prevent the abuse of so important a trust, we invest the Secretary with power to remove the depositories, with a view to their increased security. And, lest the Secretary, on his part, should abuse so important a trust, and in order still further to increase that security, we direct, in case of removal, that he shall report his reasons. It is obvious, under this view of the subject, that the Secretary has no right to act in relation to the depositories, but with a view to their increased security; that he has no right to order them to be withheld from the bank so long as the funds are in safety, and the bank has faithfully performed the duties imposed in relation to them; and not even then, unless the depositories can be placed in safer and more faithful hands. That such was the opinion of the Executive, in the first instance, we have demonstrative proof in the message of the President to Congress at the close of the last session, which placed the subject of the removal of the depositories exclusively on the question of their safety; and that such was also the opinion of the House of Representatives then, we have equally conclusive proof, from the vote of that body, that the public funds in the bank were safe; which was understood at that time on all sides, by friends and foes, as deciding the question of the removal of the depositories.

The extent of the power intended to be conferred being established, the question now arises—Has the Secretary transcended its limit? It can scarcely be necessary to argue this point. It is not even pretended that the public depositories were in danger, or that the bank had not faithfully performed all the duties imposed on it in relation to them; nor that the Secretary placed the money in safer or in more faithful hands. So far otherwise, there is not a man who hears me who will not admit that the public moneys are now less safe than they were in the Bank of the United States. And I will venture to assert, that not a capitalist can be found who would not ask a considerably higher per centage to insure them in their present, than in the place of depository designated by law. If these views are correct, and I hold them to be unquestionable, the question is decided. The Secretary has no right to withhold the depositories from the bank. There has been, and can be, but one argument advanced in favor of his right, which has even the appearance of being tenable; that the power to withhold is given in general terms, and without qualification, "unless the Secretary otherwise direct." Those who resort to this argument must assume the position that the letter ought to prevail over the clear and manifest intention of the act. They must regard the power of the Secretary, not as a trust power, limited by the subject and the object of the trust, but as a chartered right, to be used according to his discretion and pleasure. There is a radical defect in our mode of construing political powers, of which this and many other instances afford striking examples; but I will give the Secretary his choice. Either the intention or the letter must prevail. He may select either, but cannot be permitted to take one or the other as may suit his purpose. If he chooses the former, he has transcended his powers, as I have clearly demonstrated. If he selects the latter, he is equally condemned, as he has clearly exercised power not comprehended in the letter of his authority. He has not confined himself simply to withholding the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, but he has ordered them to be deposited in other banks, though there is not a word in the section to justify it. I do not intend to argue the question whether he had a right to order the funds withheld from the United States Bank to be placed in the State banks which he has selected; but, I ask, how has he acquired that right? It rests wholly on construction, on the supposed intention of the Legislature, which, when it gives a power, intends to give all the means necessary to render it available. But, clear as this principle of construction is, it is not more clear than that which would limit the right of the Secretary to the question of the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds; and I cannot admit that the Secretary shall be permitted to resort to the letter, or to construction, as may best be calculated to enlarge his power, when the right construction is denied to those who would limit his power by the clear and obvious intention of Congress.

I might here (said Mr. C.) rest the question of the power of the Secretary over the depositories, without adding another word. I have placed it on grounds from which no ingenuity, however great, or subtlety, however refined, can remove it; but such is the magnitude of the case, and such my desire to give the reasons of the Secretary the fullest consideration, that I shall follow him through the remainder of his reasons.

That the Secretary was conscious that the first position which he assumed, and which I have considered, was untenable, we have ample proof in the precipitancy with which he retreated from it. He had scarcely laid it down, when, without illustration or argument, he passed with a rapid transition, and I must say, a transition as obscure as rapid, to another position, wholly inconsistent with the first; and, in assuming which, he expressly repudiates the idea that the safe and faithful keeping of the public funds had any necessary connexion with his removal of the depositories; his power to do which he places on the broad and unlimited ground that he had a right to make such disposition of them as the public interest or the convenience of the people might require. I have said that the transition of the Secretary was as obscure as it was rapid; but, obscure as it is, he has said enough to enable us to perceive the process by which he has reached so extraordinary a position; and we may safely affirm, that his arguments are not less extraordinary than the conclusion at which he arrives. His first proposition, which, however, he has not ventured to lay down expressly, is, that Congress has an unlimited control over the depositories, and that it may dispose of them in whatever manner it may please, in order to promote the general welfare and convenience of the people. He next asserts that Congress has parted with this power, under the sixteenth section, which directs the depositories to be made in the Bank of the United States, and then concludes with affirming that it has invested the Secretary of the Treasury with it, for reasons which he professes to be unable to understand.

It cannot be necessary, before so enlightened a body, that I should undertake to refute an argument so utterly untrue in premises and conclusion; to show that Congress never possessed the power which the Secretary claims for it; that it is a power, from its very nature, incapable of such enlargement, being limited solely to the safe keeping of the public funds; that, if it existed, it would be susceptible of the most dangerous abuses; that Congress might make the wildest and most dangerous association the depository of the public funds; might place them in the hands of the fanatics and the madmen of the North, who are waging war against the domestic institutions of the South, under the plea of promoting the general welfare. But admitting that Congress possessed the power which the Secretary attributes to it, by what process of reasoning can he show that it has parted with this unlimited power, simply by directing the public moneys to be deposited in the Bank of the United States? or, if it has parted with the power, by what extraordinary process has it been transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, by those few and simple words, "unless he shall otherwise order?" In support of this extraordinary argument, the Secretary has offered not a single illustration, nor a single remark bearing the semblance of reason, but one, which I shall now proceed to notice.

He asserts, and asserts truly, that the bank charter is a contract between the Government, or rather the people of the United States, and the bank; and then assumes that it constitutes him a common agent or trustee, to superintend the execution of the stipulations contained in that portion of the contract comprehended in the sixteenth section. Let us now, taking these assumptions to be true, ascertain what those stipulations are, the superintendence of the execution of which, as he affirms, are jointly confided by the parties to the Secretary.

The Government stipulated, on its part, that the public money should be deposited in the Bank of the United States—a great and valuable privilege, on which the successful operation of the institution mainly depends. The bank, on its part, stipulated that the funds should be safely kept; that the duties imposed in relation to them should be faithfully discharged; and that for this, with other privileges, it would pay to the Government the sum of $1,500,000. These are the stipulations, the execution of which, according to the Secretary's assumption, he has been appointed, as joint agent or trustee, to superintend, and from which he would assume the extraordinary power which he claims over the depositories, to dispose of them in such manner as he may think the public interest or the convenience of the people may require.

Is it not obvious that the whole extent of power conferred upon him, admitting his assumption to be true, is to withhold the depositories in case that the bank should violate its stipulations in relation to them on one side, and, on the other, to prevent the Government from withholding the depositories, so long as the bank faithfully performed its part of the contract? This is the full extent of his power, according to his own showing; not a particle more can be added. But there is another aspect in which the position in which the Secretary has placed himself may be viewed. It offers for consideration not only a question of the extent of his power, but a question as to the nature and extent of duty which has been imposed upon him. If the position be such as he has described, there has been confided to him a trust of the most sacred character, accompanied by duties of the most solemn obligation. He stands, by the mutual confidence of the parties, vested with the high judicial power to determine on the infraction or observance of a contract, in which Government and a large and respectable portion of the citizens are deeply interested; and, in the execution of this high power, he is bound, by honor and conscience, so to act as to protect each of the parties in the full enjoyment of their respective portion of benefit in the contract; so long as they faithfully observe it. Now has the Secretary performed these solemn duties, which, according to his representation, have been imposed upon him? Has he protected the bank against the aggression of the Government, or the Government against the unfaithful conduct of the bank in relation to the depositories? Or has he, forgetting his sacred obligations, disregarded the interests of both—on one side divesting the bank of the depositories, and, on the other, defeating the Government in the intended security of the public funds, by seizing on them as the property of the Executive, to be disposed of at pleasure to favorite and partisan banks?

But I shall relieve the Secretary from this awkward and disreputable position, in which his own arguments have placed him. He is not the mutual trustee, as he has represented, of the Government and the bank; but simply the agent of the former, vested under the contract with power to withhold the depositories, with a view, as has been stated, to their additional security—to their safe keeping; and if he had but for a moment reflected on the fact that he was directed to report his reasons to Congress only, and not also to the bank, for withholding the depositories, he could scarcely have failed to perceive that he was simply the agent of one of the parties, and not, as he supposes, a joint agent of both.

The Secretary having established, as he supposes, his right to dispose of the depositories as in his opinion the general interest and convenience of the people might require, proceeds to claim and exercise power with a boldness commensurate with the extravagance of the right which he has assumed. He commences with a claim to determine, in his official character, that the Bank of the United States is unconstitutional—a monopoly—baneful to the welfare of the community. Having determined this point, he comes to the conclusion that the charter of the bank ought not to be renewed, and then assumes that it will not be renewed. Having reached this point, he then determines that it is his duty to remove the depositories. No one can object that Mr. Taney, as a citizen, in his individual character, should entertain an opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the bank; but that he, acting in his official character, and performing official acts under the charter of the bank, should undertake to determine that the institution was unconstitutional, and that those who granted the charter and bestowed upon him his power to act under it had violated the constitution, is an assumption of power of a nature which I will not undertake to characterize, as I wish not to be personal.

But he is not content with the power simply to determine on the unconstitutionality of the bank. He goes far beyond; he claims to be the organ of the voice of the people. In this high character, he pronounces that the question of the renewal of the bank charter was put in issue at the last presidential election, and that the people had determined that it should not be renewed. I do not (said Mr. C.) intend to enter into argument whether, in point of fact, the renewal of the charter was put in issue at the last election. That point was ably and fully discussed by the honorable Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] who conclusively proved that no such question was involved in the issue; and if it were, the issue comprehended so many others, that it was impossible to conjecture on which the election turned. I look to higher objections. I would inquire by what authority the Secretary of the Treasury constitutes himself the organ of the people of the United States? He has the reputation of being an able lawyer; and can he be ignorant that, so long as the constitution of the United States exists, the only organs of the people of these States, so far as the action of the General Government is concerned, are the several departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, which, acting within the respective limits assigned by the constitution, have a right to pronounce, authoritatively, the voice of the people? A claim on the part of the Executive to interpret, as the Secretary has done, the voice of the people, through any other channel, is to shake the foundation of our system. Has the Secretary forgotten that the last step to absolute power is this very assumption which he has claimed for that department? I am thus brought (said Mr. C.) to allude to the extraordinary manifesto read by the President to the cabinet, and which is so intimately connected with the point immediately under consideration. That document, though apparently addressed to the cabinet, was clearly and manifestly intended as an appeal to the people of the United States, and opens a new and direct organ of communication between the President and them, unknown to the constitution and the laws. There are but two channels known to either through which the President can communicate with the people—by messages to the two Houses of Congress, as expressly provided for in the constitution; or by proclamation, setting forth the interpretation which he places upon a law it has become his official duty to execute. Going beyond, is one amongst the alarming signs of the times which portend the overthrow of the constitution, and the approach of despotic power.

The Secretary, having determined that the bank was unconstitutional, that the people had pronounced against the recharter, concludes that Congress had nothing to do with the subject. With a provident foresight, he perceives the difficulty and embarrassment into which the currency of the country would be thrown, on the termination of the bank charter; to prevent which, he proceeds deliberately, with a parental care, to supply a new currency, "equal to, or better," than that which Congress had supplied. With this view, he determines on immediate removal of the deposits; he puts them in certain State institutions, intending to organize them, after the fashion of the empire State, into a great safety-fund system, but which, unfortunately, undoubtedly, for the projectors, if not for the country, the limited power of the State banks did not permit him to effect. But a substitute was found by associating them in certain articles of agreement, and appointing an inspector general of all this league of banks! and all this without law or appropriation! Is it not amazing that it never occurred to the Secretary that the subject of currency belonged exclusively to Congress, and that to assume to regulate it was a plain usurpation of the powers of that department of the Government?

Having thus assumed the power officially to determine on the constitutionality of the bank; having erected himself into an organ of the people's voice, and settled the question of the regulation of the currency, he next proceeds to assume the judicial powers over the bank. He declares that the bank has transcended its powers, and had therefore forfeited its charter, for which he inflicts on the institution the severe and exemplary punishment of withholding the deposits; and all this in the face of an express provision, investing the court with power touching the infraction of the charter, directing in what manner the trial should be commenced and conducted, and securing expressly to the bank the sacred right of trial by jury, in finding the facts. All this passed for nothing in the eyes of the Secretary, who was too deeply engrossed in providing for the common welfare to regard either Congress, the court, or the constitution.

The Secretary next proceeds to supervise the general operations of the bank, pronouncing, with authority, that at one time it has discounted too freely, and at another too sparingly, without reflecting that all the control which the Government can rightfully exercise over the operations of the institution is through the five directors who represent the Government in this respect. Directors! Mr. C. exclaimed; did I say? [alluding to the present,] No! spies is their proper designation!

I cannot (said Mr. C.) proceed with the remarks which I intended on the remainder of the Secretary's reasons; I have not patience to dwell on assumptions of power, so bold, so lawless, and so unconstitutional; they deserve not the name of argument, and I cannot waste time in treating them as such. There are, however, two, which I cannot pass over, not because they are more extraordinary or audacious than the others, but for another quality, which I choose not to designate.

The Secretary alleges that the bank has interfered with the politics of the country. If this be true, it certainly is a most heinous offence. The bank is a great public trust, possessing, for the purpose of discharging the trust, great power and influence, which it could not pervert from the object intended to that of influencing the politics of the country, without being guilty of a great political crime. In making these remarks, I do not intend to give any countenance to the truth of the charge alleged by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to deny to the officers of the bank the right which belongs to them, in common with every citizen, freely to form political principles, and act on them in their private capacity, without permitting them to influence their official conduct. But it is strange it did not occur to the Secretary, while he was accusing and punishing the bank on the charge of interfering in the politics of the country, that the Government also was a great trust, vested with powers still more extensive, and influence immeasurably greater than that of the bank, given it to enable it to discharge the object for which it was created; and that it has no more right to pervert its power and influence into the means of controlling the politics of the country than the bank itself. Can it be unknown to him that the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, (an officer in his own department,) the man who has made so prominent a figure in this transaction, was daily and hourly meddling in politics, and that he is one of the principal political managers of the administration? Can he be ignorant that the whole power of the Government has been perverted into a great political machine, with a view of corrupting and controlling the country? Can he be ignorant that the avowed and open policy of the Government is to reward political friends, and punish political enemies; and that, acting on this principle, it has driven from office hundreds of honest and competent officers for opinion's sake only, and filled their places with devoted partisans? Can he be ignorant that the real offence of the bank is not that it has intermeddled in politics, but because it would not intermeddle on the side of power? There is nothing more dignified than reproof from the lips of innocence, or punishment from the hands of justice; but change the picture—let the guilty reprove, and the criminal punish, and what more odious, more hateful, can be presented to the imagination!

The Secretary next tells us, in the same spirit, that the bank has been wasteful of the public funds; that it has spent some thirty, forty, or fifty thousand dollars—I do not remember the exact amount—(trifles have no weight in the determination of so great a question) in circulating essays and speeches in defence of the institution, of which sum one-fifth part (some seven thousand dollars) belonged to the Government. Well, sir, if the bank has really wasted this amount of the public money, it is a grave charge. It has not a right to waste a single cent; but I must say, in defence of the bank, that, assailed as it was by the Executive, it would have been unfaithful to its trust, both to the stockholders and to the public, had it not resorted to every proper means in its power to defend its conduct, and, among others, the free circulation of able and judicious publications.

But, admit that the bank has been guilty of wasting the public funds to the full extent charged by the Secretary; I would ask if he, the head of the financial department of the Government, is not under as high and solemn obligation to take care of the moneyed interest of the public as the bank itself? I would ask him to answer me a few simple questions: How has he performed this duty in relation to the interest which the public holds in the bank? Has he been less wasteful than he has charged the bank to have been? Has he not wasted thousands where the bank, even according to his own statement, has hundreds? Has he not, by withdrawing the deposits, and placing them in the State banks, where the public receives not a cent of interest, greatly affected the dividends of the bank of the United States, in which the Government, as a stockholder, is a loser to the amount of one-fifth of the diminution—a sum which, I will venture to predict, will many fold exceed the entire amount which the bank has expended in its defence? But this is a small, very small, proportion of the public loss, in consequence of the course which the Executive has pursued in relation to the bank, and which has reduced the value of the shares from 130 to 108—(a Senator near me says much more; it may be; I am not particular in such things)—and on which the public sustains a corresponding loss on its share of the stock, amounting to seven millions of dollars—a sum more than two hundred fold greater than the waste which he has charged upon the bank. Other administrations may exceed this in talents, patriotism, and honesty; but certainly in audacity, in effrontery, it stands without a parallel!

The Secretary has brought forward many and grievous charges against the bank. I will not condescend to notice them. It is the conduct of the Secretary, and not that of the bank, which is immediately under examination; and he has no right to drag the conduct of the bank into the issue, beyond its operations in regard to the deposits. To that extent I am prepared to examine his allegations against it; but beyond that he has no right—no, not the least—to arraign the conduct of the bank; and I, for one, will not, by noticing his charges beyond that point, sanction his authority to call its conduct in question. But let the point in issue be determined, and I, as far as my voice extends, will give to those who desire it the means of the freest and most unlimited inquiry into its conduct. I am no partisan of the bank; I am connected with it in no way, by moneyed or political ties. I might say, with truth, that the bank owes as much to me as to any other individual in the country; and I might even add that, had it not been for my efforts, it would not have been chartered. Standing in this relation to the institution, a high sense of delicacy, a regard to independence and character, has restrained me from any connexion with the institution whatever, except some trifling accommodations, in the way of ordinary business, which were not of the slightest importance either to the bank or myself.

But while I shall not condescend to notice the charges of the Secretary against the bank, beyond the extent which I have stated, a sense of duty to the institution, and regard to the part which I took in its creation, compel me to notice two allegations against it which have fallen from another quarter. It is said that the bank had no agency, or at least efficient agency, in the restoration of specie payments in 1817; and that it had failed to furnish the country with a uniform and sound currency, as had been promised at its creation. Both of these allegations I pronounce to be without just foundation. To enter into a minute examination of them, would carry me too far from the subject; and I must content myself with saying that, having been on the political stage, without interruption, from that day to this—having been an attentive observer of the question of the currency throughout the whole period—the bank has been an indispensable agent in the restoration of specie payments; that, without it, the restoration could not have been effected short of the utter prostration of all the moneyed institutions of the country, and an entire depreciation of bank paper; and that it has not only restored specie payments, but has given a currency far more uniform between the extremes of the country than was anticipated, or even dreamed of, at the time of its creation. I will say, for myself, that I did not believe, at that time, that the exchange between the Atlantic and the West would be brought lower than two and a half per cent.; the estimated expense then, including insurance and loss of time, of transporting specie between the two points. How much it was below the anticipated point I need not state; the whole commercial world knows that it was not a fourth part, at the time of the removal of the deposits.

But to return from this digression. Though I will not notice the charges of the Secretary, for the reasons already stated, I will take the liberty of propounding, to those who support them on this floor, a few plain questions. If there be in banking institutions an inherent tendency so strong to abuse and corruption as they contend; if, in consequence of this tendency, the Bank of the United States be guilty of the enormous charges and corruptions alleged, notwithstanding its responsibility to the Government and our control over it, what is to be expected from irresponsible league banks, so called by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] over which we can have no legal control? If our power of renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States; if our right to vacate the charter by scire facias, in case of misconduct; if the influence which the appointment of five Government directors gives us; and, finally, if the power which we have of appointing committees to examine into its condition, are not sufficient to hold the institution in check; if, in spite of all these, it has, from the innate corruption of such institutions, been guilty of the enormous abuses and crimes charged against it, what may we not expect from the associated banks, the favorites of the treasury, over the renewal of whose charters the Government has no power, against which it can issue no scire facias, in whose direction it has not a single individual, and into whose conduct Congress can appoint no committee to look? With these checks all withdrawn, what would be the condition of the public funds?

I (said Mr. C.) stated in the outset of my remarks, that broad as was the power which the Secretary had assumed in relation to the deposits, there was a portion of the transaction of a highly important character, to which he has not alluded, and in relation to which he has not even attempted a justification. I will now proceed to make good this assertion to the letter.

There is a material difference between withholding money from going into the bank, and withdrawing it after it has been placed there. The former is authorized in the manner which I have stated, under the sixteenth section, which directs, as has been frequently stated, that the public money shall be deposited in the bank, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury. But neither that section, nor any portion of the act incorporating the bank, nor, in truth, any other act, gives the Secretary any authority, of himself, to withdraw public money deposited in the bank. There is, I repeat, a material difference between withholding public money from deposit and withdrawing it. When paid into the place designated by law as the depository of the public money, it passes to the credit of the Treasurer, and then is in the treasury of the United States, where it is placed under the protection of the constitution itself, and from which, by an express provision of the constitution, it can only be withdrawn by an appropriation made by law. So careful were the framers of the act of 1816 to leave nothing to implication, that express authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury, in the fifteenth section, to transfer the deposits from one place to another, for the convenience of disbursements, but which, by a strange perversion, is now attempted to be so construed as to confer on the Secretary the power to withdraw the money from the place of deposit, and to loan it to favored State banks. I express myself too favorably; I should say give—(they pay no interest,) with a view to sustain their credits, or enlarge their profits; a power not only far beyond the Secretary, but which Congress itself could not exercise without a flagrant breach of the constitution. But, it is said, in answer to these views, that money paid in deposit in the bank, as directed by law, is not in the treasury. I will not stop (said Mr. C.) to reply to such an objection. If it be not in the treasury, where is the treasury? If it be not money in the treasury, where is the money annually reported to be in the treasury? Where the eight or nine millions which, by the annual report of the Secretary, is said to be now in the treasury? Are we to understand that none of this money is, in truth, in the treasury?—that it is floating about at large, subject to be disposed of—to be given away—at the will of the Executive, to favorites and partisans? So it would seem; for it appears, by a correspondence between the Treasurer and the cashier of the bank, derived through the bank, (the Secretary not deeming it worth while to give the slightest information of the transaction, as if a matter of course,) that he has drawn out two millions and a quarter of the public money, without appropriation, and distributed it at pleasure among his favorites!

But it is attempted to vindicate the conduct of the Secretary on the ground of precedent. I will not stop to notice whether the cases cited are in point; nor will I avail myself of the great and striking advantage that I might have on the question of precedent: this case stands alone and distinct from all others. There is none similar to it in magnitude and importance. I waive all that; I place myself on higher grounds; I stand on the immovable principle, that, on a question of law and constitution, in a deliberative assembly, there is no room, no place for precedents. To admit them would be to make the violation of to-day the law and constitution of to-morrow; and to substitute, in the place of the written and sacred will of the people and the Legislature, the infraction of those charged with the execution of the law. Such, in my opinion, is the relative force of law and constitution on one side, as compared with precedents on the other. Viewed in a different light, not in reference to the law or constitution, but to the conduct of the officer, I am disposed to give rather more weight to precedents, when the question relates to an excuse or apology for the officer, in case of infraction. If the infraction be a trivial one, in a case not calculated to excite attention, an officer might fairly excuse himself on the ground of precedent; but in one like this, of the utmost magnitude, involving the highest interests and most important principles, where the attention of the officer must be aroused to a most careful examination, he cannot avail himself of the plea of precedent to excuse his conduct. It is a case where false precedents are to be corrected, not followed. An officer ought to be ashamed, in such a case, to attempt to vindicate his conduct on a charge of violating law or constitution by pleading precedents. The principle in such is obvious. If the Secretary's right to withdraw public money from the treasury be clear, he has no need of precedent to vindicate him. If not, he ought not, in a case of so much magnitude, to have acted.

I have not (said Mr. C.) touched a question which has had so prominent a part in the debate, whether the withholding the deposits was the act of the Secretary or the President. Under my view of the subject, the question is not of the slightest importance. It is equally unauthorized and illegal, whether done by President or Secretary; but, as the question has been agitated, and as my views do not entirely correspond, on this point, with those advocating the side which I do, I deem it due to frankness to express my sentiments.

I have no doubt that the President removed the former Secretary, and placed the present in his place, expressly with a view to the removal of the deposits. I am equally clear, under all the circumstances of the case, that the President's conduct is wholly indefensible; and, among other objections, I fear he had in view, in the removal, an object eminently dangerous and unconstitutional—to give an advantage to his veto, never intended by the constitution; a power intended as a shield, to protect the executive against the encroachment of the legislative department; to maintain the present state of things against dangerous or hasty innovation, but which I fear is, in this case, intended as a sword, to defend the usurpation of the Executive. I say I fear; for although the circumstance of this leads to a just apprehension that such is the intention, I will not permit myself to assert that such is the fact; that so lawless and unconstitutional an object is contemplated by the President, till his act shall compel me to believe to the contrary. But, while I thus severely condemn the conduct of the President in removing the former Secretary and appointing the present, I must say, that in my opinion it is a case of the abuse, and not of the usurpation of power. I cannot doubt that the President has, under the constitution, the right of removal from office: nor can I doubt that the power of removal, wherever it exists, does, from necessity, involve the power of general supervision; nor can I doubt that it might be constitutionally exercised in reference to the deposits. Reverse the present case; suppose the late Secretary, instead of being against, had been in favor of the removal; and that the President, instead of being for, had been against it, deeming the removal not only inexpedient, but, under circumstances, illegal; would any man doubt that, under such circumstances, he had a right to remove his Secretary, if it were the only means of preventing the removal of the deposits? Nay, would it not be his indispensable duty to have removed him? and, had he not, would not he have been universally and justly held responsible?

I have now (said Mr. C.) offered all the remarks I intended in reference to the deposite question; and, on reviewing the whole ground, I must say that the Secretary, in removing the deposits, has clearly transcended his power; that he has violated the contract between the bank and the United States; that, in so doing, he has deeply injured that large and respectable portion of our citizens who have been invited, on the faith of the Government, to invest their property in the institution; while, at the same time, he has deeply injured the public, in its character of stockholder; and, finally, that he has inflicted a deep wound on the public faith. To this last I attribute the present embarrassment in the currency, which has so injuriously affected all the great interests of the country. The currency of the country is the credit of the country; credit in every shape, public and private; credit, not only in the shape of paper, but that of faith and confidence between man and man; through the agency of which, in all its forms, the great and mighty exchanges of this commercial country, at home and abroad, are effected. To inflict a wound any where, particularly on the public faith, is to embarrass all the channels of currency and exchange; and it is to this, and not to the withdrawing the few millions of dollars from circulation, that I attribute the present moneyed embarrassment. Did I believe to the contrary—if I thought that any great and permanent distress would of itself result from winding up in a regular and legal manner the present or any other bank of the United States, I would deem it an evidence of the dangerous power of the institution, and, to that extent, an argument against its existence; but, as it is, I regard the present embarrassment not as an argument against the bank, but as an argument against the lawless and wanton exercise of power on the part of the Executive—an embarrassment which is likely to continue long, if the deposits be not restored. The banks which have received them, at the expense of the public faith, and in violation of law, will never be permitted to enjoy their spoils in quiet. No one, who regards the subject in the light in which I do, can ever give his sanction to any law intended to protect or carry through the present illegal arrangement. On the contrary, all such must feel bound to wage perpetual war against a usurpation of power so flagrant as that which controls the present deposits of the public money. If I stand alone, (said Mr. C.,) I, at least, will continue to maintain the contest, so long as I remain in public life.

Important (said Mr. C.) as I consider the question of the deposits, in all its bearings, public and private, it is one on the surface—a mere pretext to another, and one greatly more important, which lies beneath, and which must be taken into consideration, to understand correctly all the circumstances attending this extraordinary transaction. It is felt and acknowledged on all sides that there is another and a deeper question, which has excited the profound sensation and alarm which pervades the country.

If we are to believe what we hear from the advocates of the administration, we would believe, at one time, that the real question was, bank or no bank; at another, that the question was between the United States Bank and the State banks; and, finally, that it was a struggle, on the part of the administration, to guard and defend the rights of the States against the encroachments of the Federal Government. The administration the guardians and defenders of the rights of the States! What shall I call it—audacity or hypocrisy? The authors of the proclamation the guardians and defenders of the rights of the States! The authors of the war message against a member of this confederacy—the authors of the “bloody bill”—the guardians and defenders of the rights of the States! This a struggle for State rights! No, sir, State rights are no more. The struggle is over for the present. The bill of the last session, which vested in the Government the right of judging of the extent of its powers finally and conclusively, and gave it the right of enforcing its judgments by the sword, destroyed all distinction between delegated and reserved rights; concentrated in the Government the entire power of the system; and prostrated the States, as poor and helpless corporations, at the foot of this sovereignty.

Nor is it more true that the real question is, bank or no bank. Taking the deposit question in the broadest sense, suppose, as it is contended by the friends of the administration, that it involves the question of the renewal of the charter, and consequently the existence of the bank itself; still the banking system would stand almost untouched and unimpaired. Four hundred banks would still remain scattered over this wide republic, and, on the ruins of the United States Bank, many would rise to be added to the present list. Under this aspect of the subject, the only possible question that could be presented for consideration would be, whether the banking system was more safe, more beneficial, or more constitutional, with or without the United States Bank?

If (said Mr. C.) this was a question of bank or no bank; if it involved the existence of the banking system, it would indeed be a great question—one of the first magnitude; and, with my present impression, long entertained, and daily increasing, I would hesitate, long hesitate, before I would be found under the banner of the system. I have great doubts (if doubts they may be called) as to the soundness and tendency of the whole system, in all its modifications. I have great fears that it will be found hostile to liberty and the advance of civilization—fatally hostile to liberty in our country, where the system exists in its worst and most dangerous form. Of all institutions affecting the great question of the distribution of wealth—a question least explored, and the most important of any in the whole range of political economy—the banking institution has, if not the greatest, among the greatest, and, I fear, most pernicious, influence on the mode of distribution. Were the question really before us, I would not shun the responsibility, great as it might be, of freely and fully offering my sentiments on these deeply important points; but, as it is, I must content myself with the few remarks which I have thrown out.

What, then, is the real question which now agitates the country? I answer, it is a struggle between the executive and legislative departments of the Government; a struggle, not in relation to the existence of the bank, but which, Congress or the President, should have the power to create a bank, and the consequent control over the currency of the country. This is the real question. Let us not deceive ourselves. This league, this association of banks, created by the Executive, bound together by its influence, united in common articles of association, vivified and sustained by receiving the deposits of the public money, and having their notes converted, by being received every where by the treasury, into the common currency of the country, is, to all intents and purposes, a Bank of the United States, the Executive Bank of the United States, as distinguished from that of Congress.

However it might fail to perform satisfactorily the useful functions of the Bank of the United States as incorporated by law, it would outstrip it, far outstrip it, in all its dangerous qualities, in extending the power, the influence, and the corruption of the Government. It was impossible to conceive any institution more admirably calculated to advance these objects. Not only the selected banks, but the whole banking institutions of the country, and with them the entire money power, for the purpose of speculation, speculation, and corruption, would be placed under the control of the Executive. A system of menaces and promises will be established; of menace to the banks in possession of the deposits, but which might not be entirely subservient to executive views; and of promise of future favors to those who may not as yet enjoy its favors. Between the two, the banks would be left without influence, honor, or honesty; and a system of speculation and stock-jobbing would commence, unequalled in the annals of our country. I fear they have already commenced; I fear that the means which have been put into the hands of the minions of power, by the removal of the deposits, and placing them in the vaults of dependent banks, have extended their cupidity to the public lands, particularly in the southwest; and that to this we must attribute the recent phenomena in that quarter—immense and valuable tracts of land sold at short notice, sales fraudulently postponed to aid the speculators, with which, if I am not misinformed, a name not unknown to this body (Gwin) has performed a prominent part. But I leave this to my vigilant and able friend from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDREXTEN,] at the head of the Committee on Public Lands, who, I doubt not, will see justice done to the public. As to stock-jobbing, this new arrangement will open a field which Rothschild himself may envy. It has been found hard work—very hard, no doubt—by the jobbers in stock, who have been engaged in attempts to raise or depress the price of United States Bank stock; but no work will be more easy than to raise or depress the price of the stock of the selected banks, at the pleasure of the Executive. Nothing more will be required than to give or withhold deposits; to draw, or abstain from drawing, warrants; to pamper them at one time, and starve them at another. Those who would be in the secret, and who would know when to buy and when to sell, would have the means of realizing, by dealing in the stocks, whatever fortunes they might please.

So long as the question is one between a Bank of the United States incorporated by Congress, and that system of banks which has been created by the will of the Executive, it is an insult to the understanding to discourse on the pernicious tendency and unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States. To bring up that question fairly and legitimately, you must go one step farther—you must divorce the Government and the banking system. You must refuse all connexion with banks; you must neither receive nor pay away bank notes; you must go back to the old system of the strong box, and of gold and silver. If you have a right to receive bank notes at all, to treat them as money, by receiving them in your dues, or paying them away to creditors, you have a right to create a bank. Whatever the Government receives and treats as money, is money; and, if it be money, then they have the right, under the constitution, to regulate it. Nay, they are bound, by a high obligation, to adopt the most efficient means, according to the nature of that which they have recognised as money, to give to it the utmost stability and uniformity of value; and, if it be in the shape of bank notes, the most efficient means of giving those qualities is a Bank of the United States, incorporated by Congress. Unless you give the highest practical uniformity to the value of bank notes, so long as you receive them in your dues, and treat them as money, you violate that provision of the constitution which provides that taxation shall be uniform throughout the United States. There is no other alternative. I repeat, you must divorce the Government entirely from the banking system, or, if not, you are bound to incorporate a bank, as the only safe and efficient means of giving stability and uniformity to the currency. And, should the deposits not be restored, and the present illegal and unconstitutional connexion between the Executive and the league of banks continue, I shall feel it my duty, if no one else moves, to introduce a measure to prohibit Government from receiving or touching bank notes in any shape whatever, as the only means left of giving safety and stability to the currency, and saving the country from corruption and ruin.

Viewing the question in its true light, as a struggle on the part of the Executive to seize on the power of Congress, and to unite in the President the power of the sword and the purse, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] said truly, and, let me add, philosophically, that we are in the midst of a revolution. Yes, the very existence of free Governments rests on the proper distribution and organization of power; and, to destroy this distribution, and thereby concentrate power in any one of the departments, is to effect a revolution. But while I agree with the Senator that we are in the midst of a revolution, I cannot agree with him as to the time at which it commenced, or the point to which it has progressed. Looking to the distribution of the powers of the General Government, into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and confining his views to the encroachment of the executive upon the legislative, he dates the commencement of the revolution but sixty days previous to the meeting of the present Congress. I (said Mr. C.) take a wider range, and date it from an earlier period. Besides the distribution among the departments of the General Government, there belongs to our system another, and a far more important division or distribution of power—that between the States and the General Government, the reserved and delegated rights, the maintenance of which is still more essential to the preservation of our institutions. Taking this wide review of our political system, the revolution, in the midst of which we are, began, not as supposed by the Senator from Kentucky, shortly before the commencement of the present session, but many years ago, with the commencement of the restrictive system, and terminated its first stage with the passage of the force bill of the last session, which absorbed all the rights and sovereignty of the States, and consolidated them in this Government. Whilst this process was going on, of absorbing the reserved powers of the States, on the part of the General Government, another commenced, of concentrating in the executive the powers of the other two—the legislative and judicial departments of the Government; which constitutes the second stage of the revolution, in which we have advanced almost to the termination.

The Senator from Kentucky, in connexion with this part of his argument, read a striking passage from one of the most pleasing and instructive writers in any language, [Plutarch,] the description of Cæsar forcing himself, sword in hand, into the treasury of the Roman commonwealth. We are at the same stage of our political revolution, and the analogy between the two cases is complete, varied only by the character of the actors and the circumstances of the times. That was a case of an intrepid and bold warrior, as an open plunderer, seizing forcibly the treasury of the country, which, in that republic, as well as ours, was confided to the custody of the legislative department of the Government. The actors in our case are of a different character—artful, cunning, and corrupt politicians, and not fearless warriors. They have entered the treasury, not sword in hand, as public plunderers, but, with the false keys of sophistry, as pilferers, under the silence of midnight. The motive and the object are the same, varied in like manner by circumstances and character. "With money I will get men, and with men money," was the maxim of the Roman plunderer. With money we will get partisans, with partisans votes, and with votes money, is the maxim of our public pilferers. With men and money Cæsar struck down Roman liberty, at the fatal battle of Phillippi, never to rise again; from which disastrous hour all the powers of the Roman republic were consolidated in the person of Cæsar, and perpetuated in his line. With money and corrupt partisans a great effort is now making to choke and stifle the voice of American liberty, through all its natural organs; by corrupting the press; by overawing the other departments; and, finally, by setting up a new and polluted organ, composed of office-holders and corrupt partisans, under the name of a national convention, which, counterfeiting the voice of the people, will, if not resisted, in their name dictate the succession; when the deed will be done, the revolution be completed, and all the powers of our republic, in like manner, be consolidated in the President, and perpetuated by his dictation.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] anticipates with confidence that the small party, who were denounced at the last session as traitors and disunionists, will be found, on this trying occasion, standing in the front rank, and manfully resisting the advance of despotic power. I (said Mr. C.) heard the anticipation with pleasure, not on account of the compliment which it implied, but the evidence which it affords that the cloud which has been so industriously thrown over the character and motive of that small but patriotic party begins to be dissipated. The Senator hazarded nothing in the prediction. That party is the determined, the fixed, and sworn enemy to usurpation, come from what quarter and under what form it may—whether from the Executive upon the other departments of this Government, or from this Government on the sovereignty and rights of the States. The resolution and fortitude with which it maintained its position at the last session, under so many difficulties and dangers, in defence of the States against the encroachments of the General Government, furnished evidence not to be mistaken, that that party, in the present momentous struggle, would be found arrayed in defence of the rights of Congress against the encroachments of the President. And let me tell the Senator from Kentucky, (said Mr. C.) that, if the present struggle against executive usurpation be successful, it will be owing to the success with which we, the nullifiers—I am not afraid of the word—maintained the rights of the States against the encroachment of the General Government at the last session.

A very few words will place this point beyond controversy. To the interposition of the State of South Carolina we are indebted for the adjustment of the tariff question; without it, all the influence of the Senator from Kentucky over the manufacturing interest, great as it deservedly is, would have been wholly incompetent, if he had even thought proper to exert it, to adjust the question. The attempt would have prostrated him, and those who acted with him, and not the system. It was the separate action of the State that gave him the place to stand upon, created the necessity for the adjustment, and disposed the minds of all to compromise.

Now, I put the solemn question to all who hear me: if the tariff had not then been adjusted—if it was now an open question—what hope of successful resistance against the usurpations of the Executive, on the part of this or any other branch of the Government, could be entertained? Let it not be said that this is the result of accident—of an unforeseen contingency. It was clearly perceived, and openly stated, that no successful resistance could be made to the corruption and encroachments of the Executive, while the tariff question remained open, while it separated the North from the South, and wasted the energy of the honest and patriotic portions of the community against each other, the joint effort of which is indispensably necessary to expel those from authority who are converting the entire powers of Government into a corrupt electioneering machine; and that, without separate State interposition, the adjustment was impossible. The truth of this position rests not upon the accidental state of things, but on a profound principle growing out of the nature of government, and party struggles in a free State. History and reflection teach us, that when great interests come into conflict, and the passions and the prejudices of men are roused, such struggles can never be composed by the influence of any individuals, however great; and if there be not somewhere in the system some high constitutional power to arrest their progress, and compel the parties to adjust the difference, they go on till the State falls by corruption or violence.

I will (said Mr. C.) venture to add to these remarks another, in connexion with the point under consideration, not less true. We are not only indebted to the cause which I have stated for our present strength in this body against the present usurpation of the Executive, but if the adjustment of the tariff had stood alone, as it ought to have done, without the odious bill which accompanied it—if those who led in the compromise had joined the State rights party in their resistance to that unconstitutional measure, and thrown the responsibility on its real authors, the administration, their party would have been so prostrated throughout the entire South, and their power, in consequence, so reduced, that they would not have dared to attempt the present measure; or, if they had, they would have been broken and defeated.

Were I (said Mr. C.) to select the case best calculated to illustrate the necessity of resisting usurpation at the very commencement, and to prove how difficult it is to resist it in any subsequent stage, if not met at first, I would select this very case. What (he asked) is the cause of the present usurpation of power on the part of the Executive? What the motive—the temptation—which has induced them to seize on the deposits? What, but the large surplus revenue—the eight or ten millions in the public treasury beyond the wants of the Government? And what has put so large an amount of money in the treasury when not needed? I answer, the protective system; that system which graduated duties, not in reference to the wants of the Government, but in reference to the importunities and demands of the manufacturers, and which poured millions of dollars into the treasury, beyond the most profuse demands and even the extravagance of the Government; taken—unlawfully taken—from the pockets of those who honestly made it. I hold that those who make are entitled to what they make against all the world, except the Government; and against it, except to the extent of its legitimate and constitutional wants; and that, for the Government to take one cent more is robbery. In violation of this sacred principle, Congress first removed the deposits into the public treasury from the pockets of those who made them, where they were rightfully placed by all laws, human and divine. The Executive, in his turn, following the example, has taken them from that depository, and distributed them among favorite and partisan banks. The means used have been the same in both cases.

The constitution gives to Congress the power to lay duties with a view to revenue. This power, without regarding the object for which it was intended, forgetting that it was a great trust power, necessarily limited, by the very nature of such powers, to the subject and the object of the trust, was perverted to a use never intended—that of protecting the industry of one portion of the country at the expense of another; and, under this false interpretation, the money was transferred from its natural and just depository, the pockets of those who made it, into the public treasury, as I have stated. In this, too, the Executive followed the example of Congress.

By the magic construction of a few simple words—"unless otherwise ordered"—intended to confer on the Secretary of the Treasury a limited power, to give additional security to the public deposits, he has, in like manner, perverted this power, and made it the instrument, by similar sophistry, of drawing the money from the treasury, and bestowing it, as I have stated, on favorite and partisan banks. Would to God, (said Mr. C.) would to God I could reverse the whole of this nefarious operation, and terminate the controversy by returning the money to the pockets of the honest and industrious citizens, by the sweat of whose brows it was made, with whom only it can be rightfully deposited. But, as this cannot be done, I must content myself by giving a vote to return it to the public treasury, where it was ordered to be deposited by an act of the Legislature.

There is another aspect (said Mr. C.) in which this subject may be viewed. We all remember how early the question of the surplus revenue began to agitate the country. At a very early period, a Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Dickinson] presented his scheme for disposing of it by distributing it among the States. The first message of the President recommended a similar project, which was followed up by a movement on the part of the Legislature of New York, and I believe some of the other States. The public attention was aroused; the scheme scrutinized; its gross unconstitutionality and injustice, and its dangerous tendency, its tendency to absorb the power and existence of the States, were clearly perceived and denounced. The denunciation was too deep to be resisted, and the scheme was abandoned. What have we now in lieu of it? What is the present scheme but a distribution of the surplus revenue—a distribution at the sole will and pleasure of the Executive; a distribution to favorite banks, and, through them, in the shape of discounts and loans, to corrupt partisans, as the means of increasing political influence?

We have (said Mr. C.) arrived at a fearful crisis; things cannot long remain as they are. It behooves all who love their country, who have affection for their offspring, or who have any stake in our institutions, to pause and reflect. Confidence is daily withdrawing from the General Government. Alienation is hourly going on. These will necessarily create a state of things inimical to the existence of our institutions, and, if not speedily arrested, convulsions must follow, and then comes dissolution or despotism; when a thick cloud will be thrown over the cause of liberty and the future prospects of our country.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 14.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAY, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of affording temporary relief to the community from the present pecuniary embarrassment, by prolonging the payment of revenue bonds, as they fall due, the obligors paying interest and giving satisfactory security.

Mr. CLAY said that the resolution which had been just read sufficiently explained the object, without any remarks from him. It proposed to instruct the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of affording relief, in the present distressed state of the country, by renewing the revenue bonds given for the payment of duties, on satisfactory security, as they may fall due.

He was not sure that this object could be accomplished. He was not sure that the state of the treasury was not such as to require all its means as fast as they can possibly be drawn into it. If the Senate were to judge of the condition of this department by the notorious insolvency of one of the other departments, this relief could not be extended, unless that department also was disposed to act on the example set by the other to which he had referred, trampling on all law, usurping in its own hands all power, and going about the country making loans to cover its own deficiencies. If this department was in the condition of the Post Office Department, he was aware that the remedy proposed by his resolution could not be obtained, because the Government would, in that case, require all its means to sustain itself.

But, on all accounts, the subject was one worthy of public inquiry, and he hoped that, on inquiry being instituted, it would be found that the treasury could admit of the delay of a few months in the collection of the revenue bonds, so as to provide a partial relief for the present distress. With regard to the existence of that distress, no one could admit a doubt. Never had he witnessed the country in such a state of prosperity as that which it exhibited about four months ago. Every interest was then flourishing, every branch of trade was prosperous. In his own State, industry was full handed, and every agriculturist was reaping the harvest of his labor. This was not only true as to his own State, but it was true of all parts of the Union. All our interests were advancing, and every branch of American industry was in a condition of prosperity.

What was now the condition of the country? What object, what production of our industry, had not experienced a fall? Wheat, as he had seen by a letter from Pennsylvania, the great staple of that State, had declined from one hundred and fifteen cents per bushel to ninety cents. Every thing was falling, every thing was going down, down; and every thing would be still lower, unless some remedy should be applied. The immediate and appropriate remedy was obvious, and related to the subject which had been for some time under discussion. He did not propose to go into this discussion again at this time. The remedy proposed by the resolutions which had been under discussion should be applied, and he had no doubt would be applied; yet even the restoration of the deposits would be itself incompetent to produce an immediate and effectual relief.

It was always much easier to pull down than to build up. When public confidence was destroyed, and public credit was put down, it was not a single act, or a single year, which would suffice for their restoration. It would require time to restore public confidence. But, if a restoration of the deposits should take place, and it should be found practicable, in the present state of the treasury, to afford the relief required by the resolution now proposed, something, and he hoped a good deal, would be done in the way of a remedy; and, from the measures which, in the progress of the session, he hoped to see carried through, he trusted to see the country again in a prosperous condition.

It would be seen, on reference to the terms of his resolution, that it proposed the only remedy which it was competent to Congress to apply. He hoped that remedy would afford relief to the whole country. One of the causes of the present depression of produce was the want of money, which had been hoarded in consequence of the pressure in the money market. If there could be afforded any relief to the mercantile classes, some alleviation of the general distress would follow. In this view of the subject, and with a hope that some relief would be given to the country, he desired the adoption of his resolution, which proposed merely an inquiry into the subject by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN said he was opposed himself to the adoption of the resolution. First, because he deemed it inexpedient for Congress to hold out to those indebted to the Government hopes of relief which might, in the end, prove delusive; and, secondly, because experience had shown that when the Government once commences to give relief to such persons, they invariably look for a continuance of its favors. It was on these grounds he was opposed to the adoption of the resolution. It was true, Mr. B. admitted, that distress, to some extent, existed in the country, but he could not believe that it existed to the extent represented by gentlemen on this floor; he believed that the pressure on the money market had been greatly exaggerated, and that gentlemen had drawn largely on their imaginations in describing it. The great Southern staple of cotton had been spoken of in the course of the debate, and we have been told (said he) that its price had fallen to a ruinous extent. This might be true; but could the pecuniary distresses in this country have reduced the prices of cotton in Liverpool? Could they have affected the markets in Europe? Let us (he continued) institute a comparison between the prices of cotton now, and last year, in the European market. We shall find, sir, on such comparison, that the price of cotton is higher now than then; and that with the prices of tobacco it is the same.

The causes of the present distresses in the country, Mr. B. said, were connected with another great subject: he alluded to the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States; and on this he would only remark, that, if the institution to which he referred possessed such influence as to produce the calamities so loudly complained of, it was time for Congress to pause, and consider whether its charter can be safely renewed. If (he continued) this institution possessed such an alarming power, far greater than those of the Government, influencing the agriculture, the commerce, and the industry of the country, it was time for Congress to pause, and consider whether it could, or ought, to be sustained. If any remedy was to be applied to relieve the distresses of the country, it was time, he thought, to take away the great cause which had produced them, or to deprive it of the power of doing further injuries. Sir, we have heard the distresses of the country ascribed to the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States; we have heard the diminution of the price of cotton ascribed to the same cause; and, if any natural phenomena were to occur, he should not be surprised to hear the same reasons given for them. For his part, he could not possibly believe that the distresses at present existing in the country were to be ascribed to any such cause. The labor, the strength, and the resources of the country were far above any such secondary influence. Mr. B. concluded by saying, that while he believed the pecuniary pressure complained of had been greatly exaggerated, he admitted that it existed to a certain extent; though he was opposed to, and would vote against the resolution, because its adoption could not, in his opinion, produce any practical result.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting, "That the Committee on Finance inquire into the extent and causes of the alleged distresses of the community, and into the propriety of legislative interference to relieve them."

Mr. CLAY wished to propose a compromise to the gentleman from Georgia. The proposition of that gentleman was acceptable to him as an amendment, as an addition, but not as a substitute for the resolution. His reason for preferring that course was this: that he did not know—unless the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORTNELL] could find it under the clause of general welfare—he did not know how Congress could apply so general a remedy to the distresses admitted to exist in the country; unless the gentleman's object was to go under the broad banner of the "general welfare," he did not know what measures Congress could constitutionally adopt to relieve the general distress of the different classes of the community, the nature of the relief the gentleman contemplated, and the power under which he would extend it. I cannot, therefore, (said Mr. C.) go along with him. But Mr. C. had no objection that the attention of the committee should be directed to the alleviation of the present distress, and afford a specific relief. Congress had the power of prolonging the payment of the revenue bonds; and further, he, (Mr. C.) for one, was ready to afford any constitutional relief to other classes of the community that might be suggested. There was nothing due from the purchasers of the public lands, or they might avail themselves of the means derived from that source to relieve the public from their present distress. In fact, he did not know of any other constitutional relief that could be given, but by the one stated in the resolution. Still he had no objection that the gentleman should make an inquiry into the whole subject, retaining, however, the specific object of the resolution.

Mr. SHEPLEY said that he should feel himself bound to vote against the amendment and the original resolution, and hoped he might be permitted to say why he should do so. He remarked that no complaint had yet been made to Congress from the commercial community, or any other class, in relation to the distress which was at present alleged to exist. No petitions had been sent to Congress complaining of the distress, if distress there was. It would be time enough to take measures to relieve the wants of the public, when they should petition on the subject. He did not believe that there was any distress existing; it was all imaginary; it was a distress which did not make itself known or heard, save in chambers of commerce, and among those who had an interest in banking operations, and that class whose interests and feelings were controlled by the action of the bank. He would say that, so far from there being any distress in the State which he had the honor to represent, the leading newspaper in its principal city, and which had advocated the views of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] had stated the State to be in a flourishing condition, from the great sales of the wild lands, which had taken place recently, at a very advanced price.

He would wait until the intelligent classes of merchants and agriculturists of the country should petition for relief from the distress which was said to prevail, before he undertook to assume that there was distress, and to legislate on the subject.

Mr. SILSBEE said he should not have said a word, but he could not sit still, and hear what had fallen from the gentleman from Maine, without making one or two remarks. The gentleman had told the Senate of the rise in the price of the wild lands in Maine. All who had any information on the subject knew the reason of this rise. Great speculations had just been made in those lands, and they had been purchased at high prices, because there was a great demand for the wood which was on them, and the object of the purchasers was to bring the timber into the market. The gentleman had said that property had not fallen in value. He (Mr. S.) wished that he could bear testimony to this fact. But he knew and felt the contrary. He felt that property had fallen in value. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted, and that the object which it contemplates would be accomplished. Letters had reached him, which described, in gloomy terms, the distress which had ensued from the condition of the money market. There was such a demand for money that it could not be met. The banks, and the individual lenders of money generally, had, for the last three months, granted indulgence to their debtors. He knew that this had been done to a great extent, and that it had prevented many failures. But, when a merchant owed revenue bonds, he found himself in the gripe of a merciless creditor; and, unless he immediately paid the debt, legal process was at once resorted to. Thus, a man who was worth $100,000 was subjected, perhaps, to harassing and expensive process, because he might not be able to raise $10,000 in cash, a sum which, in the depreciated state of the market, it might be found impossible to obtain in a moment. If the same indulgence were granted by the custom-houses as had been given by the banks and money-lenders, it would prevent a great many individual failures; and he thought it was the duty of Congress to be at least as indulgent as were the banks and money-lenders. There was a loud call for relief throughout the country, and he hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. PRESTON observed that he had one fact to which he wished to call the attention of the Senate. He had, two days since, received a letter, dated Columbia, South Carolina, one of the largest cotton markets in the State, from a gentleman, one of the most extensive planters in the State, a director of the bank, and an intelligent and vigilant man. This gentleman stated to him that the effect of certain recent public measures had brought down the price of cotton so low that it could not be brought within three to five cents of what the Liverpool prices authorized; and that such was the pressure on the money market, that it was impossible for the merchants to obtain facilities wherewith to make purchases of the great staple of the State. Columbia (said Mr. P.) was in the interior of South Carolina; there had not been three banks in it for the last twenty years, and yet the money market was so low there as fully to rebut the argument of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SHEPLEY.] That gentleman contended that the only clamor about pecuniary distresses arose from banking houses and chambers of commerce; and adduced, as a proof, that the waste lands of Maine had highly appreciated in value. He begged leave to ask what were banking houses and chambers of commerce? Chambers of commerce, he said, represented the commerce of the country, and banking houses its finances; and these banking houses extended from one end of the country to the other. The gentleman from North Carolina says that the Bank of the United States is the great cause which has produced the present distresses in the country, for political effect. But the gentleman should look to the great power which has wrested the resources of this institution from their legitimate purposes. He was not then advocating the bank, but he denied that the bank had, in any degree, been the cause of the evils complained of. It was the Executive, who, in the exercise of high-handed power, had curtailed its usefulness.

With the resources of his own section of the country he (Mr. P.) was well acquainted, and he knew that a peculiar species of property had depreciated in value to an alarming extent. He well recollected the state of prosperity, to which the Senator from Kentucky alluded as having existed in his own State some few months since, was realized at that period in South Carolina; but the reaction there had been greater, if possible, than in any other section of the country. Purchases were made in a state of ease and security, which the people fondly hoped would continue; for they did not believe that the constituted authorities would interfere with the financial concerns of the country, in such manner as to produce the severe pressure now felt in the money market. The species of property to which he referred had fallen twenty-five per cent. There was another species of property which, by the action of the Government, had been depreciated to a calamitous extent. He meant bank capital. The State of South Carolina held a greater amount of stock in the Bank of the United States, in proportion to her population, than any other State in the Union. She owned five millions of that stock, one-fifth of which had been struck down at one fell swoop. The State of South Carolina had lost, by this one act of the Executive, one million of dollars, and they are losing daily from three to five cents per pound on their cotton. The gentleman from Alabama spoke of the prices of cotton in Liverpool. Sir, there is a want of purchasers here. In consequence of the want of money, the exchange is struck down; and it was well known that cotton was often purchased and shipped for the sake of the exchange. In this state of things, Mr. P. heartily concurred with the gentlemen from Kentucky and Georgia, in wishing a reference of the matter to some committee, and a full examination into the subject, for the purpose of affording such relief as could be constitutionally extended.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he had not the slightest objection to agree to any compromise which was fair on both sides. But he did not see that any compromise was necessary in this case. The general proposition of inquiry would, of course, include the specific inquiry proposed by the Senator from Kentucky; and the necessity, therefore, for the specific inquiry was done away. All which the Senator from Kentucky wanted was, that the specific mode of granting relief to the merchants, which he proposed, should be before the Committee on Finance; and it would be before that committee. He had no desire to look into the constitution of the committee, to see what would be their course. If the gentleman from Kentucky had not been able to satisfy himself on this point, he might append to his resolution an instruction to the committee. He believed that some distress existed; but to say that the distress was very great was an exaggeration. That distress which existed he believed to be of a temporary character, and such as would soon be removed. That this distress had not arisen from the removal of the deposits, he had from the highest authority, one of the ablest and most eloquent advocates of the bank in the other House, who had stated that the mere removal of nine millions of dollars from the bank could not have produced much distress. Whence, then, did the distress arise? It arose from the conduct of the institution itself. These deposits having been removed, the bank stood still to see what were the consequences which would follow the removal. The consequence would be, that the bank would have to wind up its concerns; and, when it did this, the operation would be felt in every fibre of the country; and every individual, so far as his interests were concerned, would be made to feel the necessity of that great institution. As to the policy, the wisdom, or the virtue of that course, he would leave the public to decide. Here was a frank and just exposition from one who was well acquainted with the fact. He (Mr. F.) believed that when this question was decided, the United States Bank would find it necessary to do its duty to the public, and then the distress would pass away.

Mr. CLAY expressed regret that his compromise had not been accepted. If it had been, the gentleman from Georgia would have obtained all the objects of his amendment, as the whole subject of the distress of the country would be before the committee. Had the gentleman from Georgia indicated any other mode of relief than the extension of the time for the payment of the revenue bonds? If he had proposed any other, what was it? On the subject of affording relief to importing merchants, he (Mr. C.) had only followed the example of the Executive. The Secretary had said to the league banks that they were to give as much accommodation to the importers as could conveniently be granted. That was the proposition of the Executive. The resolution which he (Mr. C.) had offered was to afford relief to the same class, by prolonging the time for the payment. Since the gentleman from Georgia declined to agree to his proposition, he should be compelled to vote against the amendment, because its adoption might lead to an impression in the committee that they were not authorized to go into the consideration of the specific remedy which he had indicated in his resolution. Should the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia be rejected, he (Mr. C.) would propose it in the form he had suggested.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that as it was agreed on all hands that distress existed, it was, perhaps, of minor importance in what particular form the question concerning relief was presented to the committee; and he should not have risen, had it not been for what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia on the subject of what had been said by a distinguished gentleman in the other House. Having been present in the other House when that gentleman spoke on the subject, he must beg leave to say that he differed entirely in his version of that gentleman's language, which deserved all the eulogium which could be passed upon it. The gentleman from Georgia stated that the gentleman in the other House had expressed a belief that the public distress did not proceed from any act of the Executive Government.

Mr. FORSYTH explained. He had not the pleasure to hear the gentleman in the other branch; but he had understood him to have said that the removal of the deposits was not the cause of the present distress.

Mr. SPRAGUE resumed. That did not meet the object at all. The question was, whether the public distress was owing to any act of the Executive? Now, the gentleman from Georgia had taken a few words from the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and, separating them from the rest of the remarks, had exclaimed that the gentleman had declared it was not the removal of the deposits which had caused the public distress. It was said by that gentleman that not the fact of the removal, so much as the manner in which it had been done, had been the cause of the distress. If the gentleman from Georgia had any meaning in taking these detached words, it must have been to make the impression in the Senate and elsewhere that it was the opinion of the gentleman from Philadelphia that the removal of the public deposits did not produce the distress which prevailed. He (Mr. S.) said that the gentleman had stated that it was the manner in which the deposits had been removed; it was those contingent checks which were held in terrorem over the bank—checks to be presented in a certain contingency, which was kept in profound secrecy—checks in the hands of an enemy of the bank, to be presented at the will of that enemy! Thus was the United States Bank to be drawn upon at the will of the other banks, who were armed by the Executive with these checks, to be used in a contingency which was kept in the dark, which was unknown, and which, therefore, rendered it necessary for the bank to arm itself in defence against these unseen and desperate attacks. That was the purport of what he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say, and he presumed that the gentleman from Georgia would admit its correctness. He did not deem it of any great importance in which form the subject was sent to the committee; but, when a quotation was made by the gentleman from Georgia from a speech, which it appears that the gentleman had not heard, he had thought it his duty to rise and make this explanation.

Mr. BENTON rose to inquire whether the importing merchants had sent in any application to obtain an extension of credit on their bonds. This ought first to be ascertained, before any legislation was had on the subject. No such application, then, (Mr. B. continued,) had been made; and he had only to say that, until a memorial from the importers to that effect arrives, he would consider it not only a work of supererogation, but casting a reflection on the merchants, which, as a body, they must sensibly feel, to legislate at all on the subject. Having said this much, he would only add, that if any memorials should be received from the importing merchants, asking an extension of credit on their bonds, they should receive from him not only a prompt but favorable consideration. In the present aspect of the case, he should vote both against the resolution and any modification or amendment of it.

Mr. CHAMBERS thought the proposition of the Senator from Georgia was an exceedingly proper one; for he did not think that any question could be presented to the Senate producing such variety and difference of opinion. When honorable Senators rose in their seats, and contended that no pecuniary distress existed in the country, in spite of the melancholy experience they had before them, he thought that nothing could be more proper than that a full investigation should be had by the competent committee to ascertain if such distresses existed, and to point out the mode of relieving them. He could only, for himself, speak of the portion of the country he represented; the cotton-growing country he would leave to others better acquainted with it. He would speak only of the staple of his own State; and would to God the Senator from North Carolina could say of it that it commanded better prices now than last year. There was not a man in his State who had not to lose twenty cents per bushel on his wheat—not a man who had not to lose from six, ten, to twelve cents per bushel on his corn, in consequence of the outrage on the rights of an institution solemnly secured by law. Yet, sir, notwithstanding all this, we are taunted with the remark that our distresses are exaggerated, and that, unless we present a memorial to Congress, we must not expect relief. How was the agricultural interest to memorialize Congress? Merchants can memorialize through their chambers of commerce, banks through their directors; but not so with the farmers. Their interests were always neglected, and they found it peculiarly so now. They were not only neglected, but were met with the remark that their complaints were imaginary. Mr. C. would be gratified if the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia was adopted. An inquiry would establish the fact whether distress did or did not exist in the country, and would result in recommending some practical mode of relief, if it should be found necessary.

Mr. BROWN said, that it appeared to him that the course which was taken by gentlemen on this floor was admirably calculated to produce the precise state of things which they declared to be already existing in the country. In a former debate, the subject of the currency formed the favorite topic, and from that string melancholy sounds had been struck, for the purpose of operating on the mercantile body. Yesterday, another key had been touched, and played upon with great skill. The manufacturing interests were then to be acted on, and censures were heaped on the Secretary for the imputed intention to ruin that great portion of our industry. Now, the Senate were told that the agriculturists and the landholders were prostrated. He could not but admire the adroitness with which these national interests were, in their turn, played upon—he hoped not intentionally—for the purpose of producing the very effect which it was said had been already produced by the action of the Executive. He hoped that it was accidental that there had been this unison; that it was not intended to have any hostile bearing against the present administration, but that it was purely, purely accidental.

The Senator from South Carolina had informed the Senate that, by the seizure of power by the Executive, the great staple of the Southern States had been depreciated in value, and that there now existed a difference of from three to five cents per pound between the prices at Liverpool and the prices in South Carolina. If such were the fact, he could assure the gentleman that this inequality in the price would be only temporary in its duration. There was no law of nature more uniform and unchangeable than that which regulated the course of capital. Capital, ever eagle-eyed, would soon discover where its presence was necessary, and would flow from Liverpool to the aid of South Carolina. If such a difference in price existed, South Carolina would soon be relieved by the flow of capital from England. The eagle eye of the capitalist would soon discern where his money could find profitable investment, and he would resort thither, unless, indeed, the bank, that mischievous agent, should have the power even to frustrate this hope, by cutting off all intercourse, and changing the uniform order of things.

The gentleman from South Carolina had said that another species of the property of the South had depreciated. It was true that this description of property was not now so high as it was a short time since. But this argument proved too much. The price of that kind of property was lower when the deposits were in the United States Bank than at this time. He could speak of the value of real property in the section of the State from which he came. It was twenty per cent. higher than at this time last year. The tobacco planter was never better rewarded for his labor than he was at this time. That staple was selling as well now, and industry was better recompensed, than it had ever been within his knowledge. The gentleman from Maryland had said that the distress which prevailed throughout the country was real. He granted that it was real to a certain extent, but not to the extent which had been stated on this floor. The gloomy pictures of public distress which had been presented here were, for the most part, imaginary. There are no prophecies so true as those which the prophets themselves have the power of making so. There was great declamation here on the subject of public distress; and the newspapers published to the world speeches which were filled with that topic. By such means a great panic had been got up. This panic had been effectual in locking up capital, and thus the power had been given to the United States Bank to produce that very result which its friends had predicted.

The Senate had been told that the seizure of the deposits had produced the existing distress; that the United States Bank was the safest depository of the public money; that it was the richest establishment in the country; that it had ten millions locked up in its coffers. It was thus admitted that the bank had the ability to relieve the public distress, but it had not the will to grant this relief. He believed, however, that the amount of public distress had been greatly exaggerated. He had received information from commercial men that there were not more failures than usual. Men would fail every year. The editors of public newspapers might write exciting articles on the subject, and splendid declamations might be made on this floor; but the various interests of the country would go on flourishing. Gentlemen might present pictures of distress; but, in defiance of all these, the country would retain its erect position, and would keep steadily onwards to the certain fulfilment of its high destiny.

Mr. KING observed that no subject had of late been brought forward by the Senator from Kentucky, however disconnected it might be, (although, to be sure, this was not altogether unconnected with the removal of the deposits,) that had not been made to bear upon that subject. Now, with regard to the removal of the deposits, he (Mr. K.) should not, on this occasion, discuss whether it had produced the distress which was represented to exist. He was perfectly willing that an inquiry should be gone into in relation to it; but he had merely risen to call the attention of the Senate to the statements which had been made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] on the subject. He (Mr. K.) could not but believe that the gentleman was mistaken in attributing a pressure in the price of Southern staples to have been, in the slightest degree, occasioned by the removal of the deposits. He would go to the very fountain-head of this matter, as the honorable Senator himself had done, although he had brought himself to a decidedly different conclusion. If he would look to the price of cotton in the Liverpool market, which, in all cases, regulated the price of the staple in this country—fluctuating according to the money or the quantity of cotton there might happen to be in the market—he would find the price here to correspond with Liverpool. The price of cotton in Liverpool averaged from 7 cents to 9 cents, and the total cost of sending the article there amounted to 4 cents; which sum, if deducted from the price of the article in Liverpool, and added to the price of it here, would be found by the gentleman to be exactly what he had stated it at.

The depreciation in the price of cotton had not arisen in consequence of the removal of the deposits, but from the fact of there having been a much more abundant crop last year than usual, upon which large speculations had taken place, and, he would have the honorable Senator bear in mind, greater than they could be now. The result of these speculations was, that the price had fallen abroad as well as at home. In conclusion, Mr. K. said he trusted this subject would be taken up and acted upon at an early period; but at present he would move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was afterwards withdrawn.

Mr. PRESTON rose to explain. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not mean to attribute the depression of the market to the removal of the deposits, but he would say that the effect of the removal of the deposits had been great in the community. He had stated that the relative price of cotton in South Carolina and Liverpool had been affected by these financial operations, and that the price on the whole of the Southern coast was lower than it ought to be, in proportion to the Liverpool price. He had heard, from a gentleman who had paid some attention to this matter, that, during the last three weeks, according to his calculation, founded on the price in the Liverpool cotton market, it had not varied much. It was notorious, however accounted for, that there is a great scarcity of money, and he trusted that in due time relief would be given to the distress that prevailed.

Mr. WILKINS said that he had only come into the Senate since this discussion commenced; and he now rose to give the reasons which would induce him to vote against the resolution itself, and every modification of it which should be offered. He should take this course, because he considered all these propositions as mere temporary expedients, and that it was the duty of Congress, in the present temper of the public mind, and the present condition of the country, to refrain from the adoption of expedients which were only temporary and fallacious in their character. A responsibility devolved on Congress to carry the administration through in their act of removing the deposits, or to adopt an order that the deposits be restored. With this feeling, he was opposed to all expedients. If they turned to the various documents before them, to the memorials from the board of trade and the chamber of commerce of Philadelphia, they would see that none of these applications pointed to the course which was now suggested. It was true that they ascribed the public distress to the removal of the deposits, and took the strong position—but, in his opinion, a fallacious one—that it was only by a restoration of the public deposits that confidence could be restored throughout the country. He believed that this distress was artificial, and that there was nothing in the world to justify it. The resolutions which had been presented by the Senator from Kentucky had the merit of presenting a fair and bold issue under the 16th section of the charter of the bank, and the decision on those resolutions would restore the country to peace. If the discussion of these resolutions should terminate in an order for the restoration of the deposits, then would the bank and its friends be satisfied. On the other hand, he had a perfect conviction that, if the Senate determined to bear the administration through, and refuse to order back the deposits, the same happy result would follow—the public mind would be quieted, the crisis would be passed, and the course of trade and the money concerns of the country would adapt themselves to the state of things. He was anxious, therefore, to bring the discussion to a termination.

While he was up, he begged the indulgence of the Senate while he made a single explanation as to the language which had fallen from a gentleman from Pennsylvania in the other House. It seemed to have been admitted by him that the present distress had not arisen from the removal of the public deposits. It could not have arisen from that cause. The mere transfer of the money from one side of Chesnut street to the other, and ordering its distribution by the right hand instead of the left, could never have been productive of distress and great national calamity. It had been stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SEABURY,] that the gentleman from Philadelphia went on to say that it was not so much the removal of the deposits that had produced this state of things, as the manner in which it had been done—the stealth and secrecy which shrouded the act. He had reference, it seemed, to the transfer drafts; to the manner in which they had been issued; the secrecy which accompanied them rendering the transaction disingenuous and menacing in its character. These transfer drafts, in the whole, amounted to only two or three millions. And was it possible that the mere matter of drafts to that amount being issued could have produced so much distress? Did gentlemen speak of the secrecy with which these drafts were issued? So much the worse for their argument. The fact of these drafts being issued was known to the bank a month before the payment of them was demanded. Every gentleman knew that there was an office in this city for the purpose of recording these treasury drafts. For what was that office created, but that drafts of this kind should be placed on record immediately on their being issued? These drafts had passed through all the official forms, and could have been seen at any time on record, after they had been issued. It had been acknowledged, in the correspondence between the bank and the Treasurer, that their existence was known at the bank long before they were offered there for payment. The only secrecy which existed was as to the contingency in which they were to be paid. So much the better was this for the bank. The holders of the drafts were directed not to present them unless a spirit of resentment should be exhibited on the part of the bank—unless some vindictiveness should display itself. It was, therefore, so much the better for the bank that this contingency was kept secret. So that, whether surreptitiously or openly, in daylight or by stealth, how could the issuing of these transfer drafts have had the effect of covering our happy land with gloom and despair?

He had been much in correspondence with well informed individuals in the part of the State of Pennsylvania in which he lived. The branch of the United States Bank there transacted an extensive business. There was no part of the Union in which there was greater activity. Yet he had not received a single word of complaint on the subject of distress in the money market of that city. The whole of this distress was limited to the action of the bank, and that was adopted for the purpose of coercion. The bank had not come forward, as it ought to have done, and reasoned with Congress and the people. It would not suspend its operations even for the sixty days between the removal of the deposits and the meeting of Congress. It waited not for the action of Congress. And why was it that they had refused to continue their accommodations to the public for these sixty days? On whom had they brought down calamity by this refusal? Not on General Jackson—not on you, sir, (said Mr. W.), or on me—but on their innocent neighbors around; and thus, through the offending, reaching those who had offended.

He should vote against these propositions, because he believed that they were inexpedient. This temporizing—he used the word without intending the slightest disrespect to the Senator from Kentucky—could not avail. They were called on to proceed to the final adjustment of the matter, and the people would not be satisfied with any action of Congress which should be short of such adjustment.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said, that he felt himself, coming from a section of country which was so deeply interested in the cotton culture, called on to make some remarks; but he thought that the general discussion ought not to be permitted, at this time, to proceed; and he would, therefore, prefer a postponement of this matter to another day. He should then be prepared to say something on the impediments which had been thrown in the way of the usual facilities enjoyed by the Southern planter, in consequence of the removal of the deposits. These difficulties he should show to be of a much more serious character than had yet been described, and productive of more deleterious effects. As the day was so far advanced, and to give time for some progress in the general discussion, he would move, for the present, to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEPOSITE QUESTION.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. SHEPLEY, of Maine, rose and said he desired to call to the recollection of the Senate the subject-matter under consideration. He understood it to be the removal of the deposits of the moneys of the United States from the Bank of the United States and its branches to other places; and the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for their removal, together with the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky upon that subject.

I had anticipated in this body (said Mr. S.) a calm, deliberate, and respectful consideration, both of the fact of removal, and of the reasons offered by the Secretary for the removal. It being an act authorized by a law of Congress to be done, and it having been done as authorized by the law, I had supposed the reasons assigned for doing it might have received a fair consideration. But, sir, what have we heard? A fearful array of alarm and danger, as if the removal of a few millions of unexpended moneys in your treasury would destroy a commercial and banking capital of hundreds of millions, annihilate the credit, and involve all the wealth and industry of the country in one common ruin.

But, as if this were not enough, we are alarmed with resolutions alleging assumption of arbitrary power; with proclamations that our institutions were prostrated, the "constitution gone," and a revolution consummated. And, in addition to all this, we are to be intimidated by names, and epithets, and terms of reproach, for the sacrifice of individual character, and honor, and fame. We are taunted with violations of the constitution, and of law, and of official trust; and with epithets, charging dishonesty, falsehood, concealment, and the assumption of ungranted and arbitrary power, as if tyranny and monarchy were the designed object of him whom the people have so recently elected to be the preserver and guardian of their liberties.

Sir, I mourn that this discussion could not take place without an attack upon individual and honorable character. I mourn that the Government directors of the bank should have been called "spies" and "informers." Sir, does the Senate remember that where there is an informer, it implies a crime to be informed against? Where is there an informer unless there is crime known to him, and against which he is to inform? No where, unless it is in the Bank of the United States. And, sir, is there not concealment there? And does not concealment imply an offence—a crime? And is it not because there is concealment and crime, that we hear, without any examination into the affairs of the bank, these men called informers? It does not become me to tell what their characters are; they are known, and speak for themselves. The Secretary of the Treasury, in another trust, distinguished and honorable, and without reproach even from his enemies, is also assailed. Sir, I cannot speak as I feel, without violating the rules of this body. But the Secretary needs not me to speak in his defence.

There is another private character attacked—that of the Government agent, in relation to the deposits. Sir, it was my lot to be born almost in the same neighborhood with him; to be instructed in the same class, and at the same college; a college whose sons have spread her name in light upon the records of your Capitol. Sir, I have known that agent from earliest years to ripest manhood; and I have known him always the same, always distinguished for his intellectual powers, for his singleness and purity of purpose, and for unyielding firmness in pursuing it to its accomplishment. And, sir, he was not to be won by flattery, nor corrupted by gold, nor overawed by power; and hence it is that his name is connected, as in scorn, with the kitchens of our country. In these kitchens, sir, have been instructed, and raised, and brought forward, the first and highest names in our country. The kitchens of the country are the abodes of industry and intelligence, of honor and of power; and to associate his name with them, is to associate it with honor and with power. It is under these peculiar circumstances, trying to my feelings, trying to them in all their connexions, that a sense of duty to the State which I in part represent, and to myself, calls upon me to protest against these cries of alarm, against these attacks upon private character, and against the principles upon which this course is pursued. Thus situated, and under these circumstances, if I have manifested or shall manifest more warmth and feeling than becomes me, Senators will know where to look for my apology.

Sir, the question returns, were the deposits legally and constitutionally removed?

The proof of the power to remove is found in the charter and law, which provides that the moneys shall be deposited in the bank, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise direct." We have also the statement of the Secretary that he has otherwise directed, in pursuance of that law, and for reasons which he deemed satisfactory—the President's reasons, read to the cabinet the 18th September, giving to the people the reasons which induced him some months before to urge upon the department that step, and those reasons given with a plainness, and openness, and candor, sufficient to entitle them to a respectful and fair consideration. The result is, that the removal was made by the officer appointed by the law; that he did so in accordance with an act of Congress providing for it, and agreeably to the charter of the bank authorizing it; that the reasons are given as the law provides they should be; and, finally, that all this was done with the approbation of the President, and for the best interests of the country, as they judged; and the reasons of their judgment are open to the people and to Congress to judge of their sufficiency.

But, sir, the Senator who last spoke on this question complained of the President for giving his reasons to the people, on the ground that such a procedure opened a new channel of communication unknown to and unrecognised by the constitution. Why, sir, I did not know that our constitution had closed all communication between the President and the people who elect him. I thought it was but a following out the principles of our constitution to instruct and enlighten the people as to what was done under it.

I wish the people, sir, to be instructed in relation to every thing we do. I trust every one will see that no extraordinary or dangerous power is assumed by the President giving his reasons to the community. It is true that the President, in that paper, urged upon the Secretary the propriety of the removal. But are we to be told, because one man urges another to the performance of a duty, that the other loses all freedom of action? To what purpose, then, is this debate? Is it not to convince other minds—to influence other persons? What is the value of reason here, or any where, if it may not be urged, and yet freedom of action left to the person upon whom it is urged? But, sir, the Secretary does not appear to have needed any urging. It is charged against him that he urged the Executive to that measure which he, the Secretary, afterwards fulfilled. Nor can there be any doubt as to the freedom of action on the part of the Secretary. The act of removal was performed, then, by the proper officer—legally performed, and voluntarily performed—in accordance with a preconceived opinion. But suppose it had been done as some Senators seem to imagine, in such a manner as to render it necessary for the President to remove the former Secretary, and to remove him on account (which is not admitted) of his refusal to act. Will such a circumstance have any thing to do with the present Secretary? If one Secretary refuses to perform a duty, is it any reason that his successor should refuse also? Why, sir, if our President were here at this moment, taking his trial for the removal of the previous Secretary, that event could not change the power of the present Secretary. If the President had been wrong in relation to a former Secretary, that would not render the doing of the present Secretary illegal. If an illegal act had been committed, would that make all subsequent acts illegal? Prior illegal acts do not vitiate those of a subsequent date.

But, sir, do not let it be supposed that I concede that there was any thing illegal in the removal of the former Secretary. I shall have occasion to consider that question in the course of my remarks. The plain and principal objection contained in the resolutions before the Senate is, "that the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

This is founded, sir, upon the supposition that there must have been a violation of the law—I mean enacted law. The charge is attempted to be maintained by calling to mind the organization of the Treasury Department. It is said that the treasury is organized upon a different principle from the rest of the departments. In what consists the difference? In name? A difference of name is to alter the power given by the constitution to the Executive! But even this position, based upon a difference of name, is untenable. In the next act passed by Congress, the treasury was called an executive department; and, among other officers of this executive department, was specified the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from New Jersey not only questioned the right of the Secretary to remove the deposites, but his power to place them elsewhere. He says that all the Secretary's power is derived from the act of 1789, and that his power has not been "enlarged or contracted since."

Sir, there has been a different grant of power—a grant which has invested the Secretary with a discretionary power. Strong as this assertion may appear, sir, it is a true one. It has pleased the Legislature to invest the Secretary with a discretionary power. I do not mean to enter into the consideration of the propriety of it. I take the laws as they are; and if there be blame any where, let it attach where it belongs, and not to the Secretary, that such discretionary power exists. I have alleged, sir, an alteration in the law relative to the power of the Secretary; now for the issue. I find, in an act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments, these words:

"An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments." Approved May 8, 1792.

Extract from the 6th section: "Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall superintend the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage as he shall judge best."

This act refers to him, and recognises him as the head of the department. It gives him, also, a discretionary and superintending power. It tells him that he is to superintend the collection of the revenue, "as he shall judge best." Sir, what is comprehended in the term "superintending" the collection of the revenue? We all know that it is to collect debts—to take possession of moneys; and surely we must keep those moneys when we have taken possession of them, unless we are particularly directed where to place them. If, then, a person is to collect debts, he is also to keep them, unless directed to the contrary. Again: do not the acts recognising the Secretary as the head of the department give him also the power to direct others in the performance of their duties? The head of the department stands in the same relation to those around him as the head does to the members of the natural body. And, sir, in this state of the legal power—a discretionary power to collect, and of course to preserve when collected—what becomes of the grounds of the alarm which has been raised that the Secretary has assumed legislative power? Sir, they are all assertions—mere assertions—contradicted by the fact.

The Secretary has been censured because he thought it was singular that such a power should be intrusted to him, and that Congress had not legislated and informed him in what manner and where he was to have the money kept. I do not think it necessary now to inquire why provision was not made in this respect by law. Provision was not made until the United States Bank was selected; prior to that period no place was designated by law; and when the moneys are not deposited in that bank, but are directed by the Secretary not to be deposited there, there is again no place of deposit designated by law. But, sir, it has been alleged that the Treasurer is the only person who is entitled to take charge of the public moneys. He is the proper person, but he is to keep them subject to the control of the head of the department. The latter may order him in what place to keep them. The whole argument against the Secretary has proceeded on the assumption that he has taken the deposits out of the hands of the Treasurer, and kept them himself. He has never, sir, done this. The Secretary has never touched it, never contemplated the actual keeping of the money, but only told the Treasurer where he should keep it; and now there is much alarm of his abuse of power. But there is a distinction: instead of keeping it himself, under his own supervision, he tells the Treasurer the place, and tells him to keep it there. It is not out of the power or control of the Treasurer. It is said the Treasurer is responsible; and he is so, as he always has been, precisely; there is no change, save that the Treasurer is to keep it in a different vault from what he did. But he has no money if the Secretary may take it away, says the Senator from New Jersey. Who, sir, has taken it away, or proposed to take it away? The Secretary does not take it away; he only orders the Treasurer where to keep it in his own possession, that it may be most convenient and useful to the Government. It is not in the Treasurer's power, except as keeper; the Secretary cannot take it out of his keeping; the President cannot. It all resolves itself into this simple proposition, that there is no money taken out of the treasury. It is by confounding propositions, and so plain as these, by making no distinction between taking money out of the treasury, and directing where it shall be placed in the treasury, that great misconduct is alleged, and ill language used, and imputations of base motives are cast upon the President and the Secretary, as if the money had been scooped out of the treasury, and carried off, instead of being in the Treasurer's keeping. It is only moved from one side of Chesnut street or State street to the other, being still in the treasury.

Sir, the Senator from South Carolina has argued that the Secretary claims the power to order the place of deposit, in the absence of legislation; but there is legislation; and, therefore, to take the money out of the United States Bank was an error, because he asserted there was no legislation, when there was. It is true there was legislation, that while it was in the bank it was to be kept there. But when the power of removal is used as the law provides, there is then an absence of legislation; and if the Senator meant to go further than this, he is in error. He also represents the Treasurer to have the power, and not the Secretary; but the Treasurer has no power to move or remove, but under the direction of the Secretary, as the head. He has power to keep it, but the place where is to be designated under the direction of the Secretary.

It is alleged by the Senator that the Secretary supposes Congress had the power to dispose of the moneys of the United State as the public interest and convenience might require; and that Congress, not having exercised that power, the Secretary had the power to dispose of it; and that he was in error in both his propositions: for if Congress had such power, the money might be applied to any fanatical scheme. Why, sir, Congress has the power of disposal; but it is controlled in its exercise by the proper objects of legislation; it may go so far, and no farther. If all that was meant is, that Congress had no power to spend the money for improper purposes, or upon projects not within the legitimate sphere of legislation, I agree with him; that power is neither in Congress nor the Secretary. And the Secretary has not claimed for Congress or himself any such power. All he has claimed was a right, in the absence of legislation by Congress, to say where the money should be kept by the Treasurer. And here is the fallacy of the whole argument.

The removal of a former Secretary of the Treasury is another supposed assumption of arbitrary power; and his character has been lauded for the purpose of aggravating the alleged arbitrary and oppressive character of the act. Sir, I am of opinion that no laurels are to be gathered by us from the consideration of the fact that he ever was Secretary; and if there be anything of praise or of glory to be gained by their taking his name and honor into their keeping, I wish them joy of the acquisition.

The right to remove the Secretary is denied by the Senator from Kentucky. The power of removal is given in that clause of the constitution giving the President the power to appoint all officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for in the constitution. This power is not limited to the filling of vacancies, and, of course, carries the power of substitution. This construction was given to the constitution in the act creating the Treasury Department. The power now denied and denounced as tyrannical is expressly given in that law. It is as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office of Secretary, the assistant shall, during the vacancy, have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers appertaining to the said office."

The practice has been uniform; and this is a new doctrine, for present effect, not for future use. And this is the power, thus given in the constitution, sanctioned by Congress, and practised upon, that is denounced as oppressive, and as causing a revolution.

The power of the President to superintend and control the subordinate officers is not only denied, but also denounced as unconstitutional, tyrannical, and oppressive. It is said, if that power is in the President, then he is the whole of the Government; the Government then is a simple machine enough; it is the bed of Procrustes, to cut short and lengthen its victims at pleasure. I am for no enlarged construction of the constitution; for no accumulation of power in the Government of the Union; for no augmentation of power in the President; for none in Congress. I resist all augmentation of power by construction. I am for the constitution as it is; I have sworn to support it as it is; not expanded by internal improvement, American system, and a moneyed monopoly, till it sickens with repletion, and sinks in its own loathed rottenness; nor, on the other hand, compressed until it shall be an humble suppliant to the States for the air to breathe, and, being denied, shall gasp and die.

Here the Senate adjourned, Mr. S. giving way for the purpose.

On the next day, Mr. S. resumed and said: I wish, before proceeding, to make an apology to the Senate and Senator from New Jersey for an erroneous statement on yesterday in regard to the time when the Secretary was first made head of the department. The error was in stating when the power implied in making him head of the department was given, not changing at all the fact that such power was given.

In relation to what I said yesterday respecting the alteration of the power of the Secretary from a superintendence of the collection of the revenue according to law, to a discretionary superintendence, I did not mean to be understood as claiming for him a discretionary power to act contrary to law, but a power to act in the absence of law.

I have remarked, sir, that the first and principal objection contained in the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Kentucky is, "that the President has assumed a power not granted to him by the constitution." This proposition, sir, rests upon the allegation that the Secretary is independent of the President. I purpose, therefore, now to consider whether the Secretary can, possibly, be independent of the Executive.

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 14, 1834.]

Sir, our constitution defines all power which exists in this Government. By that constitution, three branches of power are given, and all government resolves itself into and becomes part of those three branches, which are designated as legislative, judicial, and executive. To create a power which is not one of these, is to create a new power—a power unknown to the constitution and to this Government. You have only, then, to inquire to which of the three branches which I have specified the Secretary's power belongs. Is it in the legislative power? What is the legislative power? It is the power to ordain the laws or rules within its sphere of action, for the well ordering of all concerns. A high power, indeed! It has no other power. The legislative power never enters upon detail; it never puts the laws into practical operation, never executes the laws it ordains. When it has ordained the rule, it has exhausted its power; it can go no farther; its ability to act ceases. It can have no agents but such as are necessary to enable it to make the rule. The constitution gives the legislative branch no agents for the purpose of executing its rules.

It is true there are powers given to the Legislature in the constitution which are not legislative powers; such, for example, as the trial by impeachment in this branch, and that of impeachment in the other; such, also, as that of electing certain officers, which is given in some constitutions to the Legislature. But these, strictly speaking, are not legislative powers.

Sir, the Secretary has been said to be the "agent of Congress." Congress can have no agent to put in execution a law, to carry out any provision which it may make into practical operation. It can have no agent but those given to it in the constitution to aid it in making the laws. The Secretary cannot legally be an agent of Congress, for the reason that Congress cannot enter upon the detailed execution of its rules. The only pretence that I have been able to find in the constitution for such a procedure is contained in that part which says that Congress shall "lay and collect duties." But how collect, sir? Does this imply that Congress is to go after the money? Are we to travel over the country in the capacity of common collectors? I apprehend not, sir. It means only that Congress shall ordain the rule and manner of collection. As well, sir, might Congress be called upon for detailed action under that clause which provides for the punishment of pirates and felons. Congress actually called upon to execute the felon! It would be a violation of all principle, sir, to assume that, because Congress is directed to punish and collect, it is called upon practically to carry these provisions into effect. But, sir, it is said that the Secretary is the agent of Congress, because he is directed to report to that body. Are all persons agents merely because they report to Congress? Sir, the Secretary was not required to report because he was an agent of Congress, but to enable Congress to know the state of the finances, and that it might make such new rules or changes as it should deem necessary. Not only is there a reason why he should report to Congress, but that reason is designated by law. The purpose for which the Secretary was to report is there declared. It is enacted, by an act approved 10th May, 1800, as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress, at the commencement of every session, a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing the revenues, from time to time, for the purpose of giving information to Congress in adopting modes of raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures."

That purpose, then, is declared in the law to be to give knowledge to the Legislature; and this purpose being so declared, it is a violation of the law to hold that the Secretary of the Treasury is the agent of Congress.

Why, sir, what has legislative power to do with the practical execution of the laws? It is absurd (with all respect for the body I address) to talk of agents of legislative power. Legislative power, as I have before remarked, can only ordain a rule. Sir, it is as absurd to talk of the Legislature executing the laws, as it is to talk of the action of an abstract idea.

Is the power of the Secretary, then, of the judicial power? Sir, I need not argue such a question. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury has none of the attributes of the judicial power, except in a very slight degree. It has not been held by any one that the power of the Secretary of the Treasury is a part of the judicial power, and it will not be so considered. But, sir, I leave it.

If the power of the Secretary, then, is neither legislative nor judicial, it must be a part of the executive power; it can be found nowhere else in the constitution; it is naturally and legally a portion of the executive power; it performs service in obedience to law. It is ordained by the law, not by the constitution. It carries rules ordained by the Legislature into practical operation. And what, sir, are its functions but the execution of law? and what is that but the exercise of executive power? Sir, the executive power is one and undivided; and to set up the doctrine that there is an executive power independent of the head, is to divide that executive power, when the law has made it single; or, to make four powers where the constitution has made but three, is not only an attempt to divide, but to create a new power, irresponsible to all power. Sir, if the Secretary of the Treasury is independent of the executive head, to whom is he responsible? If the President cannot overlook him and judge of his conduct; if he cannot compel him to do right, if he is ever so wrong, who then can control him? The President is responsible to the people, and to the representatives of the people and of the States. He may be removed by the people, may be impeached by their representatives, and tried by the representatives of the States. But this independent branch of executive power, the Secretary of the Treasury, is not to be subjected to or responsible to the President, nor removable by him. He cannot be removed by Congress, nor touched by the Judiciary. He is a new monarch, in the enviable condition of kings, who can do no wrong. He is absolved from all responsibility. Sir, such is not the character of the constitution; such is not the genius of our Government. It has no divided power, or subdivided, in the branches of power ascribed to it. There is no such irresponsible creature in this Government. The constitution provides for responsibility in all its branches. The President is responsible to the people for the exercise of his power, and they call him to account if he abuse it; and this is the mode in which the constitution intended he should act. Sir, he is responsible not only to the people, but to their representatives. Here, sir, on this floor, we are to try him when he is brought before us by impeachment, and in no other mode. There is a responsibility, also, of the legislative power to those who elect him—of the representative to his constituents; and he is bound to obey their will, because he is their agent; he has but a trust duty. So the representatives of a State are responsible to the people of the State; they hold a trust, and are not at liberty to violate that trust; and they are not to obtain that trust, and exercise it on their own pleasure. The judicial power is also responsible, by the constitution, by way of impeachment in the other House, and by trial here, if it do not perform its duty. If the Government go on as it is, there is no difficulty in regard to power. The constitution is not chargeable with creating irresponsible officers or agents; it has the character of regular responsibility in all its branches; there is a symmetry in it to repudiate the notion of independent power.

Sir, I have one word more, before I pass from this branch of the subject. There can be no such irresponsible power, and, therefore, the whole argument, with its epithets and reproaches of the assumption of power, is all gone, if this is the true construction of the constitution. It is provided in the constitution that the Executive "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." What does this power imply? The Senator from Kentucky does not regard it as granting the power which I consider that it does grant. I regard it as a grant of power to the President to examine into the manner in which the laws are executed. How can the Executive take care that the laws be faithfully executed, without an examination into, and a decision upon the manner of executing? Can he take care how they are executed, and yet not look into the mode and manner in which they are carried into effect? Sir, he must look into the mode and manner of their execution, otherwise he cannot tell whether they are executed or not. Sir, the constitution not only gives him the power to look into the mode and manner, but further, it imposes it upon him, as a solemn duty—he shall look into the manner in which the laws are executed. To omit an inquiry of the manner in which an officer performs his duty, is to omit to perform his own duty, to which the constitution, as well as his oath, enjoins and binds him. When the President shall forbear to examine the manner and circumstances of the conduct of a subordinate officer, he can no longer put his hand on his breast and declare that he has conformed to his oath, to see that the laws are faithfully executed. All officers may go on and disregard their duties; they may omit all, and the President has no power to examine into their conduct and to enforce obedience; the whole Government is divided in its responsibility; the officers are let loose, to follow their own judgment without either guide or control; the President cannot remove them, and there is no other remedy.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

But, sir, it was alleged that the power granted to the President by the constitution went no farther than the removal of resistance to your laws. Let us take that view of the power, and see what would be the effect of it. Why, if the President were only to look on—were only to be an inactive spectator of what was going on—it might be the opinion of the collector of New York that the revenue laws were unconstitutional, and, therefore, ought not to be executed. And what then, sir? Why a faithful execution of your laws becomes—what? Why a faithful execution becomes no execution at all, according to this interpretation. Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with a personal responsibility in the performance of the duties which the law assigns to him; and one personal duty is, in taking charge of the depositories. But he does not stand alone in this respect: the collectors have also their personal duty assigned them; the District Attorney has his personal duty; the Attorney General, the Marshal—all public officers are charged with the performance of personal duty.

But this does not take away the right of the President to examine into the manner in which that personal duty is performed, and to decide upon it. The President has exercised no other power than this. He has not entered upon the actual exercise of the personal duty. He claims no such right. Sir, there can be no constitutional law making the Secretary of the Treasury independent of the executive power. The Secretary, in the constitution, must stand upon the same footing with all other subordinate officers. The President, then, had a right to urge him to the performance of his duty—to check him if he did wrong. He does no more than his duty if he does this; he omits a duty if he does less than this.

But the Senator from New Jersey says the President cannot take away the responsibility of the subordinate officer, and this power would take it away. The President decides what is a faithful execution of the law. That is the responsibility which he has assumed—no other. That responsibility, the constitution and his oath required him to assume. This does not remove the responsibility of the subordinate officers; their duty and their responsibility agree; they exist together, and are necessary to the well carrying on of the Government together. If the subordinate officer were to form a judgment of what constituted his duty different from the opinion of the President, what then would be the line of conduct which he ought to adopt? Why, it was the duty of the subordinate officer either to yield to the opinion of the President, or to retire from office. If his judgment coincides with that of the Executive, it is all well; but if he chooses to go on, holding one opinion, whilst the President holds another, he must take the responsibility of such opinion.

It has been alleged that in this very case the President took the responsibility, in order that he might violate the law, under the cover of his popularity. Are, then, the people of the nation so ignorant of their constitutional rights and privileges, that any man can violate the constitution and be popular? Sir, such is not the history of the Government of this nation. Such is not the history of my own State. There is no fear of such an occurrence while the people are intelligent, and know their own rights. The President would have no popularity, if, in the judgment of the people, he were a violator of the laws and constitution. Nor does the Secretary attempt to shield himself from responsibility because the President judged as he did. The Senator from New Jersey does not deny the power of the President to remove an officer; but he alleges that the removal of the former Secretary, under the circumstances, was a great abuse of that power; and says, no man, when it was early admitted to exist, "believed it would be used for party purposes." What does the Senator mean by party purposes? Does he mean by it, that if the President should be of opinion that such a Bank of the United States was unconstitutional, and had forfeited its duty, and there should be a Secretary of the Treasury of a different opinion, that these would constitute two parties, and that a removal of the Secretary by the President would be for party purposes, and therefore an abuse of power? If this be the meaning, I cannot agree that it was an abuse of power. If a Secretary in such a case refused to discharge his duty, so far from being an abuse of power, I hold it to be a right use of power, a proper and legitimate use of a power which the constitution has vested in the President, and that he would have been culpable if he had omitted to exercise it. It was no more than a faithful discharge of duty. In whatever light I view this transaction, I find no reason to charge it to be an abuse of power, nor can I look upon it in any other light than, as I have before said, a right use of the power. If the Senator means that there was any other party purpose in it, he is contradicted by the fact that the President and Secretary were of the same party.

An inquiry has been made, with great emphasis, whether the President can say how an officer ought to perform his duty? Sir, cannot the President say whether an officer performs his duty legally?—whether he performs it within the meaning of the law? Sir, it is his duty to see that an officer performs his duty, according to the spirit of the law, honorably, and not in a fraudulent manner, so as to violate the trust which has been confided to him; and if he finds that he is not fulfilling his duty faithfully, he has a right to say so, and to urge him to the proper and constitutional discharge of the trust which has been confided to him. If he cannot say this, then is the officer at liberty to act according to his own opinion; and, however unlawful, however unconstitutional that action may be, the President cannot say he does wrong. Sir, the President can say in what manner a subordinate officer ought to perform his duty—he must say it; and if he does not say in what manner the duty is to be performed, he violates his own duty and the constitution. A case is put, and it is said that if such power was given, the President might dictate in what way the law shall be executed. He might go to the marshal, and direct that a jury should be summoned in such a mode as to fulfil his own views; and thus the trial by jury, the guardian of our lives, liberties, and properties, was gone. But suppose a case of high crime and fraud should happen in this District, and the marshal should summon a jury known to him to be of like principles and character with the accused, for the very purpose of acquitting him at all events; would it be a faithful execution of the laws if the President did not direct him how to do it? would it not be a faithless execution of the laws if the President did not order him to do it honestly? The President can then "say how an officer ought to perform his duty." If he cannot do this, then indeed is the law and justice prostrated, and all offenders are released from the restraints of law; for the officers may not execute the laws, and the President may not examine how they shall do it, and of course can have no cause to remove them.

No, sir, it is the duty and the right of the Executive to see that the subordinate officers do their duty as honest men, and there is no danger in trusting such powers to the President. If he should order a subordinate officer to violate the law; if he should order the marshal of the District to summon jurors who were known for corrupt practices, then he might be impeached by the other House, and this branch of the Legislature might try him for it. But take away his superintending power, and then the officer of the District may come up and summon one set of jurors or another, as may suit his own particular views and objects—and who is responsible? Suppose, again, that the Secretary of the Treasury had thought proper, of his own accord, to remove the depositories, and the President had discovered that he was removing millions into his own pocket; then, there being no power to superintend the action of a subordinate officer, he is an independent Secretary—there is nothing to control him in such a transaction.

Sir, I repeat that such a mode of reasoning violates the spirit of the constitution, changes the character of the Government, and creates a civil revolution. It absolves all the officers of the state from their responsibility. Sir, it is a poor mode of reasoning (with all respect) to reason from the abuse of power that no power exists. There never was a power which was not in a condition to be abused; but is there, on this account, to be no power given? Are we so far gone back in information and intellect as to say that, because power may be abused, it shall not be granted? It is upon this poor position, the proposition that the President can abuse his power, that this great image of violation of the constitution, of law, and of oath, has been erected, and around it are hung the insignia of the prostration of the Government, by the great revolution which has been consummated; and it may fall to crush—not its opponents.

But, sir, another instance of alleged violation of the constitution has been adduced. It is said that that clause which forbids money to be drawn from the treasury without an appropriation, has been violated. Sir, the provisions of that clause ought to be carefully observed. It is a clause of high value and importance. I would be the last to detract from its value and entire operation. But, sir, what does this clause mean? The constitution prohibits money from being drawn from the treasury without an appropriation by law. Does it mean to say that the moneys in the treasury shall never be moved? Does it mean to pinion them down to the spot which they first touched? Does it mean that we are to tie up our hands in such a way that, if the money is collected in millions in New York, we shall not remove any part of it to this city to pay our bills? Does not the clause, sir, rather mean that the money shall not be taken from the treasury and paid to individuals without an appropriation? I could not have supposed, sir, that there would have been any doubt as to the construction of this clause—that there could have been any doubt upon the subject. Yet this is one of the distinguishing marks of the alleged violation of the constitution. Sir, allow me to describe two operations connected with the last-mentioned clause. What is it to take money from the treasury? No matter where the treasury may be—let it be in ninety different banks—it never had one particular location. Now, to draw money out of the treasury, I understand to be the taking of money out of the Treasurer's keeping, and the disposing of it in such a way that it no longer constitutes a part of the public funds; that the Treasurer shall be discharged of it altogether. Now, sir, this cannot be done without an appropriation, and without warrants being drawn, as the law prescribes. All this must be done to discharge the Treasurer of the money.

There is another operation. While it is in the Treasurer's keeping, subject to his order, (it may be that the money is in the United States Bank,) he wishes a portion of it removed to a place where there is no United States Bank. How is he to accomplish his object so that the moneys shall still be in his keeping? Suppose he wishes to remove them to Michigan, for example. He accomplishes his object, sir, by changing the place of deposit to some State bank, or to some individual in Michigan. And, sir, this carrying of the money from one bank to another needs no appropriation. There is nothing novel in this either. Ever since the existence of the Government, it has been done. It is a customary proceeding. And there is no difference between what has formerly and what has lately been done, excepting that a larger portion of money has been removed. Sir, it never was attempted before, to confound the moving of the public money from place to place with the drawing of the public money out of the treasury. What would be the consequence of such a construction of the constitution as would prohibit the removal of the public money—as would prohibit the right of changing the place of the depositories? The primary operation would be, that you could have no money but at the place where it was first paid in: The next operation would be, that you would have no power to protect your money, if it were in danger at the place where first paid in. Civil war, commotion, fire and flood, may all come upon it, and you could not, according to this doctrine, remove it, without violating the constitution. Sir, how happens this new construction to be got up upon the present occasion? For what purpose, and under what circumstances, does it now make its appearance? It is brought forward for the first time, and its tendency is to destroy the power of protecting your funds. It is brought forward to sustain a political bank—a bank distinguished for supporting its friends, and feeling the pulse of its enemies.

This very power is indirectly acknowledged in the charter of the bank—I may almost say directly acknowledged. And how? Has it not been adduced as a reason here, as if the bank by itself, and by virtue of its own power, may carry the money from place to place—from New York to Georgia—it may carry a great amount of money from place to place—and, by its own mighty power, transfer it as it pleases? Sir, the charter provides that it shall give the necessary facility for such transfer; but the power to transfer is not given. The bank may afford the facility of transferring—that is, where the Secretary requires it; but afterwards the power remains in him, and transfers are to be made by his power, and not that of the bank. If this be true, there is a recognition of this power, which is now denied, when a transfer draft is made, and it is in the Secretary. The bank, in consenting to its charter, consented to that power residing in the Government, and not in itself. It is a power not only to transfer in its own branches, but out of those branches. The charter admits that power; it sanctions it; Congress also admits it. But, sir, that power is now denied, though it is acknowledged in the charter, and sanctioned by Congress. Sir, what becomes again of this violation of the constitution of the United States, by drawing the money out of the treasury? It has not been done; the gentlemen have confounded the taking the money out of the treasury with moving it in the treasury; and the great constitutional right to do this is denied. Let me here say, sir, that this construction, which has been brought forward at this hour, with all the vigor, eloquence, and assurance which have been witnessed, will not be able to find a father in five years from this time.

Sir, it was alleged, if I understood it, in an early period of this debate, that there was a removal of money from the treasury; and that it was the removal from one side of a street to another that caused all the supposed breach of faith and credit. I understand that it is now alleged that it was not the mere transfer of a few millions of dollars that caused it; it is yielded that this did not produce the present distress; but it was the manner in which that removal was made. Here, then, the removal of some ten or twelve millions of dollars from one side of the street to the other did not produce the distress. But if they were wrong in the mode of getting it across the street, or if there was the most distant appearance of a person attempting to steal or squander it, although nothing was lost, yet, because the mischief was attempted, the manner of the transfer has destroyed all the credit of the country, although not a dollar was lost. Sir, not only was this charge made, but there was another: that the Government did not take all the money, but only a portion of it; and the Secretary desired to have an opportunity to take out the rest. Then the whole mischief in the manner is in undertaking to take the whole; and because the bank feared the Secretary would take all, by a call for a few millions of dollars in its vaults. Why, sir, is this difference in its action? Why does it to-day claim a power over the currency of the country—a power equal to control the Government itself—and to-morrow it is in terror and convulsions on account of the fear of the withdrawal of a few millions of dollars, and is driven to push on its debtors, to prostrate their credit, to ruin the merchants, to create a panic over the whole country? Why, sir, this strange aspect at different times?

Sir, is there any necessity for all this alarm in regard to the ruin and destruction of the currency of the country, the prostration of credit, and of every thing else? Could not the bank, without pursuing such a course, pay the five or six millions which it owed the Government? If so great is its power, as it has declared it to be, equal to the destruction of the State banks, can it not pay its honest debts without exciting an alarm in all the country? I think, sir, the people of the United States will understand all this. Its great means precluded the necessity of pushing so on its debtors for the purpose of enabling it to pay a few millions. I think, sir, that we understand all this. The bank has come forward with this new-made political engineering to overawe the Government, to rule the country.

I am the more inclined to believe that we and the people shall understand this if we call to mind a similar operation at one period of the last war, when the Government was weakened with a prostrated credit. What then was the course of the great moneyed power of the country? Have we forgotten the combination that then existed to create alarm and distress, to prostrate the credit, to overawe the Government, and to compel it to legislate in obedience to it? This, sir, is but a repetition of the same thing, with the same spirit; and by the same combination of the moneyed power made by the bank itself, to overawe the Government, prostrate your constitution, and rule in its place. Sir, the same fate which marked that transaction and its actors awaits this and the actors in it; and such will be its future history.

The Senate then, on motion of Mr. KANE, adjourned. On the next day Mr. SHEPLEY resumed, and said: The 16th section of the bank charter provides "that the money of the United States shall be deposited in the Bank of the United States, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise direct;" also, that in the event of removal he shall report to Congress. It is contended, sir, that there has been a violation of this section on the part of the Secretary; and, to prove this violation, a construction is put upon this section of the act, which requires it to be read as if the Secretary had no power of removal but when the deposits were unsafe. If this construction were true, it would require the section to read thus: "The money of the United States shall be deposited in the United States Bank, unless the Secretary, being of opinion that the deposits are unsafe—are in danger—shall otherwise direct." This construction, sir, proposes to insert, "being at any time of opinion that the deposits are unsafe," &c. Sir, is this construction to be given? Whether it shall be given or not, is the question. It proposes to put in other language; conveying other ideas; giving other rights to the bank, and less to the Government. It proposes to change the rights of the parties; giving the bank the right to say to the Government, You cannot remove the deposits unless they are unsafe.

Now, sir, yielding as I do that the true construction is to be found by looking to the intention of the Legislature in framing that section of the act, and that its spirit is to be ascertained from an examination of the whole act, can it be supposed that the Legislature was so ignorant of the use of language that it did not know how to use the proper language to make known its intentions?—that it could not express itself in a manner to be understood, without doubt or question, if such had been its intention? Is it to be supposed that the Legislature was so utterly ignorant and negligent in the construction of this charter, that it now becomes necessary for us to substitute new language—to change the terms of the act and the duties of the Secretary?

Sir, the very suggestion of the construction contended for says that the bank charter was drawn up so badly, that it is now necessary to patch it up, in order to make it speak what it is alleged was intended. I infer, then, sir, that there was no design to have made such a provision as that the Secretary should only possess the power of removal when the deposits were considered unsafe. Sir, is it not a part of the contract between the General Government and the bank, that the Secretary shall exercise the power which is given to him without limitation? Was it not part of the contract that he should not be trammelled in any respect by the bank? The bank accepted this charter, too, knowing that the power of the Secretary was without limitation. It had lawyers, too, who assisted in its deliberations. Sir, if there had been such a limitation as that contended for, the Bank would have been required to have given a greater bonus. The bonus which has been given would never have compensated the Government for such a limitation of the power of the Secretary.

The bank, sir, would at all times have been willing to have given four-fold the amount of the bonus to obtain such a construction of the act as that now contended to be the true one. What would be the consequence? Why, sir, the bank might be ever so unaccommodating, it might in every possible way inconvenience the Government, and you could not help yourself; your hands would be tied up; for the money would be safe, sir—it would be safe. The deposits may be used by the bank for its own purposes; it may openly exhibit that power, and yet you cannot remove them; they are safe—you have no right to open your mouth on the subject. They may corrupt your press; they may bribe your electors; they may come into your legislative department, and interfere with the enactment of your laws; and yet, because the depositories are safe, you have not a word to say against all this. I will ask, sir, who is there, being a legislator of the United States, who would be willing to accept of such a contract now? But it is said that the remedy is not in the removal of the depositories from the custody of the bank, but to deprive the bank of its charter by a process of law in a judicial court. Sir, is it consistent with the dignity of this Government to allow the practice of all these mischiefs, and not have the power to call home its own until the bank shall be deprived of its charter? Would it comport with the dignity of any Government? If there are persons who would submit to it, I am not one of those persons. Sir, is it a friendly act towards the people of this country, over whose interests Senators so carefully watch, to humble them thus? Is it a friendly act to the people of this country to disgrace them by making such a contract? It is, sir, a contract which has never been made—a contract which it would be disgraceful to make. It is putting the nation in the posture of an humble menial at the footstool of a moneyed institution. Yet it is the breach of such a contract, which never was made, and which it would be disreputable to make, which is causing all the dismay and mischief now existing in the country.

Sir, the Senator from South Carolina, if I understood him rightly, alleged that this power of the Secretary was a trust power, to be exercised for the benefit of both parties. Not, so, sir, a trust power, to be exercised for the benefit of both parties, is a power to do an act by which both parties may be benefited, and that is not this case; this is a trust power, inserted for the security, and to preserve the interests and honor of one party. It cannot possibly be exercised in such a manner as to benefit the bank. The bank may be benefited by a forbearance to use the power, not by its exercise; and it would have been a violation of that trust to refuse to execute it in such manner as to preserve the interest and honor of the country.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina says, again, that the whole power of the Secretary of the Treasury is concentrated in the safety of the depositories; that if the intention of the Legislature were to prevail, the whole power vested in him was to keep them safe. But, sir, I was not able to hear the gentleman give any reason for the allegation. However high may be my opinion of his talents, (and I have a very high opinion of them,) yet I cannot condescend to take for granted the dictum of any man on earth. He must condescend to give his reasons before he can produce conviction on my mind. And I must also be permitted to give my reasons for not viewing the subject in the same light. My first reason is, because the proper language is not used in the definition of the powers to bear the construction which has been given to them; whilst other language is used, and we can only gather knowledge of what is intended by legislative acts from the ideas which the language in which they are couched conveys.

The second is, that it is a well settled principle of law, in the interpretation of statutes, and recognised by all respectable judicial tribunals, that where a power is given in a statute without limitation, courts of law cannot constructively insert a limitation.

Thirdly, I cannot believe it possible that such was the intention of the Legislature; it cannot be that Government, in its legislative branch, would thus disgrace and humble itself; and this would have been both humiliating and disgraceful. The language of the act, taken naturally as it stands, makes the law.

Now, sir, if I have in any measure understood the arguments that have been adduced, the course of reasoning has been, first, to make the law, by construction, appear to be what it was not designed to be; and then to show that the law or contract thus made by construction has been broken; and then allege that it is by a breach of such a contract (never made but by their construction) that the violation of the public faith and the prostration of credit have been effected. No one could have convinced me that, on my first coming here, I should have met with, and had to contend against, such a mode of reasoning.

The Senator from Kentucky has asked "where is the treasury?" What does that imply? that the Senator could perceive no other possible place for it but in the United States Bank? Why ask such a question, if it does not imply that there could be no other place of safety, or of honor, or of convenience, for it? This is greatly to elevate the Government of the country, to suppose there can be no other place for the treasury but in the vaults of that bank. Sir, the treasury is now where it always has been. It is where even the moneys of the United States are subject to the Treasurer's draft. I think I do not mistake in saying that it never was wholly in the United States Bank. It has at all times been partly in the State banks since the charter of the United States Bank. In those places where there are no branches of the United States Bank, it has been in the State banks. The treasury, then, has been partly in the United States Bank, and partly out of it. And it has always been transferred at pleasure (some part of the moneys, at least) from the United States Bank to the State banks. All which has now been done is to do with the whole what it has been the constant practice to do with certain portions. The law has not ordered any particular place where the Treasurer is to keep the money, except in the Bank of the United States, till the Secretary should order otherwise; it was in the Bank of the United States with such a restriction and limitation; and the Secretary acted in accordance with the contract in the charter when he put it where it was before—in the State banks and State institutions for money.

The Senator from South Carolina seemed to be alarmed at the power claimed for Congress, or for the Secretary, "to dispose of the moneys as the public interest and convenience might require." Sir, has there been any claim made by the President or Secretary of such a power? The Secretary claims not that power—claims no power to dispose of the money. He has only claimed and exercised the power to order where the money shall be kept in the treasury.

What, then, is meant by the power to dispose of the money? If he means the power to spend it, to put it out of the treasury, and give it into the hands of those who are for applying it unconstitutionally to schemes and projects of their own, the President and the Secretary have neither assumed such a power, nor acted on such a project; they have not disposed of the money, unless to remove it; and, if that is his meaning, there is no cause of alarm; if he mean the power to spend it, it is not assumed by the President or Secretary. It is well to keep some degree of understanding of what power has been claimed, and what has been exercised. We are not to understand the power to expend, when the power claimed is only that of removal, and when they have executed only the power of removal, and not to spend.

Sir, it does not seem fair to reason, and go on, and show the consequences of the exercise of power to expend the money, and then leave it to be inferred that the power is claimed, when it is neither claimed nor exercised. Sir, it will be time enough to do this when the thing is attempted or done; and, when such power shall be claimed and exercised, I will go all lengths with the Senator to stay such an abuse. I pledge myself to join him, if need be, in the very front rank of the contest. But I may at present be permitted to stay my aid, and resist the current of these high charges against the officers of Government, who have never exercised the right alleged, nor claimed to do so.

Again, sir, it is said that even the power of Congress is a trust power, and that Congress has no right to dispose of the revenue merely for the public interest and convenience; and to this I agree. Congress has no unlimited power over the money of the United States, to dispose of it for the public interest and convenience. They are limited, as it regards the money of the Government, within the sphere of their power; and they are not to expend it on any fancied scheme or project; they are limited, bound down, and cannot do this without a violation of the constitution. But, sir, let us wait here again till Congress make an attempt to do this, and not get up the charge that Congress is a machine, simple enough, acting by its own independent powers; let us wait till there is a reason for it; let us confine ourselves till the moment when Congress, or the President, or any other branch of the Government, undertake such an exercise of power, without any legal claim upon the money, and then it will be time for us to interfere and stop such progress.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

Sir, there is one other idea which I desire to place before the Senate at the present time. One great cause of alarm stated by the Senator from South Carolina is that of an accumulation of power in the Executive, which, in consistency with his principles, he is bound to resist, because to resist the accumulation of power by construction requires that he should resist the Executive when attempting to accumulate power; and, therefore, it is right to resist the removal of the depositories. Sir, I believe the fear of his statement being realized is the ground on which he professes to act.

Sir, on what principle is it that the Bank of the United States stands at all as a constitutional bank? Is it not because it becomes necessary to carry into due execution the purposes of the Government? I believe it is decided that the bank cannot have an existence, unless it is necessary to the Government, to enable it to exercise the powers specifically given. The power over the revenue is specifically given; and the bank must stand on the power needful to Government, for the exercise of the power which it is to carry out over the revenue. But what, sir, does this imply? It implies a lack of power in the Government; it is too weak to get on without a Bank of the United States. To remove the depositories is to place the Government in the same condition, as respects the revenue, as it was in before the charter of the Bank of the United States; that is, in a condition where it has less power, and so little power that it was thought necessary to increase it by chartering the United States Bank. How consistent, then, it is to hold that the removal of the depositories is an accumulation of power, is not for me to decide.

Sir, one of the complaints which I have heard against the President of the United States, and on an assumption of illegal power—for I confine myself to the assumption of such power, and the violation of law—is, that the President assumes, and gives his reasons in his paper of September last, and asserts the right to exert a control over the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and over the elections. The Senator from Kentucky asks, where is the clause in the constitution which authorizes the President to assume such power over the morals of the people, the press, and the elective franchise? He denies that the President has power to act on these things; he asserts that he has no power over religion. He implies that the President asserts that he has the power to legislate and determine what religion shall be; what shall be the morals, the purity of the press, and the elective franchise. Sir, the President has not assumed, and he does not assume, the right to direct and control religion and the press. What power does the President assume? He proposes simply and only that, in the exercise of his power to carry the laws into effect, he will not take such a course as will injure the morals of the community, corrupt the press, or interfere with the freedom of elections: he never means to permit himself to take such a course as will corrupt the morals or the purity of the elective franchise, or break down the freedom of the press.

Now, is it not the duty of the President to take care that the morals of the community are not corrupted? Do not all Governments understand that there is a moral sense in the community which requires to be preserved? I turn to religion, which has been already introduced into this discussion. It is not claimed that Government shall legislate on religion. Does not Government acknowledge religion? Do we not take our oaths, when we come into this House, under the influence of religious feelings? Therefore, it may be the duty of Government not to destroy this sense of religion. The Executive does not propose to determine upon what shall be religion or morality, but to take care that the action of Government shall not destroy them. Sir, this is all the action which is proposed with regard to the press. The Executive does not wish to interfere in the way which seems to have been imagined by the Senator from Kentucky, by his reading the alien and sedition law; and, until the President assumes the right to control the press—to say what it shall and what it shall not do—we may refrain from loading him with the opprobrium which has lately been cast upon him. All the Executive has done has been to say that the press shall not be improperly acted upon. Is it not his duty to do this? Is he not called upon to prevent abuse, to prevent any undue interference with the press? So, again, with relation to the elective franchise. He claims no right to say what the elective franchise shall be. He simply says that no agent shall corrupt the elective franchise, break it down, or prevent its action. Hence, sir, the President is not justly chargeable with any such assumption of power as has been alleged against him. All these charges are made against him for acts which he has never committed. But, sir, another instance of the abuse of power is brought against the President. He is said to have brought about a union or combination of the purse and the sword. And, sir, if there be any just grounds for this charge—if any union has been effected by the President of the purse and the sword of the country, then there is ground for alarm. But let us see if it is so first. Let us have proof before we proceed to chastisement. How has this union taken place? Has the President taken money out of the treasury without an appropriation? If he has done this, then that part of history which refers to the Roman Dictator will be applicable to the President; but, until there has been an assumption of this power—until money has been taken out of the treasury and united with the sword, we may spare ourselves the trouble of bringing forward illustrations from history.

Sir, when has the President assumed the right of taking money from the treasury without an appropriation? I have carefully looked for the record of such an improper act on the part of the Executive, but I have been able to find none. Sir, there is an entire absence of such conduct on the part of the President. I have looked to find if he has assumed this power, leaving its exercise out of the question; but I have been unable to discover that he has ever assumed it. Let the Senator who has made this charge show that the power has been exercised, or even assumed, and then I will go with him, and will not refrain either from speaking or acting. But I call for proof that this power has been assumed or exercised. It remains for those who have brought forward this charge to prove its truth; it belongs to them to stand before the nation and account for the abuse which they have heaped upon the head of the President. In another place these rules do not bind, as they do here. It will also be proper for those persons to say why—for what purpose—those charges, without proof, have been brought forward. All that the President does is, to order the money to be removed, not taken out of the treasury. There is no more union with the sword now that the money is in State banks, than there was when it was in the United States Bank. Alarm may subside upon this subject, until facts are made known. Sir, we have had alarms upon alarms of assumption of power, of ruin and distress, so often during the last four years, that we are taught by experience that these storms will pass over the country and leave it uninjured and unscathed, calm, serene, rich and beautiful, lovely as loving woman. But, sir, although there is no union of the purse and the sword, permit me to show you that there is a union of the purse and press. Sir, the purse and the sword here, in this country, can do but little comparatively with what may be accomplished by the purse and the press. Sir, the first blow which shall be struck by the sword for power, by nation or by State—by a popular President or a disappointed candidate—will carry a thrill through the hearts of ten millions of this people, and a million of swords will instantly be raised to quell the battle and teach the offender duty. There has been no such union, sir, as the purse and the sword; and if there were such a union, its power would be feeble, its influence trifling—until the character and intelligence of the people of this country shall have become changed. When that hour arrives, it matters little what part of the law or constitution shall be violated, if the people are ready for it. But until that time comes, sir, until the people are thus debased and degraded, let those strike the blow for power—be they States or Presidents—who dare.

But, sir, it is not thus with the press. The press, united with the purse, disturbs suddenly no man's nerves. It is less noticed in its progress, but more fearful when corrupted than the sword when bought. The combination of the purse and sword is imaginary; that of the purse and press real. Is it not so? The capital of the United States Bank is at the disposal of one man. He is authorized to employ it upon the press—has employed it upon the press. The press has yielded—has been subsidized—has been bought; is now held—controlled. The public press operates upon, influences, public opinion. Public opinion controls the public judgment; the public judgment controls the Government, rules the nation. Sir, if the press ever loses its power over public opinion, it will be when it sells out to a moneyed monopoly, and, being humbled, prostitutes itself to pander for its iniquity. Then will the people turn away with loathing, and refuse to listen to one that must do the bidding of a master.

Sir, I have thus passed over the great alleged assumptions of power—assumptions which are in violation of the constitution; and where are they now found? They are found, sir, only in the strange construction of the constitution, in the new views that are taken of what is dear to the country—attempts to make the constitution what it is not—attempts to hold forth a character of the constitution which it never had, and to exhibit the constitution different from what it is. The violations of law are of a like character, resting merely on assumptions of law to make them appear odious, and, having thus raised up a superstructure resting on imagination, then comes forward the abuse for violating such laws and such a constitution as they are pleased to make them. And it is then, at this hour of alarm, that you come forward with such allegations, such constructions, and to increase the sufferings of the public!

Sir, much, very much, new light shines upon our legal and constitutional rights. It is reflected from the marble walls of a banking palace. It shines, sir, bright enough to enable those who once saw a United States Bank to be an evil, to see it now to be a good; bright enough to enable us to see our country presenting a divided executive, subordinate officers irresponsible to all authority, the treasury of United States only in its vaults, moneys of the United States incapable of preservation from intestine commotion or foreign enemies. Truly it may be said of such a light, "it dazzles to blind."

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15.

After disposing of various bills, Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said that the hour had nearly arrived for the renewal of the general discussion on the subject of the removal of the depositories. The resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, relative to some relief to the importing merchants, had been yesterday laid on the table, on his motion. Should it be the pleasure of the Senate to take up the consideration of the resolution, in advance of the general discussion, he would now move to take it up. He did not know whether the Senator from Kentucky was anxious that his resolution should now be taken up; but, were he (Mr. P.) to consult his own feelings, he would prefer that the general discussion should now proceed.

Mr. CLAY: Agreed.

Mr. POINDEXTER resumed. Understanding that it would be agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky that the subject should lie over until to-morrow, he would refrain from submitting his motion at this time.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then resumed this subject, when Mr. SHELLEY continued the speech he commenced yesterday, but had not concluded, when he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16.

After the transaction of some morning business, the Senate proceeded to the order of the day, when Mr. SHELLEY concluded his speech on the removal of the depositories, which is given above, entire.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17.

INQUIRY INTO THE PUBLIC DISTRESS.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, offered by Mr. CLAY:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of affording temporary relief to the community from the present pecuniary embarrassment, by prolonging the payment of revenue bonds as they fall due, the obligors paying interest and giving satisfactory security.

The question being on the motion of Mr. FORSTER, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That the Committee on Finance inquire into the extent and causes of the alleged distresses of the community, and into the propriety of legislative interference to relieve them"—

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the amendment, by adding the following words:

"By extending the periods of payment of revenue bonds, under suitable precautions, or otherwise, within the constitutional powers of Congress."

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said: Mr. President, the resolution submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky having for its object the extension of the periods for the payment of the revenue bonds, and thereby to afford relief to the importing merchants, and the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER,] has given rise to an incidental debate, which, in some measure, partakes of the general discussion which was progressing, on the subject of the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States. It appears to me (said Mr. P.) that the debate on this resolution has extended to topics somewhat out of place, and I am not disposed, at this time, to enter on an investigation of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the depositories, by enlarging the discussion on the resolutions now before the Senate beyond the limits prescribed by the parliamentary usage. I have risen only for the purpose of taking a limited view of some points which were introduced into this discussion by several honorable Senators, when the resolution was first submitted by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. P. expressed his belief that neither the original motion, nor the amendment, whatever might have been the benevolent motives of the honorable Senators who moved them, would be productive of any practical benefit to the country. If he were to prefer one or the other of these propositions, he was inclined to give his preference to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, because it proposed a more enlarged examination into the condition of the whole community, coupled with that of the importing merchants. But any result here, he thought, would be of little benefit either to the people at large or to the merchants.

No man can wink so hard as not to see the reality of the pressure and embarrassment which pervades the country. It has, indeed, been said that the complaints were limited to the banks in the vicinity of the Bank of the United States; to banking operations; to the commercial interests, and boards of trade in the commercial cities; but, to his mind, nothing could be more evident than that they were not so limited. The pressure is felt by the whole community. It extends to agricultural, and all the laboring classes, with equal, if not with greater, severity than to the merchant engaged in foreign commerce.

What was the cause of this evil? and from what movement of the Government affecting the interests of the country had they arisen? It was not his purpose now to go into a general examination of the important question, but he would take this occasion to remark, that honorable Senators were mistaken in supposing that a measure of the Government, which embarrassed the commercial operations of the community, was confined to that class alone; it acted directly on the department of finance, with which commerce was intimately connected; and whenever there was a pressure felt by the great commercial interests of the country, it found its way, by inevitable results, to the planter and farmer, and was necessarily productive of deleterious effects on all the products of agriculture.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] seems to imagine that the difficulties and embarrassments which had been painted in such glowing colors by the numerous petitions and memorials which had been laid on the table were to be sought for only among merchants, brokers, and banks. The honorable Senator had congratulated himself that they did not extend to, and were not felt in, the great manufacturing city of Pittsburg; there every thing was in a flourishing condition, and no whisper was heard of the distress so much deprecated in New York, Philadelphia, and other commercial cities on the seaboard. It must be satisfactory to every Senator to hear this flattering account of the condition of the people in that respectable portion of Pennsylvania. But, if he had looked carefully into causes which had exempted Pittsburg from embarrassment, he would have perceived at once many reasons why that city did not feel the pressure which existed in other quarters. It was a manufacturing community, operating on a small capital within its own reach, and dependent almost exclusively on facilities afforded by its own banking institutions. It dealt but little in foreign exchanges; its exports were chiefly consigned to a southern market, on which domestic bills of exchange were negotiated; and therefore the Government did not possess the means of affecting its interests to any great extent.

But if the honorable Senator really thinks that Pittsburg will never feel the general pressure which has so recently visited other sections of the country, and spread over them such gloom and despondency, he would do well to pause until the returns are received from the southern market of the extensive shipments which have been made of manufactured articles, flour, pork, and other commodities, during the present season; and he will be fortunate if he does not find an effect on those interests, produced by a deranged currency, and the embarrassments of mercantile operations and banking institutions, more serious and alarming than he has permitted himself to anticipate; he will find that these returns will fall far short of yielding the profits which have been received in former years on like shipments.

The honorable Senator has said that the resolution under consideration could be looked upon only as a temporary expedient, and he has told us that he is opposed to all such expedients; that the relief proposed to be afforded to the importing merchants would be illusory and ineffectual, and would end only in disappointed hopes. Did the honorable gentleman speaking by authority, mean to be understood as saying that the country was in no event to be relieved from its present distressed condition? that credit and confidence were not to be restored? and that all our efforts to sustain them, and to introduce once more a sound circulating medium, were to end in defeat by the operation of the veto power, which the President holds in his hands, as a rod over the National Legislature? If so, then, indeed, will the relief intended to be afforded by the passage of this resolution be wholly unavailing.

But the honorable Senator has, in some degree, relieved us from these apprehensions, in another part of his remarks. He says, that so soon as the discussions on the subject of the public deposits shall cease, and a vote shall be taken on the proposition to restore them, every thing like distress will vanish, and we shall hear no more of the pressure which now prevails throughout the commercial community. There is really something cheering in this assurance of the honorable Senator; it is a new view of the subject, which, if correct, would render the proposed relief to the importing merchants of the highest importance. Mr. P. said he hoped it would not be three or six months before the discussion is ended, and the vote taken in both Houses of Congress, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the restoration of the public deposits. If, when this is done, according to the prediction of the honorable Senator, the cloud which hangs over our commercial prosperity is to be dissipated, that money is to become plenty, and a general jubilee is to prevail over the country, then, indeed, the suspension for a few months of the payment of the revenue bonds would enable the merchants who are debtors to the Government to meet the demands of the treasury upon them, under the most prosperous and flattering circumstances. Such a relief would be permanent and effectual, and not temporary.

The honorable Senator has ascribed all the distress and embarrassment which is felt in the country, the deranged currency, the suspension of banking operations, and the want of commercial facilities, to the Bank of the United States. He tells us that, amidst all these appalling calamities, calling for aid and assistance wherever it may be had, the Bank of the United States most obstinately and uncourtously has the effrontery to stand still. All the power of the Executive, and the menaces of the Secretary of the Treasury, are unable to compel it to move; and that Pandora's box, with its innumerable evils, are to be found concentrated in the Bank of the United States.

This bank, it is said, has corrupted the country, by using its money for the purpose of obtaining a political influence in popular elections. At one time, the complaint is that its issues are too large; at another time, too small. At one time, the Secretary of the Treasury can put his foot on it and crush it at a blow; at another, it is denominated an inexorable tyrant and monster, exerting a control over the political concerns of the country. When it granted extensive accommodations to importing merchants and others engaged in trade and manufactures, it was condemned on the ground that these accommodations were enlarged for political effect; and when these accomtions were reduced, in the ordinary course of banking transactions, it is denounced for the crime of withholding them.

Such are the grave charges made against the bank by the Chief Magistrate, and those who wield his confidence, and by the organized press of the administration. It seems that nothing can satisfy them save only the total overthrow of this institution. When President Biddle sits down, he is too short; when he stands up, he is too long; but the worst of all, and the most ungracious attitude which he can assume, is, to stand still.

When the bank threw into the country a vast amount of the circulating medium, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us it is too much; it was designed for political excitement; again, when it issued less, it was not enough, and the distresses of the country are made to rest on its refusal to grant accommodations to any amount which might be desired. How the bank could conform its conduct to suit the views of the Executive Government, Mr. P. said he could not imagine.

Mr. P. said he had before him a most singular paper, put forth by an individual who holds a subordinate office in one of the departments, but whose influence over the Executive was so predominating, that more reliance might be placed on his deductions, in relation to the opinions of the President on the fiscal concerns of the country, than even on the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. He said he had no doubt the person spoke the official language received directly from the President, and by his authority; for (said he) it is well known, and cannot be denied, that while he stands in the relation of Fourth Auditor, attached by law to the Department of the Navy, he possesses more power in the affairs of the Government than the chief of the department in which he is a subordinate, and can at any time cause that Secretary to tremble in his shoes, by an angry look or a menacing frown. The paper to which I have alluded, after making a variety of calculations as to the means by which the Bank of the United States was to be destroyed, by the movements of the Secretary of the Treasury, on whose tender mercies alone its existence is supposed to depend, all of which calculations are utterly fallacious, proceeds to say:

"Yes, sir, this boasting giant is now a reptile beneath the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he can crush at will. It exists by his forbearance, and will for the next forty days; and great forbearance will it require to save it from destruction."

"But do not suppose the bank will be permitted to pursue a hostile course towards the State institutions, and thereby produce that pressure which it is the policy of the administration to prevent. Manifestations of such a course, on the part of the bank, will undoubtedly be met by a commensurate transfer of the public money, which shall make the bank the first to feel the consequences of its own folly."

"Thus has this haughty institution been brought to its knees, at the first step of the State banks. But the result of a necessity, forced upon it by the foresight and energy of the new Secretary of the Treasury, is now, with characteristic impudence, set down to the account of its own liberality and forbearance."

This, sir, was the language of the Executive, more than three months ago, communicated through an organ which renders it authentic—an organ who speaks none other than official language. Well, sir, the forty days have long since elapsed. The public deposits have been removed, and placed in numerous State banks; the iron hand of executive power has been wielded, with all its force, to fulfil the prophecy of the downfall of the Bank of the United States; and yet this "boasting giant" has not been "crushed" beneath the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury, but remains in full vigor, and in a sound and healthful condition. The Secretary of the Treasury promised to give the country a circulating medium more sound than that which had been afforded by the Bank of the United States. To effect this object, he deemed it proper to begin his operations by withdrawing the deposits two years in advance of the expiration of the charter. He anticipated no aid in the accomplishment of this great scheme from the Bank of the United States; he relied exclusively on a combination of State banks to replace the currency which he was about to strike out of existence. Well, sir, he has commenced his operations. He has utterly failed to redeem the pledge which he gave to the country; a general scene of distress ensues; and we are now unblushingly told that all these evils have arisen because the bank, which was under his feet, and could be crushed at a blow, has the temerity, in defiance of his threat, and in the face of executive power, "to stand still."

If, indeed, he had given the death-blow which he had contemplated to the institution, it would at once have been deprived of the power of volition; it would have been harmless, and would have thrown no impediments in the way of the Secretary in the organization of this formidable phalanx of pet banks. The fatal blow has, however, not been given; the bank is still permitted to exist; it does not interfere with the arrangements of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, for this non-volition, it is charged with all the distresses of the country, which are the legitimate offspring of the unwarrantable and ill-judged efforts of the Executive Government, in the use which it has made of the money in the treasury of the United States. The bank stands still, and the Government goes on in its career of ambition; but, in the attempt to put its plans into practical operation, it is found that the favorite State banks are destitute of specie, and unable to perform the functions required of them. In this dilemma, they turn round and ask the aid of the reptile bank, which they vainly imagined might be crushed in forty days; and, because the bank will not risk its high reputation by granting the facilities which the Government requires, it is made the victim of executive vengeance, and charged with a design to coerce Congress into compliance with its demands, and enforcing its claims to a recharter of the institution.

But (said Mr. P.) my principal object in rising was not to discuss subjects which more properly belong to the general debate: but I rose principally to notice the operation which the movement of the Secretary of the Treasury has had upon the cotton market. The cotton market in New Orleans usually opens in the month of October; it was somewhat later than usual this season, in consequence of the cholera and yellow fever which prevailed there; it did not open until about the beginning of November. The first purchasers who make their appearance in the cotton market are the agents of the cotton manufacturers; the second class are the French, who take only the fairest quality, or that which is called No. 1; the third class of purchasers who enter the market are English. The domestic manufacturers effect their purchases by authorizing their agents to draw bills of exchange on Boston, New York, or some other northern city, which have heretofore been discounted at the Bank of the United States, or some one of the local banks in New Orleans. Thus a sufficient amount of money was procured, and deposited in these banks, with which all or most of the purchases of cotton were made for domestic consumption.

But, in consequence of the derangement of the currency, and the want of the usual facilities, the domestic manufacturer could not make his deposits in the manner and on the terms which had been customary in former years.

In the month of October last, about the time that the news of the removal of the deposits reached New Orleans, foreign bills of exchange stood at a premium of 10 per cent.

JAN. 17, 1834.]

Public Distress.

[SENATE.]

and domestic bills of exchange were sold at a small discount. The effect of the derangement of the currency, and the withdrawal of the usual commercial facilities, was to reduce the premium on foreign exchanges, and raise the discount on domestic bills of exchange. The result of this state of things, was, that the domestic manufacturer could not, as had been the custom, make his purchases through the medium of domestic exchanges; because the banks would not discount them as freely as these extensive transactions required. And because prudent men, in the commercial cities at the north, were unwilling to come under heavy acceptances, which might fall due, and payable at a time when they could not command the banking facilities necessary to redeem them.

These are some of the happy consequences of the removal of the public deposits, and the derangement of the national currency.

The fall which has taken place in foreign exchanges had a direct tendency to depress the cotton market. It withdrew from competition that large class of purchasers who annually made remittances to Europe, in this article. The course of things was this: an importing merchant, wishing to make a remittance to Liverpool or Havre, instead of purchasing a bill of exchange, on which he would be compelled to pay an advance of ten per cent., discounted his paper at the banks, obtained the necessary funds, vested these funds in cotton, in which he made the remittance to his creditor, and thereby gained a profit of ten per cent., even if the article brought no more in the foreign market than it had cost him in New Orleans. The value of these bills has now fallen to one and a half, or two per cent., which has driven out of the cotton market all that class of purchasers who desired to make remittances in this article, to meet the demands on them in England, or elsewhere in foreign countries. The tendency of these causes combined, has been a material depression in the cotton market. So much for the causes, and now I beg leave to state the facts. When the cotton market in New Orleans opened, the quotations from Liverpool were 14 pence sterling per pound, and advancing, equal to about 27 cents of our currency. How did the market open? Did the prices correspond with the Liverpool market, deducting the usual charges of freight, insurance, and commission? At that time it was confidently anticipated at Liverpool, and large bets were made in London, that the price of cotton, on the 1st of January, 1834, would be 15 pence sterling. Under all these encouraging circumstances, the market in New Orleans opened at from 16 to 17 cents, and some choice lots were taken at 18 and 18½ cents. Thus, sir, when the price in Liverpool was equal to 27 cents, and the rate of exchange 10 per cent. premium, purchasers in New Orleans would not give within 7, and, in some cases, 10 cents, of the value of the article in Liverpool. While the quotations remained at 14 pence sterling, the purchasers in New Orleans could well afford to pay for the article 22½ or 24 cents, per pound, with a fair prospect of a mercantile profit, without taking into consideration the advantage gained by the rate of exchange on England. The loss to the planter was not less than 7 cents per pound at that period of the market, estimating the price which would have been justified by the state of the European market. The cause of this depression no one can doubt; there was no money with which the purchases could be made; the usual commercial facilities were withdrawn; the banks would not discount domestic bills of exchange, and men could not be found who would accept them for a large amount, at the imminent risk of their mercantile credit by protests, to which they would become subjected, if the bank should deny them the necessary accommodations; a state of things which every prudent merchant anticipated after the withdrawal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States.

But it is said that cotton has fallen in Liverpool, and that a corresponding depression has taken place in this country.

True, sir, the price of cotton has declined in Liverpool, but what were the causes? It was in consequence of an impression which existed there, that a redundant crop had been made in the United States in the past year. The manufacturers united to bring down the prices, in opposition to the speculators, who had invested large sums in the article. They succeeded, and what was the result? They put down, pari passu, the price of the manufactured article, drove the purchasers out of the market, and were themselves the principal sufferers. But while the quotations from Liverpool are at this time from 9 pence to 11 pence half-penny sterling per pound, the price at New Orleans is reduced to 9 cents on inferior qualities, and from 10 to 12½ on the finest descriptions. Now, I ask, if this corresponds with the Liverpool market? Eleven and a half pence is equal to twenty-one cents—about eight or nine cents more than is given in New Orleans.

These are the glorious fruits of the attempt to put down an institution, as innocent and unoffending as any that ever existed in the country. Why talk about the political transactions of the bank, (said Mr. P.) of its influence in popular elections? Why, sir, [he continued] if I were to go before the people as a candidate for any office in their gift, I should want nothing better than to make the bank my enemy, and induce them to oppose me with all their energies. Sir, in such a case, I should be certain of success. All banking institutions are unpopular with the great body of the people, who have no immediate interest in them. They have no connexion with the politics of the country. Sir, they have nothing to do but to make money for their stockholders; and I, for one, care not how much or how little they make, while they confine themselves to their chartered privileges.

The constitutionality of the Bank of the United States has been defended from the beginning, by its advocates, chiefly on the ground that it is essential to the collection and safe-keeping of the public revenue. I consider it an adjunct to the Treasury Department, and as having been established by the Government for those important purposes. The interests of the stockholders is an incident, and by no means the leading motive in granting the bank charter. In its operations, the Government will look only to the security and safe-keeping of the public money, and the country at large are interested no farther than the effect of the institution in equalizing domestic exchanges, and furnishing a safe and sound circulating medium. These great ends being accomplished, we may safely leave the stockholders to manage their own concerns in their own way, always having a due regard to the limitations contained in the charter. Such an institution, so managed, can possess no dangerous influence over the political concerns of the country. It would not be equal, in a popular struggle, to one artful designing demagogue, and in no event would it be so dangerous to public liberty.

Sir, we have arrived at a crisis in the history of our Government, when all power seems to be concentrated in a single head. The two Houses of Congress are the mere drudges; they prepare bills, discuss and amend them, so that they may conform in all their provisions to the public good; but when they reach the imperial head, he has told us, in a message to which I might refer, that if they do not accord with his views of the constitution, or on the grounds of mere expediency; or, in other words, if he would vote against them as a member of this or the other House, he will stamp upon them the seal of his veto, and defy the power of Congress to pass them by a constitutional majority of two thirds. This veto power has been claimed and exercised in all cases, and has become supreme over the Legislature of the country. The powers of the Government are thus placed in one single head, possessing high and uncontrollable prerogatives, and we debate here in vain without the concurrence of his will. It would be far better at once to appoint a committee to wait on the President, and ask him what we shall do; do it and go home. Mr. P. said he would vote for the resolution and amendment, though he did not believe that the adoption of either would produce any practical relief.

Mr. BENTON said, that, with respect to the state of things existing in the city of New Orleans, as represented by the Senator from the State of Mississippi, he merely wished to give a brief explanation, derived from information contained in a letter dated December 19th, that he had received from a gentleman in that city. But first he would ask of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WAGGAMAN] if he knew the handwriting in the letter, and whether the writer was not a gentleman of character and standing.

The letter having been shown to Mr. W.,

Mr. POINDEXTER inquired whether the gentleman was not connected with one of the pet banks.

Mr. BENTON then referred the letter to

Mr. POINDEXTER, who, on inspecting it, said that the writer was President of the Merchants' Bank of New Orleans, one of the banks selected to receive the public deposits.

Mr. BENTON resumed. The letter he said was from a respectable merchant, well acquainted with the commercial transactions of his city. He gives a very satisfactory account of the causes which have produced the present state of distress in New Orleans. In the first place, the Branch Bank there received a peremptory order from the mother Bank at Philadelphia, directing its discounts to be reduced one million of dollars. In the next place, the Branch refuses to buy the best endorsed paper at sixty days, or to take any bill whatsoever on the West. Then the Branch buys, without limitation, bills on the North; being in conformity to what he had stated when he last addressed the Senate on the subject. And, lastly, in speaking of the causes of pressure in the money market, the gentleman says: "You are well aware that about the 1st of January and the 1st of March, in consequence of the bills for the purchase of produce being made payable at those times, a great scarcity of money was occasioned among the merchants." Now, sir, said Mr. B. we have the whole of the causes which have produced the distress existing in New Orleans; and to meet this distress there is a peremptory order to the Branch Bank to reduce its discounts—to refuse good paper and to buy largely bills on Philadelphia for the purpose of producing as great a distress among her merchants as possible.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was certainly opposed to troubling the Senate, at this time; but, as he wished to make some remarks on the subject, and felt a reluctance to delay the discussion on the general question, he would move to lay the subject, for the present, on the table. Not being perfectly prepared, at this time, to enter into the debate, he hoped his motion for a postponement would prevail; with the understanding, however, that the subject should be called up to-morrow, or on Monday, with a view to a final disposal of it.

Mr. CLAY assented to the proposition, on the condition that the further consideration of the resolution be not delayed longer than Monday. He hoped, then, that a final question would be taken on it.

Mr. WEBSTER'S motion was then carried, without a division.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of Mr. CLAY'S resolutions on the removal of the deposits; when, Mr. RIVES, of Virginia, took the floor. He said it was with great reluctance, at all times, that he obtruded himself on the attention of the Senate. In so enlightened a body, he felt more disposed to be a listener than a speaker—to receive instruction from the views and arguments of others, rather than to attempt the communication of his own. But there are questions and occasions [said Mr. R.] which leave no other alternative, than a departure from this reserve, or a silence exposed to misconstruction. Such, sir, is the present question, and such the circumstances under which I now venture to ask the indulgence of the Senate.

The subject we are considering, [said Mr. R.] is admitted, on all hands, to be one of the highest importance, deriving an especial interest from the distress and embarrassment which are said at the present moment to pervade the community. In regard to the extent of that distress, it may, and probably has been exaggerated, and it is destined, I trust, above all, to be of transitory duration. But that it has existed, and still exists to a very considerable extent, there can be no doubt; and we are now called upon to investigate the causes of the evil, and to apply a suitable and effectual remedy. But, in the performance of this office, let us be careful not to mistake a mere symptom for the disease itself, and by an empirical practice addressed to the momentary palliation or removal of the one, to add to and confirm the violence and danger of the other.

For myself, sir, I believe that the disease is far more deeply seated than the honorable mover of the resolutions now under consideration supposes. It has its origin in the vices of our own legislation, and will require the cautery and the knife for its extirpation. I am not less sensible, I trust, sir, than other gentlemen, to the sufferings of any portion of my fellow-citizens, but I must say that the present crisis, whatever be its severity, comes alleviated by one high consolation. It is calculated to awaken, and I trust it will awaken, all of us to the true nature and dangerous character of that formidable moneyed power which we have built up by our own laws, and which now sits enthroned upon our statute book in the pride of chartered prerogative. Sir, we have heretofore been singularly deaf to the monitory lessons delivered to us by our fathers and predecessors. In vain did the republican statesmen of '91 warn us of the fatal consequences of this "first transgression" of the sacred limits of the constitution—in vain did Mr. Jefferson, in that prophetic passage which was read to us the other day by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] tell us that of all possible institutions "this was the one of most deadly hostility against the principles and form of our constitution," and that if permitted to exist, it would one day reduce the constituted authorities of the nation themselves under vassalage to its will. In vain, sir, did the eloquent voice of the Senator from Kentucky himself, [Mr. CLAY], on another occasion, warn us that this corporation, though then wielding less than one-third of its present capital and resources, was fraught with the most serious "danger to our liberties"—liberties which the honorable Senator seems now to think can be preserved only by upholding this same corporation against the just animadversions of the public functionaries appointed to supervise it. Sir, all these warnings have been unheeded by us, till the distresses which it has now wantonly inflicted upon the country, with the obvious design of influencing and controlling our proceedings here, must have brought home to all of us, I trust, a deep conviction of the danger and capacities of mischief inherent in this great monopoly.

It will hardly now be contended, I presume, by any gentleman who has taken the trouble to examine the subject, that the present distress is the necessary consequence of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. It has been expressly admitted, in a quarter entitled to the highest consideration, not only from the distinguished eminence of the gentleman himself, but from the special relation in which he stands to the bank [Mr. R. here alluded to the speech of Mr. Binney in the House of Representatives,] that the removal of the deposits per se is not a sufficient or justifiable cause for the present distress—that this removal is a thing which might happen, and had happened before in the history of the bank, without producing any distress or inconvenience to the community. Sir, a removal of the public deposits from the bank happens, in effect, whenever an application of the public moneys to the public debt, or to the current expenses of the Government, exhausts the amount which is to the credit of the United States in Bank. If we are to credit the book which the bank itself has laid on our desks, (the report of its committee on the exposition of the President to his Cabinet,) a removal of the deposits, in this way, has occurred at a very recent period, without leading to any pressure on the community. The bank informs us, in that document, that in the month of March last, when the protested bill on the French Government returned upon it, there was, after deducting the advances it had made on that bill, “less than two thousand dollars of the whole funds of the Government in the bank!” And yet it appears from its monthly returns that, notwithstanding this exhaustion of the public deposits, it was at that time actually enlarging, instead of curtailing its discounts.

Sir, if the removal of the deposits has produced the late severe and grinding pressure upon the community, there is a singular disproportion, indeed, between the cause and the effect. It appears from statements now before me, that, on the 1st day of August last, when the bank commenced its curtailments, the amount of public deposits in its vaults was $7,599,841; on the 1st of December, that amount was still $5,162,259, making a diminution of $2,437,582 only. By the returns of the bank, it is shown that on the 1st of August its discounts amounted to $64,160,349. On the 1st of December they were $54,453,104, making a reduction of discounts, in four months, of near ten millions, to meet a diminution of deposits of less than two and a half millions; and this by an institution which, according to its own showing, had not only not reduced, but actually enlarged its discounts, at a time when the public deposits in its vaults, had, by rapid and large diminutions, been brought down to “less than two thousand dollars!”

It is clear, then, that the removal of the deposits alone has not produced the existing distress. But it was the removal of the deposits connected (as we are told, from the same authentic quarter already referred to) with the doctrine that the operations of the Government and the business of the community, can henceforward be carried on without the Bank of the United States—it was the intention manifested “of separating the people from the bank, and the bank from the people,” as it is expressed, which produced the convulsion. We are then to presume, that it was to put down this doctrine—to demonstrate the dependence of the Government and nation on this great institution—to show that the people cannot be “separated” from it without ruin and confusion—that all this distress has been visited upon the country.

With like views, doubtless, an exhibit was presented of the annual operations of the bank in the various forms of exchange, domestic and foreign, discounts, circulation of notes, &c.; showing the extent, the alarming extent, to which this institution has mixed itself up with, and acquired a control over, the ordinary business and interests of the country. Sir, if there be gentlemen here who do not see in this exhibit a most fearful revelation of the power and influence of the bank, they have, I confess, much firmer nerves than I can pretend to. It appears from this portentous paper, that the operations of the Bank of the United States, in domestic exchanges alone, under one form or another, during the year 1832, amounted to - - - $241,717,910

In foreign exchange, - - - 13,456,737

Total amount of exchange. - $255,174,647

Two hundred and fifty five millions one hundred and seventy-four thousand and six hundred and forty-seven dollars!

To which must be added the loans and discounts of the bank, which averaged in that year, $66,871,349

And the circulation of notes of the bank, averaging for the same year, - - - $20,309,342 -

Now, sir, I would ask every candid and reflecting man if an institution enjoying such a monopoly as this, of the general commerce and circulation of the country, incorporating itself, as it has been its policy to do, with the ordinary transaction of the community to so fearful an amount, exercising, consequently, a control over the fortunes and interests, the fears and hopes, of so many persons—if such an institution does not wield a power of the most tremendous and alarming character—a power altogether unchecked by the State banks, for the Senate will recollect the significant statement made by the president of the bank to a committee of this House in 1830, that “there are very few banks (State) which might not be destroyed by an exertion of the power of the bank (U. S.)” Sir, sooner or later, evil, dire evil, must have come, of so tremendous a power, unchecked and irresponsible, concentrated in the hands of a great moneyed corporation. It is well that “by an exertion of that power,” so significantly vaunted, and now so wantonly put in practice, we have been aroused to a sense of our danger, before it is too late to provide for our security.

The true seat of the disease with which the body politic is affected, is here: it is in the existence of this powerful, remorseless, and overshadowing monopoly. What, then, is the remedy? Is it by succumbing to its dictation, to add to its power by restoring the deposits, (the grand panacea proposed to us,) to increase its resources for future annoyance, to enlarge its means of influence, and multiply the chances of perpetuating its existence; Sir, if we have not firmness to resist the panic which the bank has made a pretext of the removal of the deposits for creating, how much less shall we be able to bear the more serious pressure for which it will find a real and operative cause in the expiration of its charter, when, to provide for its returning circulation, and the payment of its stockholders and its depositors, it must call in, instead of ten millions, the whole sixty or seventy millions of debt due to it? Sir, can any one have been so unreflecting as to suppose that we should ever be able to throw off the frightful incubus of this bloated monopoly, without a bitter and painful struggle? Has the experience of 1811, when the charter of the first bank of the United States expired, been entirely forgotten? Then, as now, the same scene of bringing forward the State banks in Philadelphia, as advocates on behalf of the United States Bank, was gotten up, with this honorable distinction in favour of the present times, that then all of those banks came forward at the bidding of the United States Bank, now, some five or six of them have had the firmness to refuse. Then there were not only memorials from boards of trade, and public meetings, as now, but there were formal deputations sent to this place, to lay their complaints before Congress, and a committee of this body was appointed to hear and investigate them. Then, too, there was a pause in the operations of trade; and the products of agriculture sustained a depression, of which the fact then stated in Congress, that flour had fallen in a few days from ten to seven dollars, may serve as a set-off to all that we have heard on this floor, for some days past, concerning the ominous decline in the price of cotton. But, sir, our predecessors had the firmness to stand up against all this terrorism, and to regard the cause of the constitution and the public liberty as dearer to the American people than the transitory state of the money market.

I hope, sir, we shall follow their example. If we yield to the panic with which we are now assailed, and restore the depositories, which the bank has, by its misconduct, justly forfeited, the triumph of this dangerous and unconstitutional institution is complete, and its re-charter virtually decided. Do we not all here feel that these questions are one and the same? Does not the whole course of the arguments we have heard on the modus operandi of the removal of the depositories in producing the existing distress, and in what manner their restoration would tend to relieve it, shew that neither the removal nor the restoration are regarded, except as signs expressing the termination or renewal of the bank charter; and that, in truth, it is the bank itself, and not the depositories, which is in issue? Restore the depositories, and what will happen? Another sudden and great expansion of discounts by the bank, bringing more and more of the community within its power, and at the end of two years when its charter expires, if any resistance should then be offered to its renewal, we shall find ourselves in the merciless gripe of another bank contraction, far more agonizing than one we now endure—a crisis to which our courage and principles must certainly prove inadequate, if we have not the firmness to meet the present trial. On the other hand, if the depositories, being withdrawn, are permitted to remain so, the bank will see in that resolution its own fate finally determined—with such an admonition, it will go on gradually to prepare for the winding up of its affairs, (for, happily, it will not have it in its power to inflict further injury on the community, without doing still greater injury to its own interests,) the States Banks at the same time, will be enabled progressively to extend their accommodations, and we shall finally get rid of this tyrannical and unconstitutional monopoly, at the expense of no other suffering than that to which we have already been subjected.

It is in view of this great consummation, Mr. President, the final extinction of this dangerous and unconstitutional moneyed corporation, overshadowing alike the Government and the People, that I, for one, am willing to let the measures which have been taken have their course.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] tells us, however, that the question is not bank or no bank, but whether we are to have a bank organized and controlled by Congress, or a bank created and governed by the President alone; for the honorable Senator seems to consider the State banks which may be selected as depositories of the federal revenue, as forming, in effect, a National bank. But, sir, if there were no other alternative to the agency of the present bank of the United States, than the employment, under the selection of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the State banks, (a supposition by no means necessary in my opinion,) is it possible that State Banks, deriving their existence from the State Governments, subjected to the habitual control and supervision of those Governments, in the appointment of whose directors, and the management of whose affairs, the Government here would have no participation,—without a common head, checked and controlled by rival institutions, and the share of the public depositories falling to each a boon hardly worth the trouble of its keeping; is it possible that constitutions thus instituted and thus situated, could be made the channels and instruments of a formidable influence, like a great central corporation, “penetrating,” as Mr. Jefferson says, “by its branches, every part of the Union, acting by command and in phalanx,” and wielding an enormous accumulation of moneyed power? Sir, the thing is impossible. The general estimate in the operations of the Treasury is, that about one quarter's revenue remains, at any given time, on hand and unexpended. Now, sir, when the depository of this one-fourth part of the annual revenue, reduced, too, as that revenue will be, by the effect of existing laws, shall be divided between some thirty or forty State Banks, is the small share which may fall to the lot of each, such a consideration as could tempt them from their natural allegiance to, and sympathies with, the Governments which made and can unmake them? What has just occurred in my own State is sufficient to shew the utter incompetency of such a boon to affect the independent exercise either of the feelings or the judgments of the State banks. But, to obviate every apprehension, I trust a system will be devised, and I do not hesitate to say such an one ought to be devised, providing for a designation of the depositories of the public moneys by fixed rules, and under the control of Congress.

Sir, the honorable Senator from South Carolina has also told us that so long as the Government itself receives and pays away bank notes, it is an insult to the understanding to discourse of the pernicious tendency and unconstitutionality of the bank of the United States; that while the Government, by so doing, treats bank notes as money, it not only has the right, but it is in duty bound, to incorporate a Bank of the United States; and that the question of the constitutionality of such an institution can fairly arise only when the Government shall refuse to receive any thing but gold and silver in payment of the public dues. Without stopping at present to examine the correctness of the reasoning of the honorable Senator (reasoning, which to my mind is entirely unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it makes a great question of constitutional power to depend, not on the fixed and immutable provisions of the constitution itself, but, in effect, on the mere will of the Government, as it may happen to do or not to do a particular thing)—without stopping, I say, sir, to examine this reasoning, at present, I will say to the honorable Senator, that, seeing so many abler gentlemen, himself among the number, while admitting the vital importance of the object, declining the task of its prosecution, I pledge myself to present this great issue in the shape in which only the honorable Senator thinks it can be legitimately presented.

Sir, of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises in its accomplishment the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the constitution to be, a hard-money Government. We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of the paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of those evils supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank. Nothing, in my opinion, is more demonstrable than that the great evil of that system, its ruinous fluctuations arising from alternate expansions and contractions of bank issues, making a lottery, in effect, of private fortunes, and converting all prospective contracts and transactions into a species of gambling—nothing can be more certain than that these ruinous fluctuations (and we have a striking proof of it in the present distresses of the country) are increased, instead of being diminished, by the existence of an institution of such absolute ascendancy, that when it expands the State Banks expand with it; when it contracts, those banks are forced in self-defence to contract also. Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert, in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as practicable, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return is to let the Bank of the United States go down. Its notes being withdrawn, the convenience of travelling alone would immediately create a demand for gold coins, as a substitute, and enforce the necessity of correcting that under-valuation of them at the mint, which is said to have contributed to their disappearance. In concurrence with this, let measures be taken, as it is believed effectual measures may be taken, to discourage and suppress the circulation of bank notes under a certain denomination, (ten or twenty dollars,) of which the effect would be, to produce another accession to the metallic circulating medium. The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realize a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity of the country.

Sir, here is an object worthy to engage the most anxious labors of the patriot and statesman, and I feel persuaded that, with a tithe of the effort and talent daily expended in the ephemeral contests of party, we should see it happily accomplished. I conjure gentlemen, then, with ability so eminently fitted for this great work, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate—a fate already pronounced by the voice of the nation, and called for by the highest considerations connected with the safety of our free institutions—and bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination—that of a simple, solid, hard-money Government.

But, I shall doubtless be asked, Mr. President, if, in this instance, the public faith has been broken, and the rights of the bank violated, will I not repair the breach, and redress the wrong? Sir, if such were the case, I would, but in my humble judgment, and I hope to be able to show it, the public faith has sustained no violation—the bank no wrong; and this brings us to the consideration of the rights of the bank, as secured by its charter. Gentlemen have argued as if the bank, by the bonus which it paid, of a million and a half of dollars, had purchased a right to the deposits of the public money. But nothing is more obvious, from the face of the bank charter itself, and especially from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. Dallas.] which transmitted and explained it, than that the bonus was the consideration, not for the public deposits, but for the charter grant—for the act of incorporation, conferring on the subscribers to that bank the faculties and privileges of a body politic and corporate, empowered, as such, to carry on the trade of banking with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, to hold property to the amount of fifty-five millions, to make by-laws for the Government of the corporation, to establish offices of discount and deposite in any of the States or Territories of the Union, and for the express stipulation, pledging the faith of the United States that no other bank should be established by Congress during the continuance of the said corporation.

These evidently were the "exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by the act" of incorporation, "in consideration of which" the bonus was to be paid,—and were they not of value enough, Mr. President, of a character sufficiently important to merit and justify the price to be paid for them? Why, sir, among them is a great sovereign power granted to this corporation, that of establishing subordinate banks within the jurisdiction of the States, independent of the consent, and exempt from the legislation of the States in which they may be established—a power which Mr. Madison declared, in the debates on the creation of the first bank in 1791, "ought not to be delegated to any set of men under the sun." The deposite of the public moneys in the Bank of the United States can with no propriety be considered "an exclusive privilege or benefit conferred on the Bank of the United States by the act of incorporation;" inasmuch as that act expressly reserves to the Government, by its financial officer, the power to deposite the public moneys in other banks, if it should think proper to do so.

Let, sir, the document I have already referred to, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting to Congress the plan of the bank, be examined, and nothing can appear clearer than that the true and fundamental contract between the Government and the bank is that which I have stated—the grant of the important corporate faculties and privileges already mentioned, on the one side, and the payment of the bonus on the other. The provisions in regard to the deposite of the public moneys by the Government, and the transfer and distribution of them by the bank, were treated as being of an "incidental kind," and regarded in the light of "mutual equivalents," (the one a compensation for the other,) growing out of "the fiscal connexion between the bank and the public treasury." So long as the public moneys should be deposited in the Bank of the United States, the bank would be bound to transfer and distribute them as the exigencies of the Government should require. When they ceased to be deposited there, the bank would be relieved from that obligation. The deposits being reserved under the discretionary control of the Government, which could continue or withhold them at its pleasure, could not rationally form a part of the consideration, for which a fixed and unchangeable equivalent was to be paid in the form of a bonus.

It is, moreover, to be remarked, as is shown likewise by the important document to which I have referred, that, at the time of the establishment of the bank, the deposits of the public moneys were not regarded solely as a privilege or advantage to the bank, but also as a duty or charge. It is evident that they were not contemplated, at the time, as a source for enlarging the discounts of the bank, to the extent to which they have been actually used for that purpose. It had been stated by Mr. Gallatin, in a report made by him as Secretary of the Treasury, on the 2d of March, 1809, that "the bank" (the first bank of the United States) "has not, in any considerable degree, used the public deposits for the purpose of extending its discounts;" and the same course was, doubtless, expected of the new bank. It certainly never could have been supposed or intended, that the bank, for its own advantage, should lend out the moneys of the United States committed to its keeping, to such an extent as to be unable (as it will be hereafter shown to have been on several occasions) to meet the calls of the Government for its own funds, when required to discharge the public engagements.

But, sir, even if it could be shown, as is now contended by the bank, that the public deposits, and not the faculties and privileges conferred on it as a banking corporation, were the considerations for which it is stipulated to pay, and did pay, the bonus of a million and a half dollars, it cannot, by virtue of this alleged contract, claim the deposits further or otherwise than the terms of the contract have given them. Now, what are the terms of this alleged contract? The 18th section of the bank charter furnishes the answer: "The deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case," &c. &c. What is the true nature and extent of the right given by this section? It is an absolute and perfect right to the public deposits; or rather it is not a right to them, (if right it may be called,) only so long as the Government, by its financial organ, the Secretary of the Treasury, may not "otherwise order and direct." If it be "otherwise ordered and directed," the right, by the terms of the contract itself, ceases.

I admit that this discretionary authority in the Secretary of the Treasury is not a mere capricious volition. It is to be exercised for reasons, which shall appear to him to be sufficient, and to be reported to and judged of by Congress. But an extraordinary attempt is now made against the clear import of the language used, to limit the power to the single case of the public funds being deemed unsafe in the keeping of the bank. If such had been the intention, nothing could have been easier than to have adopted a form of expression adapted to the object, and to have declared that "the depositories, &c., shall be made in the Bank of the United States, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, consider them unsafe there." But, instead of this restricted phraseology, which would so naturally have occurred, if the intention had been such as is now supposed—the discretionary power of the Secretary is reserved in the broadest and most general terms which the language can supply—"unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct." By what astringent process of interpretation, words of so large a scope have been contracted into so narrow a meaning, I am at a loss to conceive.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has contended that a power over the depositories, even if it had been retained in the fullest manner by Congress itself, "is, from its very nature, limited solely to the safekeeping of the public funds." But, sir, if the public depositories be so important a benefit as they have been represented, to the bank, nothing seems to be more natural than that the power of withdrawing this benefit should be reserved by the Government, as a means of control over the conduct of the bank, as well as to provide for the safety of the public moneys. That such was a proper and important end of the power, seems to have been clearly the opinion of the honorable Senator himself on another occasion. While a bank bill, providing, among other things, for a subscription of twenty millions of its stock by the United States, was under consideration in the House of Representatives, of which the honorable gentleman was then a member, a motion being made to strike out so much of the bill as provided for this subscription by the United States, it was objected to the motion that the Government ought to hold a due proportion in the stock of the proposed bank, in order to guard itself against the operation of an unfriendly influence. In answer to this objection and in support of the motion, the honorable Senator, as I find in his speech reported in the volume in my hand, made the following just observation: "But there was another mean of protecting the Government against the bank, more potent and certain than any such provision. Let the United States retain the power over its depositories, and over the receipt of the bank notes in payment of duties and debts to the Government, and it would possess a sufficient control over the bank." Here, it is evident, the honorable Senator considered the power over the public depositories as an important means of control over the general conduct of the bank, as well as a necessary provision for the safety of the public funds; and in this opinion I entirely concur. The power being reserved in the broadest terms by the charter of the existing bank, it is applicable to all the rightful purposes of such a power, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in the exercise of it, may and ought to look to the general conduct of the institution, as well as to the safety of the public funds.

That such has been the uniform construction of the authority, both by the Treasury Department and by Congress, appears abundantly from the proceedings and correspondence of Mr. Crawford and Mr. Ingham on the one hand, and from the reports of the committee of Investigation in 1819, and of the Committee of Ways and Means in 1830, on the other. We must, therefore, look into the conduct of the bank, to see how far the Secretary of the Treasury is justifiable for having ordered the removal of the public depositories. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] remarked that it was not the conduct of the bank, but the conduct of the Secretary, which was under review. The honorable gentleman, however, will permit me to say that, as the justification of the Secretary depends on the reasons furnished by the conduct of the bank, for the exercise of his authority, an inquiry into the conduct of the one necessarily involves a review of the conduct of the other.

[Here Mr. CALHOUN rose, and said he did not deny the right of the Secretary to bring the conduct of the bank under review, so far as the safety of the depositories was concerned, but no farther.]

I hope I have shown, replied Mr. R., that, from the nature and terms of the authority reserved to the Secretary of the Treasury, the whole conduct of the bank, in the discharge of all its duties, is properly open to consideration; and I shall now proceed to enquire into its conduct in several instances, which appear to me to furnish ample justification for withholding from it the depositories of the public money. In confining myself to these instances, I do not wish to be understood as thinking there is nothing else in the conduct of the bank worthy of blame, or justly incurring the animadversion of the Government. On the contrary, I think there is much more; but I confine myself to those instances, because I believe that they alone are abundantly sufficient to justify the withdrawing of the depositories, and because I am unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate unnecessarily with details of this sort.

The conduct and duties of the bank, Mr. President, may be viewed in two great relations: first to the Government; second, to the community at large.

In the first of these relations, its duties are two fold—as fiscal agent of the Government, to receive and distribute the public moneys, and to have them ready for the public service, whenever and wherever they may be called for by the Government—and as a corporation, deriving its existence from the law, to observe and conform to all the conditions and securities imposed by the act of its creation. Now, sir, let us first enquire how it has performed the first named of these duties. Has it been always ready and prompt to render up the public moneys committed to its keeping, when they have been required to meet the public engagements? This consideration I hold to be of the highest importance. It is not sufficient that the public moneys should be ultimately safe in the hands of the bank, or, in other words, that the bank be ultimately solvent. But it is necessary that it should be ready to meet promptly and faithfully every call made upon it by the Government for the public funds, when required for the public service. This is daily exemplified in the affairs of private life. When an individual has accumulated a sum of money which he wishes to put out at interest, to await an expected call, or an opportunity of profitable investment, it is a leading consideration with him to put his money in the hands of some one who will not merely be able to pay in the long run, but who will pay promptly and certainly, whenever called upon.

Has the Bank of the United States, sir, displayed these fundamental qualities of promptitude and fidelity in rendering up the public funds, for the public use, when called for by the Government? I confidently appeal to the history of the postponements of the 3 per cents. redemption, to sustain me in the assertion that it has not. It is in the recollection of the Senate that, early in the spring of 1832, it had been determined to pay off six and a half millions of the 3 per cent. on the ensuing 1st day of July, and that a correspondence took place in the month of March, between the Treasury Department and the bank, with a view to that operation. It soon became evident that the bank was not in a situation to meet the operation

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

—so largely had it used the public funds in an unprecedented extension of its discounts, (as will be seen hereafter,) to promote its own interests and views. In this state of things, various pretexts and suggestions were urged by the bank to induce the Government to postpone the contemplated payment; and a postponement to the month of October, was finally yielded, the bank undertaking to pay the interest on the debt in the mean time, and holding out expectations, which it did not fulfil, of accommodations to the importing merchants to enable them the better to pay the accruing revenue to the Government. The bank has resorted to a great deal of special pleading to show that, notwithstanding the arguments it so zealously urged on the Government, it neither "sought for" nor "requested" the postponement. But what said the committee of investigation of 1832, before whom the matter was thoroughly discussed and examined? "The committee are fully of opinion that though the bank neither 'sought for' nor 'requested' the postponement" (returning thus the language of the president of the bank,) "yet if such postponement had not been made, the bank would not, on the 1st of July, have possessed the ability to have met the demand, without causing a scene of great distress in the commercial community."

Now, Mr. President, while the bank was thus unable to meet the demand of the United States for their own money, what was the state of the account between it and the public Treasury? Why, sir, on the 1st of April, 1832, when the notice was proposed to be issued of the contemplated payment, there was in the bank to the credit of the Treasury, for public moneys on deposit, the sum of $9,513,000, and on the 1st of July, when the payment was to have been made, the sum of $9,811,000, more than three millions of the public money over and above the sum proposed to have been called for!

But, sir, this was not all. When the month of July arrived, the Government determined, and issued notice of its intention to pay, on the first of October following, two-thirds of the whole amount of the 3 per cent. stock, and the remaining third on the first of January thereafter. The bank, feeling that it could not, with any plausibility, appeal to the further indulgence of the Government, but being still unprepared to meet its call for the public funds, instituted a secret negotiation, and actually consummated an arrangement with the foreign holders of the stock, not to come forward with their certificates at the periods designated, to leave the amount due to them still in the bank, on an agreement that the bank should pay them the interest, but the Government continuing bound, in consequence of the detention of the certificates, for the principal of the debt. Here the conduct of the bank, from a negative, became a positive delinquency. It was no longer a mere want of readiness and ability to pay up the public funds, when required for the public service, but an active and unwarrantable interposition, contrary to every principle of its duty as fiscal agent of the Government, to thwart it in a great object of public policy—the early and final extinguishment of the public debt.

When the existence and result of this secret negotiation became accidentally known, the bank endeavored to undo what had been agreed to be done, and to procure the surrender of the certificates, which it had previously made an arrangement to have held up. But this in no manner lessens the impropriety and unwarrantable character of the original act, and leaves the bank justly exposed to the full force of the imputations of faithlessness and illegality, which its conduct, in this transaction, has incurred. It avails as little to refer to the declaration of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, at the close of the last session of Congress, that as "the matter is now substantially closed by the surrender of nearly the whole of the certificates, it no longer presents a practical object of inquiry, or to call for or admit any action of Congress upon it." The same committee explicitly pronounced the condemnation of the transaction, in declaring, as it did, "that the bank had exceeded its legitimate authority, and had no warrant for it in the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury." In the state of the question now presented to us, this transaction being referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury as one of his reasons for ordering a removal of the public deposits, it necessarily becomes "a practical object of inquiry," demanding the serious consideration, if not "the action of Congress," and none, in my estimation, could more signally illustrate the delinquency of the bank in its relations of fiscal agent to the Government. While these secret negotiations were going on to withhold the public funds from their legitimate destination—the payment of the public debt—it appears that there was in the bank on the 1st day of October, 1832, after deducting the whole amount of debt designated for payment on that day, a clear surplus of the public revenue of $3,222,792.

Upon a calm review of these transactions, Mr. President, I think it must be admitted by all, that the bank, by an improper use of the public money for its own advantage, had disabled itself to meet, with promptitude and punctuality, the calls of the Government for the public funds committed to its keeping, that it had not only failed to have those funds forthcoming, when required for the public service, but that, by a secret and unwarrantable intervention between the Government and the public creditor, it had sought to prevent the application of those funds to the extinguishment of the public debt, and that, in both respects, it had violated its clearest duties as fiscal agent of the Government.

Let us now see if it has not equally violated the other duty indicated as appertaining to its relations to the Government—that of fulfilling the conditions and guaranties provided and imposed by the charter itself for its correct administration. The charter provides that, for the management of the affairs of the bank, there shall be twenty-five directors, of whom five are to be chosen by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and it is further provided, as a fundamental article of the constitution of the bank, that "not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business." The design of these provisions, undoubtedly, was to secure, in all the operations of the bank, an adequate and responsible representation of the interests both of the Government and of the stockholders, and such a knowledge on the part of the Government, through the directors chosen by it, of the proceedings of the bank, as would serve as a check to malpractices and abuses, and as a security for the public interests, of every kind, connected with the institution. But the actual management of the bank has been so conducted as to evade and frustrate all these essential guaranties provided by the charter for a correct administration. Instead of the affairs of the bank being transacted by a board of at least seven directors, at which every director might, and when occasion required, would be present, the most important business of the institution is transacted by small committees chosen by the President, and conducting their proceedings in secret; and from these committees, thus engrossing the active administration of the bank, the directors chosen by the Government have been systematically excluded. It is the remark, sir, of a most able and distinguished man, of one whose knowledge both of banking and finance, is unsurpassed in this, as it probably is in any other country, (Mr. Gallatin,) that "the mystery with which it was formerly thought necessary to conceal the operations of banks, has been one of the most prolific sources of erroneous opinions on that subject, and of mismanagement on their part." This dangerous and exploded mystery, the Bank of the United States has sought to revive, and, in doing so, has furnished just cause for the jealousy of the Government and the nation.

The president of the bank, according to the by-laws of the corporation, being, ex-officio, a member of these committees, as well as having the sole appointment of them, he directs and controls their proceedings at will; and his responsibility is reduced to less than a name, not only by the mystery which envelopes those proceedings, but by the fact that, through the number of proxy votes which he gives, (in violation of the spirit of the charter at least, which restricts the highest number of votes of any individual stockholder to thirty,) he chooses also what directors he pleases. In the actual administration of the bank, then, every guarantee provided by the charter is set at naught. The representation allowed to the Government in the affairs of the bank, is virtually nullified—instead of the open management of its concerns by a responsible board of directors, the most important business of the bank is transacted in the conclave of small committees controlled by the president alone; and in him, in fact, has been realized that concentration of all power in the hands of one man, (so far as the affairs of this great corporation are concerned,) the apprehension of which, in regard to the constituted authorities of the nation, has elicited so much patriotic eloquence in the progress of this debate. In whatever aspect, then, I look at the conduct of the bank in its relations with the Government, whether as fiscal agent bound to administer the public funds for the public convenience, or as a subordinate corporation created by the Government, and bound to conform to the fundamental regulations imposed by the law of its creation, I think it has equally failed in its duties, and forfeited its title to the confidence of the Government.

I will now, Mr. President, briefly inquire what has been the conduct of the bank in its relation to the community at large. In this relation its proper functions and duties are to give safe and prudent aids to sound industry and enterprise, to abstain from encouraging a spirit of wild speculation and overtrading, and, above all, to abstain from all interference with the politics of the country. This last duty was on a former occasion recognised by the president of the bank himself "as fundamental in the constitution of the bank." The inquiry in what manner the bank has discharged these duties, imposed by its relations to the community, necessarily brings under review that unprecedented extension of its accommodations to individuals from $42,402,304, to $70,428,070, in the short space of sixteen months, between 31st December, 1830, and 1st May, 1832. This extraordinary increase of bank facilities must inevitably have produced, and did produce, a most pernicious spirit of overtrading in the country. It was effected too, as we have seen, by an unwarrantable use of the public funds in the keeping of the bank, to such an extent as utterly to disable it to meet the calls of the Government for those funds, when they were required for the public engagements. But, in addition to these just and strong objections, it is alleged, both by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress, and by the President in the paper read to his cabinet, that there is every reason to believe this extraordinary expansion of the business of the bank was made with an express view to a political object—to bring more and more of the community under its power, to be exerted at the critical moment of an election, in which it felt a deep interest.

I must say, Mr. President, that this allegation is sustained by evidence of the strongest probability, while the attempts of the bank, to explain so extraordinary an expansion, on other principles, have been entirely unsatisfactory. It is true, that, in this interval, the bank received from the Government reimbursement of a loan of about eight millions, but even if it had been proper at such a period, (little more than four years before the expiration of its charter, and when it was aware of the intention of the Government to use the public deposits as fast as they accrued, in the payment of the public debt,) to re-invest this sum in the permanent form of accommodation, which, it is understood, much the greater part of this extraordinary extension of its business assumed, it surely did not require an increase of private loans to the amount of twenty-eight millions, to invest eight millions. It is also alleged by the bank, that, during this interval, it had called in its funds from Europe to an additional amount of about four millions; but it has failed to tell us, sir, why it had thus called in its foreign funds. The question would naturally occur, was it to aid in the great political operation at home attributed to it, involving, as was supposed, the critical issue of the renewal of its charter, or was it for other purposes?

We have been further told by the bank, that the years 1831 and 1832 were years of extraordinary foreign importations, and that unusual facilities of bank accommodation were required to diffuse these imports through the country. But the bank ought to have recollected that these very importations had been unduly stimulated by the improper and unprecedented extension of its discounts; and that the distinguished authority, [Mr. Rush,] whose testimonial it had vauntingly cited in reference to another question, had, in the very report from which that testimonial is extracted, declared that one of the most important duties and functions of the bank is, "by confining its issues within prudent limits, to restrain excessive importations, and to keep them within the true wants and capacities of the country."

But, sir, another most extraordinary explanation has been attempted by the bank. It says that while this expansion of its discounts was going on, and until July, 1832, when the President put his veto on the bill for re-chartering it, "it was unknown whether it [the bank] would have the least reason to be opposed to its election." Why, sir, one could not but be amused at this dramatic exhibition of political simplicity, on the part of this veteran tactician in the field of politics, if it were not for the reckless self-contradiction which accompanies it. When, sir, in the very book in which it makes this declaration, it characterises the first message of the President in December, 1829, as an assault upon the bank—when it had adopted, in November, 1830, and in March 1831, resolutions for the distribution of tracts and pamphlets, "to counteract," as it says, "the schemes for the destruction of the bank," originated in that message—when in the same book it expressly justifies those resolutions of 1830 and 1831, on the ground of self-defence against the hostile attempts of "politicians," (meaning of course the President and his friends,) to destroy the institution—that it should after these things gravely tell us it did not know, all this time, that it "would have the least reason to be opposed to the election" of the present Chief Magistrate, is certainly an extraordinary experiment upon our simplicity, if it be not an amusing display of its own.

Considering, then, Mr. President, that the attempts of the bank to explain this unprecedented increase of its discounts at the period referred to, have failed to justify it by proper and sufficient reasons—that it stands condemned, on the contrary, by sound maxims of banking, and of a safe, correct, and prudent management—but that on the other hand, the rewere obvious political motives for it, notwithstanding the professed ignorance of such by the bank—that it was coincident in point of time, with the application for a renewal of its charter, and also with the pendency of a contested election, in the issue of which its own fate was supposed to be involved, and that the part of the Union which was the principal scene of the bank operation, was at the same time the debatable ground of the political contest: when all these circumstances are considered, it does seem to me to be difficult to resist the impression that this extraordinary operation of the bank was directed to a political object—an impression strongly confirmed by the unequivocal manifestation of a political spirit by the bank in other of its proceedings. I allude, of course, to the active devotion of the funds of the bank, under resolutions giving the President an unlimited control over them for that purpose, to the "preparation and circulation" of pamphlets and other writings; which, whatever may be the disguise in which they are sent forth, have been, many of them, party publications of the most acrimonious character.

These proceedings have been attempted to be justified on the ground of self-defence. But there is a radical fallacy in the appropriation of this plea by the bank. The bank has no right to consider itself a party to the question of the renewal of its charter. It is a great question of national policy, to be decided by high considerations of the public good, in which the interest of the bank, as such, cannot legitimately enter, in the slightest degree. Like every other public question, its discussion and its decision should be freely left to the constitutional organs of the public will, and to the ordinary and copious channels of public information; that public interest, which should alone govern its decision, being an ample guarantee that every argument and consideration in favor of the bank, which either justice or policy could suggest, would be fully presented to the public mind. On that ground the bank especially had every reason to be content to stand. A majority of both Houses of Congress had declared themselves in favor of a renewal of its charter—the larger portion of the press was also favorable to the same object. There was no danger, then, that its side of the question would not be fully presented to the nation, through the usual and legitimate modes of enlightening public opinion, without its coming forward, with its vast preponderance of moneyed power, to operate in the cause.

But even those who have attempted a justification of these proceedings of the bank, have admitted that the publications "prepared and circulated," under its patronage, should be limited to a defence of its conduct. What, however, have been the character of many of those publications? The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] gave us, a few days ago, some idea of the tone and spirit of one of them, "the addresses to members of the State Legislatures," of which some hundred thousands of copies, it seems, had been circulated by the bank, a portion of which, under its all-pervading agency, had found their way into the retired valleys and mountain hollows of his own State. The drift and object of these were plainly to operate on pending elections, by every species of appeal which might be made available for the purpose. We have been presented, sir, in another quarter, [Mr. POLK, in the House of Representatives,] with specimens of others of these publications, disseminated, in like manner, far and wide, by the potent influence of the money of the bank—judging of which, by the specimens given, we must all acknowledge them to be in the bitterest and most inflammatory style of party denunciation and invective; seeking much more to rouse and enlist the passions and prejudices of the people in the party contests of the day, than to enlighten and convince their judgments as "to the nature and operations of the bank."

But, sir, I will not pursue these details. The fact, which they serve to illustrate, is manifest, and known to all. The bank has openly entered the political arena as a partisan—a great moneyed corporation, contrary to the ends of its institution, and in violation of its clearest duties, vests in the hands of its presiding officer an unlimited and irresponsible control over its vast funds, to enlist the co-operation of the press, through it and by other means, to influence the elections, and thus, if possible, to mould the action of the Government to its interested and ambitious purposes. If an example of such "fearful omen" to the morals and liberties of the country could have passed without the stern and indignant rebuke it has met from the Government and the people, it would have marked, indeed, a fatal degeneracy.

From this general review of the conduct of the bank, in its various relations to the public, I hope I have shown, Mr. President, that it, at least, has no just cause to complain of the animadversion with which it has been visited in the removal of the public depositories. I trust also, sir, that I have shown that in the act of the Secretary of the Treasury, ordering that removal, there was no want of legal authority. Here, then, believing as I do, that our highest duties to the constitution and to the public liberties forbid our doing any thing, not required by law and justice, which would tend to strengthen this dangerous and unconstitutional institution, (and such, I think, would be the inevitable tendency of a restoration of the depositories,) I might have been content to terminate my view of the subject. But grave questions of constitutional law have been made in regard to the rights and powers of the Chief Executive officer on this occasion, which ought not to be shunned. Questions of this sort, whenever they arise, should be firmly met, and fully and fairly canvassed, as nothing can be of deeper interest to the people and to the States of this confederacy, than the ascertainment of the true principles of that Constitution which they have "ordained and established."

On this branch of the subject, there is a discrepancy of opinion among those who have, nevertheless, united in censuring the conduct of the administration. I understand the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] distinctly to admit the constitutional power of the President to superintend and control, if necessary, the action of the Treasury Department, in reference to this question; while the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] utterly denies this power, and considers the conduct of the President as a palpable usurpation. [Here Mr. CALHOUN rose and said, that though he did not consider the conduct of the President an usurpation, he considered it a gross abuse of power.] Sir, (said Mr. R.) the only question presented by the resolutions under consideration, is a question of the existence, not of the abuse of power. These resolutions directly affirm that the President "had assumed the exercise of a power not granted by the constitution and laws." Whether the conduct of the President was, under the circumstances of the case, an abuse, depends upon what had been the conduct of the institution whose supervision was intrusted to a department declared by the Senator from South Carolina to be under the superintendence and control of the President; and if the views which I have already presented, of the conduct of that institution, have any foundation, all will agree that if the President possessed the power, the occasion had occurred when it ought to be exercised.

I will now, Mr. President, examine the several positions taken by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] in relation to this question of constitutional power. The honorable Senator affirms that, by what has been done with regard to the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States, the Executive has usurped the power over the Treasury and the public purse, which the constitution has exclusively vested in the Legislative Department. In enforcing this position, sir, he has presented to us, with his characteristic eloquence, the alarming consequences of an union of the power of the sword and of the purse in the same hands. As no topic is better calculated to arouse the jealousies of a free people than this, it becomes us to analyze and examine it, and to see how far it has any just application to the subject under consideration. Sir, it is a great maxim of constitutional liberty, in that country from which we have derived so many of our institutions, that the powers of the sword and the purse should be kept separate and distinct; and as the maxim comes to us from thence, we cannot better ascertain its scope and meaning, than by seeing how it is understood and practised there. In England, the power of the sword is in the hands of the King. He can declare war, make peace, raise armies, equip fleets. But the supplies for the prosecution of the war, for the support of the army and navy, can be obtained only by a vote of Parliament; and thus the power of the purse is lodged in the hands of the representatives of the people. This is considered the great security of English liberty—that the King, who holds the power of the sword, has no power over the public purse. But what is this power of the purse, which is thus jealously and wisely withheld from the Executive Magistrate? Why, sir, evidently the power of drawing money from the pockets of the people, and of designating the objects to which it shall be applied.

The power of the purse, then, of which we have heard so much in the course of this discussion, and so much, I must be permitted to say, that is vague and indeterminate, is, in the true constitutional sense, the power of taxation and appropriation—the power of raising money by taxes, of determining in what manner and to what amount they shall be raised, and to what objects they shall be applied. This great power here, as in England, is exclusively vested, as it ought to be, in the immediate representatives of the people. The constitution expressly declares that “Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts,” &c. and that “no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.” These are the provisions of the constitution which confer and define the power of the purse. But while the general powers to raise and appropriate money for the public service were vested in Congress, it certainly never could have been intended that Congress itself was to collect, to receive, to keep, to disburse, the public money. These are subordinate ministerial functions, which must, of necessity, be performed by Executive agents, under the general provision of the law. In England, sir, where, as we have been, the power of the purse is fully and effectually vested in Parliament, it is, nevertheless, the Exchequer and the Treasury, Executive departments, which manage the collection and expenditure of the public revenue, under authority of law. So with us, sir, the ministerial, functions of collecting, receiving, keeping, disbursing the public money, have been invariably devolved on the Executive officers of the Government.

It is true, sir, that Congress, in the exercise of its legislative powers, may and ought to, (as far as is consistent with the public interests, which might in certain cases require a discretionary power to be lodged with the Executive,) prescribe a place of deposit for the public moneys, when collected; but if no such prescription be made by the legislative authority, it devolves necessarily on the Executive department charged with the collection and safe-keeping of the public moneys, to determine where they shall be deposited and kept. Such was the case, in the most unlimited sense, previous to the passage of an act in 1800, which required that, at certain places, the bonds taken for the payment of duties should be deposited in the Bank of the United States, or its branches, for collection. Before that time, the Treasury Department caused the public moneys to be deposited wherever it thought proper—in some instances in the hands of public officers; in others, in the State Banks, and in others again, in the Bank of the United States and its branches. This it did at its perfect discretion, without its ever being imagined that, in so doing, it encroached on that power of the purse, which the constitution had lodged in other hands.

When the present Bank of the United States was established, its charter contained a provision that the deposits of the public money should be made in it or its branches, unless the Secretary should, at any time, otherwise order and direct. If the Secretary of the Treasury, in the exercise of the discretion thus reserved to him by law, should order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere, he certainly usurps no legislative power over the public purse. He merely executes a subsidiary trust in regard to the place of keeping the public moneys, which has been expressly confided to him by the legislative department itself.

But, sir, it has been argued that by the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, with the provision abovementioned, the bank was, in effect, constituted the Treasury of the United States, and that, in removing the public deposits from the bank, money had been drawn from the Treasury, in violation of the constitutional declaration on that subject. If the act incorporating the bank could, by possibility, have had the effect attributed to it, of converting the bank, by some strange metamorphosis, into the national Treasury, still it became the Treasury sub modo only—that is, only so long as the Secretary might not order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere. When the Secretary should order the public moneys to be deposited elsewhere, then, in virtue of the very provision referred to, the bank ceased to be the Treasury. But there is a total want of logical precision in this notion of the Treasury. The error is in annexing an idea of fixed locality to it; whereas, in the true constitutional and financial sense, it is not a place, but a state or condition. It is the condition of moneys belonging to the Government, and being in the custody or legal possession of the officer charged with their safe keeping. Wherever moneys are placed to the credit, and subjected to the control, of the public Treasurer, there they are, both in legal and common intendment, in the public Treasury.

In a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 9th of January, 1811, I find the term used in such a way as to show conclusively the sense in which it is habitually employed in the finances of the Government. A resolution had been adopted by the House of Representatives, on the 19th December, 1810, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, among other things, to report “what will be the probable amount of the deposits in favor of the United States in any of the said banks,” (United States and State,) “or their branches, and which of them, on the 1st of March, 1811.” The Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to this call, reported: “It is probable the amount of specie in the Treasury will, on the 1st day of March next, exceed $2,500,000, and that the proportion deposited in the banks, other than that of the United States and its branches, will not materially vary from what it is at present.” Here we see, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury speaks of the whole of this sum, though distributed in various banks, both of the United States and the States, as being in the Treasury, because, whether in one or the other, it was equally in the legal custody and under the control of the Treasurer.

A similar illustration is furnished by the very law establishing the Treasury Department. The 4th section of that act declares that “all receipts for moneys received by him” (the Treasurer) “shall be endorsed upon warrants signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, without which warrant so signed no acknowledgment for money received into the public Treasury shall be valid.” Here, it will be perceived that the receipt given by the Treasurer (endorsed on the warrant signed by the Secretary of the Treasury) is treated as synonymous with receipt into the public Treasury. When the Treasurer thus executes his receipt, the money, wherever it may be, stands to his credit and is subject to his control, and is consequently in the public Treasury. It continues in the public Treasury so long as it stands in his name, though, in the mean time, it may be repeatedly shifted from place to place; and it goes out of the Treasury only when it passes from him to some creditor of the Government, to whom it is paid under a warrant of disbursement. Another illustration of the same kind is furnished by that clause of the act which makes it the duty of the Treasurer, on the third day of every session of Congress, "to lay before them a true and perfect account of the state of the Treasury;" by which, certainly, it is not meant that he should lay before Congress an account of the state of any bank or other place where the public moneys may be deposited, but "the amount of the public moneys, where-soever deposited."

I fear, Mr. President, that I may have been a little minute in these explanations; but, sir, the charge of violating the public Treasury, and of eloiing the public money, is a very grave one, and might well justify the tediousness of a little detail in developing a misconception and confusion of ideas, on which alone the charge rests. If these explanations have not been entirely fruitless, I may now confidently appeal to gentlemen to say, where is there any thing to give even a color of plausibility to the charge that the public moneys, in being removed from the Bank of the United States to other places of deposit, have been taken out of the public Treasury? Are they not still (and equally as before their removal) in that legal and responsible custody of the Treasurer, which constitutes, in fact, the public Treasury? Do they not stand in his name and to his credit in the State banks, as they did in the United States Bank? Are they any more accessible to misapplication or unauthorized uses now than they were then? Are they exempted, where they are, from any of the safeguards and barriers which the law and the constitution have thrown around the public moneys? Can you reach them, in the State banks, any more than in the United States Bank, without those precautionary forms which have been established for the protection of the public Treasury? Can a single shilling be disbursed now, any more than heretofore, without warrant drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register! And yet, sir, from the sweeping and vehement denunciations we have heard, one would suppose that the whole public treasure was now at the unlimited disposition of the President, to be expended by him in any way and for any purpose he might choose, free from all restraint of law and form of law.

To what a degree, sir, must the sagacious mind of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] have been inflamed by a gratuitous, however patriotic, indignation against the President, to have invoked, as applicable to this occasion, the solemn warning of Patrick Henry in the Virginia Convention, against the union of the purse and the sword, which that gifted orator and patriot pronounced to be destructive of freedom. Glowing, sir, as was the imagination, and fervid as the oratory of that great man, he never could have seen, in the simple ministerial operation of transferring the public moneys from one place of deposit to another, in pursuance of an authority given by law, that formidable assumption of the power of the purse, which, united with that of the sword, he denounced as fatal to liberty. If the honorable Senator had read a few brief sentences immediately preceding the passage he quoted, he would have seen in what sense Mr. Henry spoke of the power of the purse and the sword. He would have seen that Mr. Henry, uncompromising adversary as he was of the new constitution, was arguing against the powers proposed to be vested in Congress, of taxation, of raising armies, and of control over the militia. What said the orator, sir? "Congress by the power of taxation, by that of raising an army, and by their control over the other. Shall we be safe without either? Congress have an unlimited power over both—they are entirely given up by us." Then followed, in immediate juxtaposition, the passage quoted by the honorable Senator. "Let any one candidly tell me when and where did freedom exist when the sword and the purse were given up from the people," &c.

It is obvious, then, Mr. President, that Patrick Henry spoke of the power of the purse in the sense in which I have already explained it, as the great power of taxation and its incident, that of appropriation—and not the subordinate ministerial functions of collecting, receiving, keeping, depositing, the public moneys, under authority of law. We see, also, in what sense he spoke of the power of the sword, as that of raising armies, and of general control over the military force of the country. It is in this sense, as we have seen, that the King of England is said to hold the power of the sword. But there is no color, not the slightest, for saying that the President of the United States holds the power of the sword. He cannot raise armies, equip fleets, declare war, organize, arm, discipline, and call forth the militia. All these powers, which constitute the power of the sword, are expressly vested in Congress. He is, by the constitution, it is true, commander-in-chief of the army when it is raised and of the militia when they are called forth by Congress; but this no more gives him the power of the sword in the true political sense, than the function devolved upon executive agents of collecting and receiving the public taxes, after they have been imposed by Congress, gives him the power of the purse. This ominous conjunction of the sword and the purse, then, in the hands of the President, is a creation of the imagination, which, like other "raw heads and bloody bones" of the day, can frighten only while it is unapproached and unexamined.

[Here Mr. CLAY rose and said, if the Senator will inspect the passage, the expression will satisfy him, that it has some pertinency. Patrick Henry was against the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of the General Government; it was the whole power of the country; and under such an union, liberty was gone. My argument was that if, when the purse and the sword are in the hands of the entire Government, checked and balanced as it is, by means of its various departments, there is still danger, how much more immense when they are in the hands of one of them, when all did not furnish a competent security for liberty? Mr. C. also, said, that in his remarks on the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of the President, he did not allude solely to his seizure of the public money, but to the power which he had claimed and exercised, of saying to one Secretary "You must get out of office, if you will not do as I bid you," and to another officer, "I dismiss you, unless you consent to be governed and controlled by me."]

It still seems to me, [continued Mr. CLAY,] that the honorable Senator has failed to show the applicability of his quotation from Patrick Henry, to the power exercised in the removal of the deposites. The honorable Senator now recognizes the broad and only true sense in which Mr. Henry spoke of the powers of the purse and the sword, and argues if those powers, when possessed by the whole Government, were thus dangerous to liberty, how much more so must they be when united in the hands of a single branch of the Government. To make this reasoning just, then, and the quotation applicable, it must be shown that, in the same sense in which those powers are possessed by the whole Government, or rather by Congress, they have been exercised or attempted to be exercised by the President. But, surely, sir, the honorable Senator will not contend that the President has exercised or attempted to exercise the power of taxation, which Mr. Henry spoke of as the power of the purse, or, on the other hand, that he has exercised, or attempted to exercise the power of raising armies and calling forth the militia, which Mr. Henry considered the power of the sword.

In regard to the other portion of the honorable Senator's observations, touching the abuses which the President might commit, in saying first to one, and then to another Secretary, that if you will not do so and so, I will turn you out of office, I can only say that the argument comes just forty-five years too late. In the very first Congress which met under the constitution, it was decided, upon the fullest consideration, that the President, according to the true principles of that instrument, possessed the power of removal from office, and that power was expressly recognised in the acts constituting the Executive Departments. The very argument which the honorable Senator now uses, and every other which he has so earnestly pressed on this branch of the subject derived from possible abuses, was then repeatedly and strongly urged against the power of removal in the President. But they were all over-ruled, on the ground that the Constitution, in "vesting the executive power in the President," had made him responsible for the conduct of the Executive officers employed under him, whom, therefore, he ought to have the power to control, and that this responsibility of the President, thus established, was, in fact, to use the language of Mr. Madison, the highest security "for liberty and the public good."

But, sir, this matter deserves a fuller examination, and brings under review some opinions expressed by the honorable Senator a few days ago, which, as they involve the fundamental theory of the constitution in regard to the Executive branch of the Government, I will proceed to consider more in detail. The honorable Senator took especial exception to the principle asserted by the President in the paper read by him to his cabinet—"that the constitution has devolved upon him the duty of superintending the operation of the Executive Departments." He contended that the constitution had given him no such power—that by law those departments may, and in certain cases have been, placed under the superintendence and direction of the President—that so far, and no farther, he has, by law, the superintendence of their operations; but that the constitution has devolved on the President no right of superintendence over the Executive Departments.

Now, sir, on this assertion, I must respectfully join issue with the honorable Senator; and I call to witness the fathers of the constitution, and those who have had the largest and most enlightened experience in the administration of its highest trusts. The fundamental theory of the constitution, in regard to the Executive power, is, 1st, its unity, 2dly, its responsibility; to secure which last, in an undivided and the most efficient manner, was the great argument in favor of the first. In government of the monarchical kind, the Executive head is exempt from all responsibility. But in our republican constitution, the chief Executive Magistrate is under a triple responsibility, through the medium of election, of impeachment, and of prosecution in the common course of law. He is not only responsible for his personal acts, but the "Executive power being vested in him," he is responsible for the whole Executive Department; and this responsibility of the President was considered the great security for the proper and safe administration of that Department. Mr. Madison, in the debates which took place in '89 on the President's power of removal, said, "It is evidently the intention of the constitution that the First Magistrate should be responsible for the Executive Department." Again, in the course of the same debate, he said, "The principle of unity and responsibility in the Executive Department, is intended for the security of liberty and the public good."

The President being thus responsible by the constitution for the conduct of the Executive officers, he has, from the constitution also, as a necessary consequence, the right to inspect, superintend, and control their proceedings: and this right of superintendence is expressly and repeatedly recognised, on constitutional grounds, in the great debate in the first Congress, to which I have already referred. I will give a few only, of many similar extracts, in which it will be seen that this right of superintendence, as a constitutional right, is distinctly and unequivocally asserted. Mr. Madison said, "is there no danger that an officer, when he is appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, and has friends in that body, may choose to risk his establishment on the favor of that branch rather than rest it upon the discharge of his duties to the satisfaction of the Executive branch, which is constitutionally authorised to inspect and control his conduct!"

Mr. Lawrence: "In the constitution, the heads of Departments are considered as the mere assistants of the President in the performance of his executive duties. He has the superintendence, the control, and the inspection, of their conduct," &c. &c.

Mr. Ames: "The executive powers [are delegated,] (of course, by the constitution) 'to the President, with a view to have a responsible officer to superintend, control, inspect, and check, the officers necessarily employed in administering the law.'"

We see, then, Mr. President, that throughout these debates, which, as a contemporaneous exposition, as well as from the distinguished ability of the men who participated in them, must be regarded as an authority of the highest order, that the right of the President to superintend the Executive departments, was treated as a right flowing from the fountain of the constitution itself, and existing anterior to, and independent of legislative provision. Sir, that this is the true character of the right, nothing could more strikingly show than the form in which the question of the Presidential power of removal was finally settled by the Congress, whose debates are here referred to. In the original shape of the bills for the organization of the Executive Departments it was provided that such and such Secretaries should be appointed, "to be removable by the President." It was suggested, however, that a clause of this sort might be considered as implying that the power of removal was granted by the law. To preclude such an influence, it was proposed to substitute a mere incidental recognition of the power, serving to show that the power was considered a pre-existing one derived from the constitution and not from the law; and this was done in the section providing for cases of vacancy in the head of the Department, by a simple declaration that "whenever the principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of the records, &c. &c. of the department. The original clause was stricken out, and this incidental recognition of the power substituted, as will be seen by reference to the acts constituting the Executive Departments; and this was done expressly on the ground, which the language sufficiently imports, that the power of removal from office by the President, was a pre-existing power, flowing from the constitution, and not derived from the law. The power of superintendence, involved in that of removal, stands as we have seen, on the same ground.

Sir, I beg leave now to call the attention of the Senate to an authority which, as that of one of the earliest and most uncompromising foes of tyranny, and the great champion of popular rights, as he is the acknowledged founder of the democratic party in this country, cannot fail, I trust, to command the respect of those who, like the honorable Senator from Kentucky, profess to be fighting the battles of liberty on this floor. I allude, of course, to Mr. Jefferson. While no one more steadily opposed the undue accumulation of power in the hands of the chief Executive Magistrate, it will be seen that no one more unequivocally maintained the constitutional right of the President to superintend and control the action of the Executive Departments. I will read, sir, an extract from a letter addressed by him to M. de Tracy, the author of an able and enlightened commentary on the great work of Montesquieu. He is expressing his difference of opinion from M. de Tracy on the question of a plural or single Executive, declares a decided preference for the latter, and after appealing to the history of the French Directory to show the evils and disadvantages of the former, he proceeds to notice the organization of our single Executive thus:

"The failure of the French Directory, and from the same cause, seems to have authorized a belief that the form of a plurality, however promising in theory, is impracticable, with men constituted with the ordinary passions: while the tranquil and steady tenor of our single Executive, during a course of twenty-two years of the most tempestuous times the history of the world has ever presented, gives a rational hope that this important problem is at length solved. Aided by the counsels of a cabinet of heads of Departments, originally four, but now five, with whom the President consults, either singly or all together, he has the benefit of their wisdom and information, brings their views to one centre, and produces an unity of action and direction in all the branches of the Government. The excellence of this construction of the Executive power has already manifested itself here under very opposite circumstances. During the administration of our first President, his cabinet of four members was equally divided, by as marked an opposition of principle as monarchism and republicanism could bring into conflict. Had that Cabinet been a Directory, like positive and negative quantities in algebra, the opposing wills would have balanced each other, and produced a state of absolute inaction. But the President heard with calmness the opinions and reasons of each, decided the course to be pursued, and kept the Government steadily in it, unaffected by the agitation. The public knew well the dissensions in the Cabinet, but never had an uneasy thought on their account; because they knew also they had a regulating power, which would keep the machine in a steady movement."

This passage, sir, requires no comment. It is evident that Mr. Jefferson considered the power of the President to control and "decide the course to be pursued by each" of the Departments, as the fundamental principle of our Executive organization—that it only can secure the necessary "unity of action and direction in all the branches" of the Executive administration—and that, in short, it is the "regulating power which keeps the whole machine in steady movement." In a subsequent part of the same letter, he speaks of "this power of decision in the President, as that which alike excludes internal dissensions, and repels external intrigues."

[Mr. CLAY here enquired of Mr. RIVZ, if this letter was written before or after Mr. Jefferson was President.]

Mr. RIVZ answered that it was written in January, 1811, in the philosophical retirement of Monticello, when he had withdrawn from all the disturbing scenes of public life and, as a patriot and sage, employed his leisure in meditating the lessons of his long experience, and recording them for the instruction of posterity. But, lest the honorable Senator may suppose, (as his question seems to imply,) that the possession of power had given an undue bias to the mind of Mr. Jefferson, (than whom there never lived a man more thoroughly imbued with an innate love of liberty,) he shall speak for himself. In the letter from which I have already quoted, he uses the following language:

"I am not conscious that my participations in Executive authority have produced any bias in favor of a single Executive; because the parts I have acted have been in the subordinate, as well as superior stations, and because, if I know myself, what I have felt and what I have wished, I know I have never been so well pleased as when I could shift power from my own on the shoulders of others; nor have I ever been able to conceive how any rational being could propose happiness to himself from the exercise of power over others."

In the letter from which I have read, we have seen Mr. Jefferson's theory of the constitution with regard to the Executive, and the practice of Washington. Let us now see, sir, the principles upon which he conducted his own administration of this high office. In a few months after his accession to the Presidency, in November 1801, he addressed a circular to the Heads of Departments, the members of his Cabinet, for the purpose of laying down the rules which were to govern the official relations between him and those Departments. He begins with repeating what was the practice, in this respect, of General Washington's administration, of which he had himself been a member—that the several Heads of Departments regularly transmitted to the President the communications addressed to them in relation to the concerns of their respective offices, with the answers proposed by them to be made, and received from him, in return, the signification of his approbation, or else the suggestion of such alterations as he might think necessary—and then proceeds: "By this means, he was always in accurate possession of all facts and proceedings in every part of the Union, and to whatsoever Department they related; he formed a central point for the different branches, preserved an unity" (this despotism unity again, sir!) "of object and action among them; exercised that participation in the gestion of affairs which his office made incumbent on him; and met himself the due responsibility," (General Washington and Mr. Jefferson too, it seems, were so reckless and daring as to meet the responsibility of their offices,) "for whatever was done. During Mr. Adams's administration, his long and habitual absences from the Seat of Government rendered this kind of communication impracticable, removed him from any share in the transaction of affairs, and parcelled out the Government, in fact, among four independent heads, drawing sometimes in opposite directions." He then expresses his intention to adhere to the system, in this respect, of Washington, and adds—"my sole motives are those before expressed, as governing the first administration in chalking out the rules of their proceedings; adding to them only a sense of the obligation imposed on me by the public will to meet personally the duties to which they have appointed me."

Here, sir, we have the interpretation of Washington and Jefferson, in the most authentic of all forms, (their own practice,) of the duties and powers of the Presidential office, creating in the Chief Magistrate himself a responsibility "for whatever is done" in any of the Executive Departments, and giving him, by consequence, a power to superintend, control, and shape the action of those Departments. To these high constitutional models, realizing the well-ordered unity and responsibility of a single Executive, the present Chief Magistrate has sought to conform his administration, rather than by indolence, neglect, or shrinking from responsibility, to parcel out the Government among five or six independent Heads of Departments, thus converting it into a discordant and practically irresponsible directory.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky has also taken exception to the President's reference to the clause of the constitution which declares "the President shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" the President having referred to it as giving him the power to superintend and direct the conduct and operations of the Executive Departments. The honorable Senator contends that the true and sole operation of this clause is to empower the President, when the laws are forcibly resisted, to overcome that resistance by force. He says that he has made, and caused to be made, numerous researches into the contemporaneous constructions of the constitution, and that he can find nowhere any color for the President's interpretation. Now, sir, I must be permitted to say that the honorable Senator's interpretation of this clause is far more latitudinarian than that of the President, and ascribes to it an operation infinitely more dangerous and extensive. The President, sir, has no power of himself, under the constitution, to execute the laws by force. This depends upon Congress, to whom the power is expressly given to "call forth the militia to execute the laws," &c. It is true, the President, by the constitution, is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and of the militia, when called into actual service; but, as such, he is a mere instrument in the hands of Congress, by whom the objects and purposes for which he is to employ the forces under his command must first be designated.

The construction of the honorable Senator, then, is one of far more dangerous latitude than that of the President. The clause in question, sir, can have no reference to the execution of the laws by force, which is a matter exclusively under the control of Congress. It must refer to the faithful execution of the laws by other means—by the intervention of officers appointed for the purpose, whose fidelity in the discharge of their duties may be secured by the superintendence of the chief Executive officer. The honorable Senator has said, that in the various researches he has made, and caused to be made, he has found no trace of this construction. If he had taken the trouble to turn to the most obvious source of information on the subject—the proceedings and debates of the first Congress on the organization of the Executive Departments—he could not have failed to see that this clause was appealed to in the sense, and for the purpose, which the President has done. I will not fatigue the Senate by multiplying citations from a portion of our legislative and constitutional history, which is, doubtless familiar to the minds of all, but will content myself with one or two brief extracts from a speech of Mr. Madison on that occasion, an authority for which I know the honorable Senator from Kentucky entertains, as all must, the highest respect. While discussing the question of the President's power of removal from office, he says, "But there is another part of the constitution which inclines, in my judgment, to favor the construction I put upon it; the President is required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If the duty to see the laws faithfully executed be required at the hands of the Executive Magistrate, it would seem that it was generally intended he should have that species of power which is necessary to accomplish that end. Now, if the officer, when once appointed, is not to depend upon the President for his official existence, but upon a distinct body, I confess I do not see how the President can take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Again, in the same speech: he says, "I conceive that the President is sufficiently accountable to the community; and if this power is vested in him, it will be vested where its nature requires it should be vested; if any thing in its nature is executive, it must be that power which is employed in superintending and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed; the laws cannot be executed but by officers appointed for that purpose; therefore, those who are over such officers naturally possess the executive power." It is obvious then, that Mr. Madison viewed that clause in the light in which it has been referred to by the President; that the faithful execution of the laws committed to him was to be effected by "officers appointed for that purpose," and that fidelity in the discharge of their duties was to be secured by a power of superintendence and control over them on the part of the Chief Magistrate, who was made responsible for their conduct, and specially charged with the duty of seeing that the laws be faithfully executed.

I will now, Mr. President, advert to an argument of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which, I confess, struck me with considerable surprise. In order to sustain his position that the constitution had not given the President a power of superintendence and control over the Executive Departments, he contended that, in certain cases, the heads of those Departments were responsible to, and compellable to act by the courts of justice; and, in support of this principle, he relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury and Madison, an extract of which he read to the Senate. I was the more surprised, sir, at the doctrine and the authority coming from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, because he professes an adhesion to the creed of the republican party of that day; and yet it may be confidently affirmed that there never was a decision of that tribunal which gave more dissatisfaction to the republican party, than that did, and especially to the great chief and leader of the party, who has recorded, in various parts of his writings, the most earnest and energetic condemnation of it. With all the deference I entertain for that exalted tribunal, I must say that the doctrines of Marbury and Madison appear to me utterly unsustainable, and such, I believe, would be the judgment of all parties at the present day. The Senate, sir, doubtless recollect the circumstances of the case. Mr. Adams, on the eve of quitting the Presidency, had appointed, with the concurrence of the Senate, numerous officers, and, among others, certain justices of the peace for this district. Their commissions had been signed by him, and the seal of State, perhaps, affixed to them; but they had not been delivered to the parties, when Mr. Jefferson came into office. Mr. Jefferson finding them still in the Department of State, when he succeeded to the Presidency, and considering the appointments either as improper in themselves, or improperly made, and that commissions, like deeds, were incomplete and revocable till delivery, determined to withhold them. The parties applied to the Supreme Court for a mandamus, directed to Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, to compel the delivery of the commissions. The Court decided that, though they had no jurisdiction to grant a mandamus in the case, (it not being embraced among those cases of original jurisdiction committed to them,) yet that the parties had acquired, by the signing and sealing of the commissions, without delivery, an absolute and legal right to the offices in question, which might be enforced against an independent department of the Government by a judicial tribunal.

I must leave it to Mr. Jefferson, in his own strong language, and with a reasoning which appears to me irresistible, to show the fundamental and dangerous errors of this decision, now relied on by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. In a letter addressed to Mr. Hay, attorney of the United States for the District of Virginia, during the progress of Burr's trial, at Richmond, he writes thus:

"I observe that the case of Marbury vs. Madison has been cited, and I think it material to stop at the threshold the citing that case as authority, and to have it denied to be law. 1. Because the judges, in the outset, disclaimed all cognizance of the case; although they then went on to say what would have been their opinion had they had cognizance of it. This, then, was confessedly an extra-judicial opinion, and, as such, of no authority. 2. Because, had it been judicially pronounced, it would have been against law; for, to a commission, a deed, a bond, delivery is essential to give validity. Until, therefore, the commission is delivered out of the hands of the Executive and his agents, it is not his deed. He may withhold or cancel it at pleasure, as he might his private deed in the same situation. The constitution intended that the three great branches of the Government should be co-ordinate, and independent of each other. As to acts, therefore, which are to be done by either, it has given no control to another branch.

"The Executive and Senate act on the construction that until delivery from the Executive Department, a commission is in their possession and within their rightful power; and in cases of commissions not revocable at will, where, after the Senate's approbation, and the President's signing and sealing, new information of the unfitness of the person has come to hand before the delivery of the commission, new nominations have been made and approved, and new commissions have issued.

"On this construction, I have hitherto acted; on this I shall ever act, and maintain it with the powers of the Government against any control which may be attempted by the judges in subversion of the independence of the Executive and Senate within their peculiar department."

This answer of Mr. Jefferson, sir, to the Supreme Court, appears to me to be conclusive and irrefragable. It shows that the doctrine of Marbury vs. Madison was wrong, not merely with regard to the merits of the particular case, but dangerously wrong in another aspect, in asserting a claim of the judiciary (which is now reiterated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky) to control an independent branch of the Government in matters confided by the constitution to its separate and responsible action. As this last aspect of the decision involves a question of the gravest import—one affecting that fundamental principle, not merely of our constitution, but of free government in general, which prescribes the separation and mutual independence of the three great departments, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial—a question too, in regard to which the imputed opinions of the present Chief Magistrate have been freely commented upon in the course of this discussion, I beg permission of the Senate, while I have the writings of Mr. Jefferson in my hand, to read what was uttered by this great Republican Oracle on this important subject. In a letter addressed by him, in 1819, to Judge Ivoane, himself one of the most profound constitutional jurists of our country, he expressed himself thus:—"My construction of the constitution is very different from that you quote. It is, that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially where it is to act ultimately and without appeal. I will explain myself by examples which, having occurred while I was in office, are better known to me, and the principles which governed them. A Legislature had passed the sedition law. The federal courts had subjected certain individuals to its penalties, of fine and imprisonment. On coming into office, I released the individuals by the power of pardon, committed to Executive discretion, which could never be more properly exercised than where citizens were suffering without the authority of law, or, which was equivalent, under a law unauthorized by the constitution, and therefore null. In the case of Marbury and Madison, the federal judges declared that commissions signed and sealed by the President, were valid, although not delivered. I deem delivery essential to complete a deed, which, as long as it remains in the hands of the party, is as yet no deed; it is in posse only, but not in esse, and I withheld delivery of the commissions." (Yes, sir, I, the President, not the Secretary, withheld the commissions.) "They cannot issue a mandamus to the President or Legislature, or to any of their officers—(the constitution controlling the common law in this particularly.) When the British treaty of 1807, arrived, without any provision against impressment of our seamen, I determined not to ratify it. The Senate thought I should ask their advice. I thought that would be a mockery of them, when I was predetermined against following it, should they advise its ratification. The constitution had made their advice necessary to confirm a treaty, but not to reject it. This has been blamed by some; but I have never doubted its soundness. In the cases of two persons, Antenati, under exactly similar circumstances, the federal court had determined that one of them (Duane) was not a citizen; the House of Representatives, nevertheless, determined that the other, (Smith, of South Carolina,) was a citizen, and admitted him to a seat in their body. Duane was a republican, and Smith a federalist, and these decisions were during the federal ascendancy. These are examples of my position, that each of the three departments has equally the right to decide for itself what is its duty under the constitution, without any regard to what the others may have decided for themselves under a similar question."

Without entering at this time, sir, into any discussion of those important principles, I will only say, that if the present Chief Magistrate has sinned against the constitution by any doctrines which he has advanced, or is supposed to entertain, on this subject, he has sinned in company with the great apostle of American liberty and of the rights of man.

To sum up, then, in a few words, the results of what has been said, I think it has been shown that, according to the true theory of the constitution, the President of the United States, in whom the "executive power is vested," is made responsible for the conduct and proceedings of all the Executive Departments—that, as a necessary consequence of that responsibility, he has a constitutional right to inspect, superintend, and control, the operations of those Departments—and that at the very organization of the Government, immediately succeeding the adoption of the constitution, the correctness of these principles was acknowledged in the most formal manner, and after the fullest discussion, by an explicit recognition of the power of the President to remove from office any of the functionaries of the Executive Departments—a power which has never since been questioned.

But, to avoid the application of these principles to the subject under consideration, the extraordinary novelty has been advanced that the Secretary of the Treasury is not an executive officer. How then has it happened, Mr. President, that, from the origin of the Government to the present day, he has been associated with the Heads of the other Departments in the Cabinet of the President? By what title could the President of the United States require of him, as we know has been often done, "his opinion in writing upon subjects relating to the duties of his office," which the constitution authorizes him to do only "of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments?" Do gentlemen expect us to forget the most familiar facts which have been passing under our eyes, for nearly half a century, in order to sustain their novel theories? On what, then, sir, is this new doctrine founded, that the Secretary of the Treasury is not an executive officer? Is it that in the mere title of the act for the establishment of the Treasury Department, it does not happen to be styled an Executive Department? The acts for the establishment of the other Departments are styled, it seems, in the title, (forming no part of the law itself) "an act to establish an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War," and so likewise of the State and Navy Departments, while the act for the establishment of the Treasury, is simply styled in its title "an act to establish the Treasury Department."

Now, sir, if this difference in the title was not the result of mere accident, as I am inclined to think it was, for I find that the title was the same as of the other acts,

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 17, 1834.]

in all the preliminary and intermediate proceedings, down to the very passage of the act, (after which, according to the parliamentary custom, a formal entry is made on the journal to this effect: "Ordered that the title of the act" be so and so;) if, sir, I say, this difference was not merely accidental, it is sufficiently explained by the different organization of the Treasury Department, compared with the other Departments. The organization of the other Departments is simple and homogeneous, consisting, in each, of one principal officer, the head of the Department, and of clerks employed under him, to perform, as he shall direct and arrange it, the business of the Department. But, on the other hand, the organization of the Treasury Department is complex and diversified. It consists not only of one principal officer, the head of the Department and his clerks, but of various other officers, of a high and important grade, whose respective functions are classified and arranged by the law itself—such as the Comptroller, the Auditor, the Register, the Treasurer. The functions of some of these officers, of the Comptroller and of the Auditor for example, seem to partake somewhat of the judicial character; and it will be seen in the debates on the organization of the Treasury Department that this idea was suggested in relation to the Comptroller particularly, by Mr. Madison, who, for that reason, proposed to modify differently the tenure of his office. The same idea, we have seen it stated in the newspapers, in regard to the character of the Auditor's functions, has recently furnished, in my own State, the ground of an able and ingenious argument against the constitutionality of a particular act of Congress. In the organization of the Treasury Department then, embracing officers of this description, whose functions appeared to partake, in a considerable degree, of the judicial character, doubts might have arisen as to the propriety of denominating the whole Department an Executive Department; though certainly, in regard to the head of the Department himself, his functions are obviously and exclusively executive.

What, sir, are those functions as prescribed by the act for the establishment of the Treasury Department? To report and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, &c.; to prepare and report estimates of the public expenditure, &c.; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts, &c.; and to grant warrants for money to be issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law; and to execute services relative to the sales of public lands, &c. All these functions, I think, sir, must be allowed to be Executive. The only other duty prescribed by the act is to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, &c. respecting all matters referred to him by them, or which shall appertain to his office, &c. It is this circumstance, it seems, of reporting to Congress which is considered as divesting the Secretary of the Treasury of the character of an Executive officer. But, sir, does not the President himself, the chief Executive officer, report to Congress? is he not required by the constitution to "give, from time to time, to Congress, information of the state of the Union, and to recommend to them such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient;" in other words, to report to Congress both facts and opinions, just as the Secretary of the Treasury does? Do not the other heads of Departments, also, report, whenever required, to Congress? Are not resolutions adopted almost every day in the one house or the other, directing them to report on some matter or other?

The circumstance of reporting to Congress, then, surely, cannot divest the Secretary of the Treasury of the character of an Executive officer; which character he has borne in the practice of the Government, and in the understanding of the community, as well as in the view of the law, from the adoption of the constitution to the present day. As little, sir, can the omission to denominate him an executive officer, in the mere title of the act establishing the department of which he forms a part, have that effect, (explained too, as that omission is by the circumstances to which I have adverted,) if the functions assigned to him by the act itself be, as I think all must admit them to be, executive in their nature. But there is still another criterion, if another were necessary, for ascertaining the character of his office. I mean its tenure. The Secretary of the Treasury holds his office by precisely the same tenure as every other head of a Department. He is removable by the President, precisely in the same way as other Secretaries are; and that removability is declared in the act creating the Treasury Department, in identically the same terms and manner that the removability of the other Secretaries is declared in the acts constituting their respective departments. By reference to the debates of Congress in '89, on the power of removal by the President, it will be seen that the removability of public officers by the President was considered as depending solely on the circumstance of their being Executive officers or otherwise. All Executive officers were regarded as mere assistants and substitutes of the President, in the exercise of that Executive power which the constitution had vested wholly in him, and, as such, ought to be, and were, removable by him at pleasure. The act establishing the Treasury Department, therefore, in expressly recognising, as it does, the removability of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the President, virtually declares him to be an executive officer.

The power of removal, existing alike in regard to the Secretary of the Treasury and the other heads of departments, may be rightfully exercised for reasons so various that it is impossible to reduce them to any general classification. The President, who possesses the power, is to judge, in the first instance at least, of the reasons for its exercise. In the debate of '89, so frequently appealed to on this subject, Mr. Madison said: "If a head of a Department shall not conform to the judgment of the President, in doing the Executive duties of his office, he may be displaced." The honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD] who spoke a few days ago, cited the opinion expressed by Mr. Madison in the same debate, that the President might be impeached for a wanton removal of a public officer. Sir, I do not doubt it; but I beg leave to remind the honorable Senator of a correlative opinion delivered by Mr. Madison on the same occasion—that the President might be properly impeached also for neglecting to remove a public officer, when the public interest demanded it. And this, sir, suggests the true mode of testing the question which has been raised of the President's constitutional power to remove the late Secretary of the Treasury, for his refusal (in the language of Mr. Madison, just cited) "to conform to the judgment of the President" on the subject of the public deposits. Let us reverse the case, which actually occurred, and suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of the President, had desired a transfer of the public deposits—that he did so without any sufficient reason, and was about to commit them to banks of questionable solvency or of notorious insolvency. If the President, entertaining a different opinion of the expediency and propriety, had stood by, and renouncing the salutary control which the constitution had placed in his hands by the power of removal, had permitted his Secretary quietly to consummate his purpose, on the ground that the President had no right to interfere with a discretionary power entrusted by Congress to a head of a Department, what then would have been said? We should have heard, sir, denunciations not less loud and vehement than those which have been uttered on the present occasion, thundering against him, but upon a different principle. We should then have been told, sir, that the President had been recreant to his high trust; that he had been armed with the power of removal expressly to protect the public interests from the faithlessness or incapacity of public officers, and that, in failing to exercise it, he had weakly and wickedly betrayed his duty to the constitution and to the country.

Having thus reviewed, Mr. President, the doctrines, to me, I must say novel doctrines, of constitutional law which have been advanced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] I will detain the Senate but with a few words more. The honorable Senator told us, with a deep and mournful pathos, that we are in the midst of a revolution. I agree with him, sir; we are in the midst of a revolution—a happy and auspicious revolution, like the “civil revolution of 1800,” which, according to Mr. Jefferson, was “as real a revolution in the principles, as that of ’76 was in the form, of our Government.” A like salutary revolution “in the principles of the Government,” we have seen accomplished during the last five years of its administration. In that time, sir, we have seen the Government brought back to its “republican tack,” from the deviations of latitudinous power into which it had fatally fallen. We have seen an unconstitutional and corrupting system of internal improvements, under the patronage of the federal authority, arrested, and those great local interests remitted to their natural and safe guardians, the Governments of the States. We have seen the bank, the “first-born” of federal usurpations, foiled in its efforts to perpetuate its existence, and to confirm its triumph over the sanctity of the constitution. We have seen, finally, the American System of the honorable Senator himself; a system which we of the South have felt to be one, not of protection, but oppression; we have seen that, too, partially overthrown and abandoned. Here, indeed, is a happy and glorious revolution for those who have cherished the cardinal principles of limited constitutional construction, of freedom of industry, of equality of public burdens. And for these great results, we are indebted to the firmness, the vigor, the patriotism, of the individual who now presides over the administration of the Government, sustained by the virtuous confidence of a free people.

We have, sir, the authentic and positive declaration of the honorable Senator from Kentucky himself, made on this floor during the last session, that it was owing to the known and determined opposition of the Chief Magistrate to the protective system, sustained, as it was foreseen he would be, by an increased popular support in the present Congress, that the honorable Senator consented to yield what he did of that system in the compromise of last winter. The other great reforms of national policy have been accomplished by the direct agency of that higher power which the constitution has placed in the hands of the President, as a shield, among other purposes, for the protection of the just rights of the States, and which he has faithfully and firmly wielded for that object. Used, sir, as that power has been, I cannot sympathize in the sentiments of indignant reprobation with which its exercise has been denounced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. It is a power, sir, which has been exerted in the best constitutional times of England, and of our own country. In England, William the Third, a veneration of whose memory is pronounced by a late writer on the constitutional history of England, to be the true test of English whiggism, exercised it—an exercise rendered necessary, and justified, we are told by one of the historians of the times, by the existence of “a strong party in the House of Lords, who entertained deep designs.” Our own Madison, sir, than whom there never lived a man more virtuous, more conscientious, more scrupulous in the use of power, nor yet one firmer in the discharge of duty, did not hesitate to exercise it. The limited opportunities of research I have had, have disclosed no less than half a dozen instances in which he resorted to the veto; four of those during the first term of his Presidency—and one of them, (the veto of the “Bonus bill for Internal Improvement,”) the very last act of his public life; thus rendering an appropriate and impressive homage to the constitution, on retiring from its highest trust. I cannot see, then, in the use of the veto by the present Chief Magistrate, any cause of alarm for the liberties of the country.

I confess, sir, I consider those liberties far more seriously threatened by the unconstitutional institution, with whose grasping ambition we are now struggling. If, sir, it shall triumph in this vital struggle, then, indeed, a fatal revolution will have been accomplished. The time will have arrived, which was foretold by the great republican statesman, [Mr. JEFFERSON,] whose prophetic and instructive warnings were read to us by the Senator from Missouri, when a moneyed power, self-constituted and irresponsible, will have superseded the delegated and responsible Government of the people in its action. Gentlemen, in the course of this debate, have declaimed much on the dangerous influence of money. But the only money whose influence they seem to regard as dangerous, is the money of the people—money raised and appropriated by the representatives of the people—disbursed by responsible officers—locked up by the “strong bolts and bars of the law,” from corrupt use! But they seem to be wholly insensible to the danger of money in the hands of a great corporation, wielding an immense capital at will, without control, without responsibility.

Let Congress, sir, abstain from unconstitutional appropriations, let the public expenditure be restrained to the simple and economical wants of republican Government; let the accountability of public disbursements be enforced; and we shall have but little danger to apprehend from the money of the people. But, sir, we shall by those means have provided but a poor security against the danger of money, if, at the same time, we invite its concentration in the hands of an organized association, and give it thus artificial faculties of united action and accumulated power.

A profound thinker, sir, with whom I have had the good fortune to serve in the public councils, but who is now in private life, and to whom it affords me sincere gratification to have this opportunity of paying the tribute of a cordial and respectful remembrance, [Mr. S. C. ALLIX, of Massachusetts,] has beautifully and philosophically said, that “associated wealth is the dynasty of modern States.” Sir, it is so. This modern dynasty is now seeking to establish its sway over us in the worst of all forms—that of a great legal corporation, ramified and extended through the Union, directed by irresponsible authority, controlling the fortunes and the hopes of individuals and communities, influencing the public press, dictating to the organs of the public will.

I may be permitted, Mr. President, to recall to the recollection of the Senate the solemn language of a great patriot and statesman of another country, on an occasion not unlike the present. It was on the memorable impeachment of Warren Hastings, sir, that Edmund Burke, with the profound sagacity which belonged to his genius, held the following impressive language to the highest judicial and legislative body of his country:

“To-day, the Commons of Great Britain prosecute the delinquents of India. To-morrow, the delinquents of India may be the Commons of Great Britain. We all know and feel the force of money, and we now call upon you for justice in this cause of money. We call upon you for the preservation of our manners—of our virtues. We call upon you for our national character. We call upon you for our liberties.”

Sir, an American Senator, applying to his own times and country the solemn appeal of the British patriot, might well say: To-day the Congress of the United States sits in judgment on the monopolists of the bank. Tomorrow the monopolists of the bank may be the Congress of the United States. All history hath taught us the dangerous power of moneyed corporations, and we now see and feel that power exerted in the most dangerous of all forms, in assailing the purity of our republican manners, undermining the stability of our institutions, and awing the deliberations of our public councils. Sir, the American people—yes, sir, the people—when their true voice shall be heard, call upon us for justice in this great cause of money, violating and trampling upon the guaranties of freedom. They call upon us for the preservation of the public morals, exposed to a new and daring corruption. They call upon us for the vindication of our national character from the scandal of practices before unknown in our history. They call upon us for the rescue of their liberties from the grasp of a selfish and unrelenting moneyed despotism. They call upon us, sir, for the performance of these high duties, and worthily, I trust, will the call be answered by the firmness, the constancy, and the patriotism of their representatives.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to give notice that circumstances existed which would prevent his moving to go into the consideration of Executive business to-day. He would, however, make a motion to that effect to-morrow. While up, he would take that opportunity to correct an unfounded statement, which had appeared in a morning paper of this city, respecting business said to be pending before the Senate—a statement, he said, unfounded both in law and in fact. The Government Directors of the Bank of the United States, he said, were still in office, and would hold over their appointments until new ones were made.

Mr. W. then reported, from the Committee on Finance, the bill, from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1834, without amendment.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER presented to the Senate a series of resolutions, adopted at a numerous meeting of the citizens of Boston, without distinction of party, held at Faneuil Hall, to consider the state of the currency and finances of the country.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to bear unequivocal and decided testimony to the respectability, intelligence, and disinterestedness, of the long list of gentlemen at whose instance this meeting was assembled. The meeting, said Mr. W. was connected with no party purpose whatever. It had an object more sober, more cogent, more interesting to the whole community, than mere party questions. The Senate will perceive, in the tone of these resolutions, no intention to exaggerate or inflame; no disposition to get up excitement or to spread alarm. I hope the restrained and serious manner, the moderation of temper, and the exemplary candor, of these resolutions, in connexion with the plain truths which they contain, will give them just weight with the Senate. I assure you, sir, the members composing this meeting were neither capitalists, nor speculators, nor alarmists. They are merchants, traders, mechanics, artisans, and others engaged in the active business of life. They are of the muscular portion of society; and they desire to lay before Congress an evil, which they feel to press sorely on their occupations, their earnings, their labor, and their property; and to express their conscientious conviction of the causes of that evil. If intelligence, if pure intention, if deep and wide spread connexion with business, in its various branches, if thorough practical knowledge and experience—if inseparable union between their own prosperity and the prosperity of the whole country, authorize men to speak, and give them a right to be heard, the sentiments of this meeting ought to make an impression. For one, sir, I entirely concur in all their opinions. I adopt their first fourteen resolutions, without alteration or qualification, as setting forth truly the present state of things, stating truly its causes, and pointing to the true remedy.

Mr. President, [said Mr. W.] now that I am speaking, I will use the opportunity to say a few words, which I intended to say, in the course of the morning, on the coming up of the resolution which now lies on the table; but which are as applicable to this occasion as to that.

An opportunity may, perhaps, be hereafter afforded me, of discussing the reasons given by the Secretary, for the very important measure, adopted by him, in removing the deposits. But, as I know not how near that time may be, I desire, in the mean while, to make my opinions known, without reserve, on the present state of the country. Without intending to discuss any thing at present, I feel it my duty, nevertheless, to let my sentiments and my convictions be understood. In the first place, then, sir, I agree with those who think that there is a severe pressure in the money market, and very serious embarrassment felt in all branches of the national industry. I think this is not local, but general; general, at least, over every part of the country, where the cause has yet begun to operate, and sure to become, not only general, but universal, as the operation of the cause shall spread. If evidence were wanted, in addition to all that is told us by those who know, the high rate of interest, now at 12 per cent or higher, where it was hardly 6, last September—the depression of all stocks, some ten, some twenty, some thirty per cent—and the low prices of commodities, are proofs abundantly sufficient, to shew the existence of the pressure. But, sir, labor—that most extensive of all interests—American manual labor—feels, or will feel, the shock more sensibly, far more sensibly, than capital or property of any kind. Public works have stopped, or must stop; great private undertakings, employing many hands, have ceased, and others must cease. A great lowering of the rates of wages, as well as a depreciation of property, is the inevitable consequence of causes now in full operation. Serious embarrassments in all branches of business do certainly exist.

I am of opinion, therefore, that there is, undoubtedly, a very severe pressure on the community, which Congress ought to relieve if it can; and that this pressure is not an instance of the ordinary re-action, or the ebbing and flowing of commercial affairs; but is an extraordinary case, produced by an extraordinary cause.

In the next place, sir, I agree entirely with the 11th Boston resolution, as to the causes of this embarrassment. We were in a state of high prosperity, commercial and agricultural. Every branch of business pushed far, and the credit, as well as the capital of the country, employed to near its utmost limits. In this state of things, some degree of overtrading doubtless took place, which, however, if nothing else had occurred, would have been seasonably corrected by the ordinary and necessary operation of things. But, on this palmy state of things, the late measure of the Secretary fell, and has acted on it with powerful and lamentable effect. And I think, sir, that such a cause is entirely adequate to produce the effect; that it is wholly natural; and that it ought to have been foreseen that it would produce exactly such consequences. Those must have looked at the surface of things only, as it seems to me, who thought otherwise, and who expected that such an operation could be gone through with, without producing a very serious shock.

The Treasury, in a very short time, has withdrawn from the bank 8,000,000 dollars, within a fraction. This call, of course, the bank has been obliged to provide for, and could not provide for without more or less inconvenience to the public. The mere withdrawing of so large a sum from hands actually holding and using it, and the transferring of it, through the bank collecting, and through another bank loaning it, if it can loan it, into other hands, is, itself, an operation, which, if conducted suddenly, must produce considerable inconvenience. And this is all that the Secretary seems to have anticipated. But this is not the one-hundredth part of the whole evil. The great evil arises from the new attitude in which the Government places itself towards the bank. Every thing is now in a false position. The Government, the Bank of the United States, the State banks, are all out of place. They are deranged, and separated, and jostling against each other. Instead of amity, reliance, and mutual succor, relations of jealousy, of distrust, of hostility even, are springing up between these parties. All act on the defensive,—each looks out for itself;—and the public interest is crushed between the upper and the nether millstone. All this should have been foreseen. It is idle to say that these evils might have been prevented by the bank, if it had exerted itself to prevent them. That is mere matter of opinion; it may be true, and it may not; but it was the business of those who proposed the removal of the deposits, to ask themselves how it was probable the bank would act, when they should attack it, assail its credit, and allege the violation by it of its charter; and thus compel it to take an attitude, at least, of stern defence. The community have certainly a right to hold those answerable, who have unnecessarily got into this quarrel with the bank, and thereby occasioned the evil, let the conduct of the bank, in the course of the controversy, be what it may.

In my opinion, sir, the great source of the evil is the shock which the measure has given to confidence in the commercial world. The credit of the whole system of the currency of the country seems shaken. The State banks have lost credit, and lost confidence. They have suffered vastly more than the Bank of the United States itself, at which the blow was aimed.

The derangement of internal exchanges is one of the most disastrous consequences of the measure. By the origin of its charter, by its unquestioned solidity, by the fact that it was at home every where, and in perfect credit every where, the Bank of the United States accomplished the internal exchanges of the country with vast facility, and at an unprecedented cheap rate. The State banks can never perform this equally well; for the reason given in the Boston resolutions, they cannot act with the same concert, the same identity of purpose. Look at the prices current, and see the change in the value of the notes of distant banks in the great cities. Look at the depression of the stocks of the State banks, deposit banks and all. Look at what must happen the moment the Bank of the United States, in its process of winding up, or to meet any other crisis, shall cease to buy domestic bills, especially in the Southern, Southwestern, and Western markets. Can any man doubt what would be the state of exchange when that takes place? or can any one doubt its necessary effect on the price of produce? The bank has purchased bills to the amount of sixty millions a year, as appears by documents heretofore laid before the Senate. A great portion of these, no doubt, was purchased in the South and West, against shipments of the great staples of those quarters of the country. Such is the course of trade. The produce of the Southwest and the South is shipped to the North and the East, for sale, and those who ship it draw bills on those to whom it is shipped; and these bills are bought and discounted, or cashed by the bank.

When the bank shall cease to buy, as it must cease, consequences cannot but be felt, much severer even than those now experienced. This is inevitable. But, sir, I go further into particular statements. My opinion, I repeat, is, that the present distress is immediately occasioned, beyond all doubt, by the removal of the deposits; and that just such consequences might have been, and ought to have been foreseen from that measure, as we do now perceive and feel around us.

Sir, I do not believe, nevertheless, that these consequences were foreseen. With such foresight, the deposits, I think, would not have been touched. The measure has operated more deeply and more widely than was expected. We all may find proof of this, in the conversation of every hour. No one, who seeks to acquaint himself with the opinions of men, in and out of Congress, can doubt that, if the act were now to be done, it would receive very little encouragement or support. Being of opinion that the removal of the deposits has produced the pressure, as its immediate effect, not so much by withdrawing a large sum of money from circulation, as by alarming the confidence of the community, by breaking in on the well-adjusted relations of the Government and the bank, I agree again, with the Boston resolutions, that the natural remedy is a restoration of the relation in which the bank has heretofore stood to Government. I agree, sir, that this question ought to be settled, and to be settled soon. And yet, if it be decided that the present state of things shall exist—if it be the determination of Congress to do nothing in order to put an end to the unnatural, distrustful, half belligerent, present condition of the Government and the bank, I do not look for any great relief to the community, or any early quieting of the public agitation. On the contrary, I expect increased difficulty, and increased disquiet. The public moneys are now out of the Bank of the United States. There is no law regulating their custody, or fixing their place. They are at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be kept where he pleases, as he pleases, and the places of their custody to be changed as often as he pleases. Now, sir, I do not think this is a state of things in which the country is likely to acquiesce.

Mr. President, the restoration of the deposits is a question distinct and by itself. It does not necessarily involve any other question. It stands clear of all controversy and all opinion about re-chartering the bank, or creating any new bank. But I wish, nevertheless, sir, to say a few words of a bearing somewhat beyond that question. Being of opinion that the country is not likely to be satisfied with the present state of things, I have looked earnestly for the suggestion of some prospective measure—some system to be adopted as the future policy of the country. Where are the public moneys hereafter to be kept? In what currency is the revenue hereafter to be collected? What is to take the place of the bank in our general system? How are we to preserve an uniform currency, a uniform measure of the value of property and the value of labor, a uniform medium of exchange and of payments? How are we to exercise that salutary control over the national currency which it was the unquestionable purpose of the constitution to devolve on Congress? These, sir, appear to me to be the momentous questions before us, and which we cannot long keep out of view. In these questions, every man in the community, who either has a dollar, or expects to earn one, has a direct interest. Now, sir, I have heard but four suggestions or opinions, as to what may hereafter be expected or attempted.

The first is, that things will remain as they are—the bank be suffered to expire, no new bank created, and the whole subject left under the control of the Executive Department. I have already said, that I do not believe the country will ever acquiesce in this.

The second suggestion is that which was made by the

SENATE.]

Public Distress.

[JAN. 20, 1834.]

honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] That honorable member pledges himself to bring forward a proposition having for its object to do away with the paper system altogether, and to return to an entire metallic currency. I do not expect, sir, that the honorable member will find much support in such an undertaking. A mere gold and silver currency, and the entire abolition of paper, is not suited to the times. The idea has something a little too antique, too Spartan, in it; we might as well think of going to iron at once. If such a result as the gentleman hopes for, were even desirable, I regard its attainment as utterly impracticable and hopeless. I lay that scheme, therefore, out of my contemplation.

There is, then, sir, the re-chartering of the present bank; and, lastly, there is the establishment of a new bank. The first of these received the sanction of the last Congress, but the measure was negatived by the President. The other, the creation of a new bank, has not been brought forward in Congress, but it has excited attention out of doors, and has been proposed in some of the State legislatures. I observe, sir, that a proposition has been submitted for consideration, by a very intelligent gentleman, in the legislature of Massachusetts, recommending the establishment of a new bank, with the following provisions:

- "1. The capital stock to be fifty millions of dollars.
2. The stockholders of the present United States Bank to be permitted to subscribe an amount equal to the stock they now hold.
3. The United States to be stockholders to the same extent they now are, and to appoint the same number of directors.
4. The subscription to the remaining fifteen millions to be distributed to the several States in proportion to federal numbers, or in some other just and equal ratio; the instalments payable either in cash or in funded stock of the State, bearing interest at five per cent.
5. No branch of the bank to be established in any State, unless by permission of its legislature.
6. The branches of the bank established in the several States, to be liable to taxation by those States respectively, in the same manner, and to the same extent only with their own banks.
7. Such States as may become subscribers to the stock, to have the right of appointing a certain number, not exceeding one-third, of the directors in the branch of their own State.
8. Stock not subscribed for under the foregoing provisions, to be open to subscription by individual citizens."

A project, not altogether dissimilar, has been started in the legislature of Pennsylvania. These proceedings show, at least, a conviction of the necessity of some bank, created by Congress. Mr. President, on this subject I have no doubt whatever. I think a national bank proper and necessary. I believe it to be the only practicable remedy for the evils we feel, and the only effectual security against the greater evils which we fear. Not, sir, that there is any magic in the name of a bank; nor that a national bank works by any miracle, or mystery. But, looking to the state of things actually existing around us—looking to the great number of State banks already existing, not less than three hundred and fifty, or four hundred—looking to the vast amount of paper issued by those banks; and considering that, in the very nature of things, this paper must be limited and local in its credit and in its circulation, I confess I see nothing but a well-conducted national institution, which is likely to afford any guard against excessive paper issues, or which can furnish a sound and uniform currency to every part of the United States. This, sir, is not only a question of finance, it not only respects the operations of the Treasury, but it rises to the character of a high political question. It respects the currency, the actual money, the measure of value of all property, and all labor, in the United States. If we needed not a dollar of money in the Treasury, it would still be our solemn and bounden duty to protect this great interest. It respects the exercise of one of the greatest powers, beyond all doubt, conferred on Congress by the constitution. And I hardly know any thing less consistent with our public duty and our high trust, nor any thing more likely to disturb the harmonious relations of the States, in all affairs of business and life, than for Congress to abandon all care and control over the currency, and to throw the whole money system of the country into the hands of four-and-twenty States legislatures. I am, then, sir, for a bank; and am fully persuaded that to that measure the country must come at last. The question, then, is between the creation of a new bank, and the re-chartering of the present bank, with modifications. I have already referred to the scheme for a new bank, proposed to the legislature of Massachusetts by Mr. White. Between such a new bank as his propositions would create, and a re-chartering of the present bank, with modifications, there is no very wide, certainly no irreconcilable difference. We cannot, however, create another bank before March, 1836. This is one reason for preferring a continuance of the present. And, treating the subject as a practical question, and looking to the state of opinion and to the probability of success in either attempt, I am inclined to the opinion that the true course of policy is to propose a re-charter of the present bank, with modifications. As to what these modifications should be, I would now only observe, that while it may well be inferred, from my known sentiments, that I should not myself deem any alterations in the charter, beyond those proposed by the bill of 1832, highly essential; yet it is a case, in which, I am aware, nothing can be effected for the good of the country, without making some approaches to unity of opinion. I think, therefore, that, in the hope of accomplishing an object of so much importance, liberal concessions should be made. I lay out of the case all consideration of any especial claim, or any legal right of the present stockholders, to a renewal of their charter. No such right can be pretended, doubtless none such is pretended. The stockholders must stand like other individuals, and their interest regarded so far, and so far only, as may be judged for the public good. Modifications of the present charter should, I think, be proposed, such as may remove all reasonable grounds of jealousy, in all quarters; whether in States, in other institutions, or in individuals. Such, too, as may tend to reconcile the interests of the great city where the bank is, with those of another great city; and, in short, the question should be met with a sincere disposition to accomplish, by united and friendly counsels, a measure which shall allay fears, and promote confidence, at the same time that it secures to the country a sound, creditable, uniform currency; and to the Government a safe deposit for the public treasure, and an important auxiliary in its financial operations. I repeat, then, sir, that I am in favor of renewing the charter of the present bank, with such alterations as may be expected to meet the general sense of the country.

And now, Mr. President, to avoid all unfounded inferences, I wish to say, that these suggestions are to be regarded as wholly my own. They are made without the knowledge of the bank, and with no understanding or concert with any of its friends. I have not understood, indeed, that the bank itself proposes to apply, at present, for a renewal of its charter. Whether it does so, or not, my suggestions are connected with no such or any other purpose of the bank. I take up the subject on public grounds purely and exclusively. And, sir, in order to repel all inferences of another sort, I wish to state, with equal distinctness, that I do not undertake to speak the sentiments of any individual, heretofore opposed to the bank, or belonging to that class of public men who have generally opposed it. I state my own opinions; if others should concur in them, it will be only because they approve them, and will not be the result of any previous concert or understanding whatever.

Finally, Mr. President, having stated my own opinions, I respectfully ask those who propose to continue the discussion now going on, relative to the depositories, to let the country see their plan for the final settlement of the present difficulties. If they are against the bank, and against all banks, what do they propose? That the country will not be satisfied with the present state of things, seems to me certain. What state of things is to succeed it? To these questions, I desire to call, earnestly, the attention of the Senate and of the country. The occasion is critical; the interests at stake momentous; and, in my judgment, Congress ought not to adjourn till it shall have passed some law, suitable to the exigency, and satisfactory to the country.

Mr. SILSBEE rose, and said that he, also, as one of the representatives of the State of Massachusetts, on that floor, had received a copy of the resolutions, and had intended to address to the Senate a few remarks in presenting them; but, as his colleague had so amply and so ably expressed his views on the subject to which these resolutions had reference, and as he entirely concurred in those views, he should refrain from taking up the time of the Senate.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to make a few remarks, but, on receiving an assurance from Mr. WEBSTER that he would move to take up the resolution offered by Mr. CLAY, which had been laid on the table, at his [Mr. W.'s] request, he postponed his observations.

The resolutions were then committed.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The special order having been announced, to wit, Mr. CLAY's resolutions relative to the removal of the depositories, Mr. EWING having the floor—

Mr. CALHOUN asked leave to make a few remarks, with a view to correct the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] in some remarks which he made in his speech on Friday, which were calculated to make an impression upon the public which would be injurious to him. The Senator remembered in his remarks, when he addressed them a few days since, that he [Mr. C.] came to the conclusion that the power of the Secretary, under the sixteenth section, was limited to the depositories, and that he had no right to withhold them, unless there was satisfactory reason to believe they were not safe, or that the bank had not faithfully performed its duty in relation to them. The Senator from Virginia, with a view of rebutting this conclusion, quoted from a speech, which he stated, as he [Mr. C.] understood, he delivered in 1816, when the bill to establish the bank was under discussion. The passage he quoted was this:

"As to the control over the bank, Mr. C. contended that the amendments, retaining the power over depositories, and of making the bills receivable for the revenue, or otherwise, gave the Government a greater control than it before possessed over the operations of the bank, &c. Legislation on party principles, he said, must ever react upon the party pursuing it; he would, therefore, not resort to it."

Now, said Mr. C., if I had really delivered this sentiment, when the bank charter was under consideration, in 1816, I would admit that the conclusion of the Senator was correct—that I then entertained very different sentiments as to the power of the Secretary, under the sixteenth section, over the depositories, from what I do, and that, considering the part which I bore in the re-charter, that Congress itself also entertained different sentiments from those I recently delivered. But what must the impression be when I state, that I never delivered such sentiment in 1816; that the passage the Senator quoted was delivered in 1814, long before the existence of the present charter, and could by no probability have reference to the power of the Secretary under its provisions, as contended by the Senator from Virginia.

The facts of the case are these: At the commencement of the session of 1814-15, during the war, a bill was reported by the committee of Ways and Means, to incorporate a bank of the United States, which, among other things, provided that the Government should subscribe twenty millions, that it should have five directors, and that its notes should be receivable in the use of the Government. On my motion the bill was amended by striking out the subscription; and, as a matter almost of course, the five directors; when I moved to strike out the section making the notes receivable in the dues of the Government, assigning as my reason, as will be seen by the reports of the day, that, as the Government had lost its control by striking out its directors, it should be left in full possession of the power over the receivability of its notes, and withholding the depositories, as the means of asserting a due control over the operations of the institution. When it was afterwards objected that the striking out the directors destroyed all the control of the Government over the institution, in repelling the charge, I delivered the sentiment quoted by the Senator from Virginia, and which he has quoted as delivered in 1816, when the present charter was under consideration, as a proof of my opinion of the power of the Secretary over the depositories, when there is not the slightest analogy between the two cases; the bill of 1814 having no provision whatever over the depositories, and leaving, of course, to the Government, full and unlimited power to place its depositories in the bank, or to withhold them at pleasure. I hope the Senator from Virginia will be able to afford some satisfactory explanation.

Mr. RIVES said, nothing could be farther from his intention than to make any misrepresentation of the Senator from South Carolina, or to convey an impression injurious to his character, in the quotation he had made the other day; and he must be permitted to express his surprise at the excessive sensibility which the honorable Senator had displayed. The gentleman had entirely mistaken the purpose for which he had quoted the observation made by him 1814. It was not in reference to a mere question of construction on the terms of the sixteenth section of the bank charter, but in relation to a broader and more comprehensive question, which the gentleman had made, as to the only legitimate object of a power over the depositories. The gentleman will permit me to recall to him the course of his argument. After laying down the general principle that every power must be construed according to its subject-matter and object, and that the power given the Secretary of the Treasury being a power over the depositories, must be necessarily restricted to the object of such a power, he contended that the only object of a power over the depositories must be the safe-keeping of the depositories—that it is a power which, even if it had been retained in the fullest manner by Congress itself, "must be limited solely to the safe-keeping of the public funds."

Now, sir, on this point, I took the liberty of joining issue with the honorable Senator from South Carolina. I contended that the object of a power to continue or withhold the public depositories, might be much broader than he affirmed—that it might be not only to provide for the safe-keeping of the public funds, but to reserve in the hands of the Government, or its financial officer, a general control over the conduct of the bank. It was to this point I cited the observation made by the gentleman in 1814. What, sir, was that observation? "But," said the gentleman from South Carolina, on the occasion referred to, "there was another means of protecting the Government against the bank, more potent and certain than any such provision: let the United States retain the power over its depositories, and over the receipts of the bank notes in payment of duties and debts to the Government, and it would possess a sufficient control over the bank.

Sir, I appeal to the Senate to say if this observation, no matter when made, is not justly applicable to the purpose for which I cited it, and if it does not fully sustain the proposition for which I contended, to wit, that the object of a power over the depositories might not only be the safe-keeping of the public funds, (which the Senator from South Carolina asserted could be the only object of such a power,) but also to reserve to the Government a general control over the conduct of the bank. If I did not state expressly that the observation was made in 1814, (I certainly did not state it was made in 1816,) it was only because, in the view I took of it, and with regard to the purpose for which I cited it, it was wholly immaterial when it was made.

It is equally immaterial, sir, to the views I presented, in what form this power over the depositories may have been reserved—whether by an omission to say any thing about them, leaving the whole subject, of course, at the disposal of the Government, or, by an express provision reserving to the Government, by its proper officer, a complete discretionary power on the subject, as, according to the construction I put upon it, had been done by the sixteenth section of the bank charter. Whether that construction be correct, is a point upon which the Senator from South Carolina and myself differ; but, surely, sir, if, according to my construction, a general discretionary power over the depositories had been reserved to the financial officer of the Government in as broad terms as the language could supply, I was at liberty to invoke the high authority of the Senator from South Carolina for the doctrine that such a power might be exercised, not only with reference to the safety of the public funds, but as one of the securities for the good conduct of the bank, which I believe to be a great and most important purpose of the power.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that the explanation of the Senator from Virginia was to him entirely unsatisfactory. What Mr. C. had complained of, was, that while his remarks made in 1814, related entirely to the bank bill then under consideration, and had no reference whatever to the present, the Senator had argued from Mr. C.'s sentiments, expressed at that time, that the 16th section of the present bank charter had given the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary and unlimited power over the public depositories. And now what reply had the Senator to make? Had he retracted the error? Not at all. Did he now proceed in his argument, as if Mr. C.'s remarks in 1814 related to the present bank, and not to the bill then under consideration? When Mr. C. had told the Senator that his remarks in 1814 had no relation to the present bank, and could not be used in sustaining the Secretary, what then had been the Senator's reply? That Mr. C.'s opinion at that time was, that the power of the Secretary was unlimited over the depositories under the present charter, though then not in existence, forgetting that the bank bill of 1814 had no provision in regard to the public depositories; and was of course not at all applicable to the present charter, which contained an express provision on the subject of the depositories. If there had been no provision, the case would have been different.

The depositories, under the present charter, were a subject of contract between the Government and the bank, and the only question that could be presented was as to the power that had been retained by the former, under the sixteenth section, in reference to them.

Mr. C. said that when the Senator next quoted him, he desired that he would quote him correctly and fully, giving the subject, time, and circumstance, so that he might be judged of by the public on his own acts, and not by the interpretation or comments of the Senator. He felt that in the present instance great injustice had been done him. He had a regard for his consistency; he hoped that when the Senator published his speech, he would place the subject in the light which the facts of the case, and truth and justice required.

There was another point which, as he was up, he would notice. He [Mr. C.] had conceded, in his remarks, when he addressed the Senate on the subject of the depositories, that the President, in removing the former Secretary of the Treasury, had been guilty, not of an act of usurpation, but of an abuse of power; a great and dangerous abuse of power, which he stated in the strongest and most emphatic language. The Senator, in quoting his authority to prove that the act was not usurpation, omitted entirely to state what Mr. C. had said in reference to the abuse of power; so that any one reading the speech of the Senator, without knowing his, Mr. C.'s sentiments, would be led to the conclusion, that he, Mr. C., justified the exercise of the power of the President in reference to the removal, when, in fact, no one could more pointedly condemn it.

Mr. RIVES said he had no disposition to protract this discussion, but he would make one or two remarks, in addition to what he had already said. The whole question turned on a difference of opinion in regard to the sixteenth section of the bank charter. The Senator contended, that that section created an obligation to continue the depositories in the bank, unless for some reason affecting their safety; while he [Mr. R.] contended, that it reserved to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to remove them for any reason he might deem sufficient. A provision, that the public moneys should be deposited in the Bank of the United States, "unless at any time, the Secretary of the Treasury should otherwise order or direct," seemed to him to reserve an unqualified power on the subject. There was practically no difference between the omission of any stipulations whatever, and a stipulation defeasible at the will of the party making it, which that party had expressly received a power to depart from at any time. The power over the depositories reserved by the sixteenth section of the bank charter being thus unqualified, as he conceived, he [Mr. R.] had quoted the observation made by the honorable Senator to show that such a power might be exercised, not only with reference to the safety of the public funds, but as "a control over the conduct of the bank" in other respects. The honorable Senator has not succeeded in showing that the observation made by him in 1814 was improperly applied to this general question—the only one with reference to which he had cited it.

In regard to the other point alluded to by the honorable Senator, Mr. R. was surprised that the gentleman should again refer to it, after what had passed on Friday, when the extent to which the gentleman's opinions were relied on was fully explained. Could it be necessary to remind the Senate that the only question made by the resolutions then under consideration, was a question of the existence, and not of the abuse of power? The first resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, affirmed that the President "had assumed the exercise of a power not granted to him by the constitution or laws." It was to this question of constitutional power alone that he [Mr. R.] had applied his own argument, and on that point he had taken the liberty to refer to the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina as differing from those of the Senator from Kentucky, without supposing that in so doing he could possibly give offence to either.

Mr. CALHOUN. One word more in reply. Had the charter contained no provision in reference to the depositories, there would have been no contract in reference to them between the Government and the Bank; and if no contract, then the former would have unlimited power to make its deposits in the bank, or to withhold them at pleasure. Such was the case in the bill of 1814; and of course no question could be raised between the bank and the Government as to the extent of its power over the deposits, under such circumstances. Such was the case in reference to the bill of 1814; but the case is very different under the present charter, which expressly provides that the deposits shall be made in the bank; thus making them, as acknowledged by the Secretary himself, in his report, a subject of contract between the Government and the bank, and leaving out of the question the extent of the power of the Secretary to withhold the deposits, in conformity to the contract—a question, which, by no possibility, could come up under the bill of 1814; and of course nothing that could be said, in reference to the bill, could, by any possibility, be applicable to the present discussion.

Mr. RIVES said, that, without repeating what he had already said to show that there was no difference in effect between the omission of any provision whatever on the subject of the deposits, and such a provision as was actually made, reserving to the Government, by its officer, an unqualified power to remove them "at any time," he would, in conclusion, only recall the attention of the honorable Senator himself to the true issue between them. The honorable Senator had contended that a power over the deposits was, from its nature, necessarily limited to the safe-keeping of the public funds. He [Mr. R.] on the other hand, contended that the object of such a power might be not only the safe-keeping of the public funds, but to retain in the hands of the Government a control over the general conduct of the bank. In support of this position he referred to an observation made by the honorable Senator in 1814, that a power over the deposits retained by the Government would serve as an important "control over the bank." To the extent and for the purpose for which the observation was cited, it still seemed to him to be not only applicable, but conclusive.

Mr. EWING then rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Seldom has there been agitated within these walls a question of more vital importance than that which is now under consideration. It is a question which touches the fundamental law of our Union and the distribution of the powers of Government, as delegated by the constitution, and adjusted and disposed by that instrument; and it depends upon its decision, whether the power of the representatives of the people over the public purse, that chief safeguard of popular liberty, is to be surrendered or maintained.

The sudden alarm in all quarters of the country occasioned by the removal of the public funds, the magnitude of the calamity which it has brought upon the people, and the just apprehension of still greater evils which are to follow in its train, give to the subject a grave and absorbing interest. These, however, I will for the present pass by. The immediate consequences of the act, and the manner and the spirit in which it was done, are questions but secondary in their character. First in importance is the question of constitutional power in the public functionary whose hand we trace throughout this transaction; this demands, and shall receive, as far as I am able to give it, a calm and careful investigation; and on this point we need not be led astray. Truth, constitutional truth, must exist on one or the other side of the proposition stated in the first resolution; and it cannot be so latent as to elude discovery, if sought for by the proper process and in a becoming spirit.

I understand it as admitted, that the removal of the public deposits was virtually the act of the President, avowed by him as his act, and admitted in the debate here to be so. Am I mistaken? The Senator from Pennsylvania, near me, [Mr. WILKINS,] shakes his head by way of denial. I will then recur to proof which I think establishes it beyond the possibility of doubt.

Mr. Duane, it will be recollected, came into the Treasury Department on the 29th day of May last. On the 3d of June the President communicated to him certain discussions which had taken place in the cabinet on the subject of the removal of the Government deposits. Two of the cabinet had given written opinions for, and two against, the removal; and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McLane, by whose instrumentality alone it could be effected, was against it. Such was the state of things immediately prior to the appointment of Mr. Duane. Now, as Mr. McLane was not disposed to yield his acquiescence and become the instrument, contrary to his sense of duty, of an official act intrusted by law to his discretion, if the act was to be done by Executive power or Executive influence, it must be effected by first displacing this Secretary of the Treasury, and substituting another, possessing different opinions, or a greater pliancy of spirit. This, sir, was done; Mr. McLane was removed from the Treasury Department, not thrust out, but induced, by the offer of a higher station, to yield it; and Mr. Duane, whose known opinions were against the Bank, was appointed in his place. This was on the 29th of May. On the 3d of June the subject was opened to Mr. Duane, and the part which he was expected to act indicated to him; and, in his own language, he "felt surprise at the intelligence, and mortification at the manner in which it was communicated to him." His awakened feelings, however, were quieted by the assurance of perfect freedom of action, until, on the 22d July, he asked "whether it was his intention to refuse to remove the deposits, if, after inquiry by an agent, and advisement with the cabinet, the President should decide to remove them," and a threat conveyed in case he should refuse. Mr. Duane, after hesitating long between conflicting emotions—his veneration for the President, his attachment to his party, and the dismissal from office, accompanied with denunciation and reproach on the one hand, and his spirit of independence and conscious sense of duty on the other—yielded at last to the latter and manlier motive, and refused to sign the required order. In this state of things, and while Mr. Duane was still Secretary, the removal of the deposits was announced in the official organ (on the 20th of September) as a measure decided upon; and that it would take place as early as the 1st of October, or sooner, if practicable. Sir, this was not by the direction or with the assent of Mr. Duane, the then Secretary of the Treasury. It was in contempt of his feeling, and in defiance of his power. Three days after, on the 23d of September, Mr. Duane was thrust from office, and Mr. Taney, who had given the required response when interrogated on that subject, was inducted. On the 26th, the official order was given for the removal of the deposits. Now, I ask you, sir, and I ask any man who has listened to this simple narrative of facts and dates, if stronger proof can be required or adduced of any thing—proof more convincing to the mind, unless it be the evidence of our senses themselves—than that which is here presented of the position which I was disposed to assume, as I thought no man could deny it, that the President, and not the Secretary of the Treasury did the act complained of, and that the Secretary was but the instrument in his hands—a mere machine, which was put in motion, and made to execute the will of him who moved it. And I will now proceed upon the position, that the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States was the act of the President—not done with his own hand, but, to give it the forms of law, it was done by the hand of the Secretary of the Treasury, which officer was coerced, or rather moulded, to the deed.

The removal of the Secretary of the Treasury from office I admit to be within the legal power of the President; but the object which was effected by that removal, the control thus taken and exercised over the public treasury, I hold to be an infraction of the constitution; and I shall now, by such arguments and authority as are in my mind conclusive, attempt to make good the position.

Those who maintain the power of the President over the Treasury, rest it upon an argument like this: The executive power is vested in the President—the custody of the public treasury is a portion of executive power; therefore, the custody of the public treasury is vested in the President; or, in this particular instance, they hold that, as the right to remove the deposits was vested by the bank charter in the Secretary of the Treasury, and as the Secretary of the Treasury is an executive officer, this special duty, which is assigned to him by law, falls under the general cognizance of the Executive head of the nation. These are the forms in which, if I understand them right, the arguments on the other side are presented.

The fatal error in their whole process of reasoning arises from this—that they give to certain general expressions in the constitution a power and extent which, as limited by the other special powers in that instrument, they do not possess. The two provisions, that “the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States,” and “he shall see that the laws are faithfully executed,” are the basis of all the illimitable powers with which gentlemen seek to clothe the Chief Magistrate.

It should be observed, that the separation of powers in the constitution of the United States is by no means perfect, especially between the legislative and executive departments. The first section of the first article of the constitution declares, that “ALL legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States;” and yet, when we descend to the special distribution of the powers which follow, we find that all the legislative power therein granted is not vested in the Congress, but that a most important portion of it is vested in the President, namely, a veto power—a power which touches legislation nearly, vitally—a power which has grown up to great importance in the present day, and which threatens to absorb or paralyze all the powers of legislation.

By the first section of the second article of the constitution, “the executive power is vested in a President of the United States.” The word “all” used in the section granting the legislative power to Congress, is omitted in this. I do not lay much stress upon the omission, but I am certainly warranted in saying that the grant of executive power is not in terms more comprehensive than is the grant of legislative power, so the universality of which I have shown one strong exception. Indeed, sir, without referring to the special designation of the several powers which is found in the articles of the constitution containing the general grants of the legislative power, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine what was intended to be included in each, especially in the latter; for judicial power is more distinct in its character, and more capable of a precise designation.

What is executive power? I never saw a definition from which a distinct conception of its essence or qualities could be gathered. Indeed, it is not susceptible of any, varying as it does in its properties and extent, in every form and modification of government. M. Necker, an author respectable, but not of high authority, assimilates it to that mysterious principle which, in the human frame, unites action to the will; the legislative power being the will. This would be intelligible enough, and practical also, if all power, as had been the case in France, centred in a single individual: there would be no clashing of those great separate powers, the one contravening or absorbing the other; it would be reduced to the same simple principle as that of human will and human action; the will dictating, and the active principle moving in exact accordance with it. But when the will and the active principle exist in different bodies, and the active principle, as in the case of our executive, has a will also of his own, if it extend to and penetrate every portion of the body politic, that will, which is accompanied with efficient action, must, as a necessary consequence, overturn or absorb all the powers of the legislative will, which is destitute of action. This notion of executive power will not do in a Government which, being free, intends to preserve its freedom; and it will be seen, by and by, that it is not the kind of executive power created by the framers of our constitution. It will not do to draw precedent from monarchical Governments to settle the extent of that power, unless we agree with them to admit the divine right of kings, and let our Executive become, as theirs, supreme and irresponsible. We must, then, examine the constitution itself minutely, and see if we can discover the meaning affixed to this important term “executive power,” and what subjects properly fall within the scope of its influence.

The second section of the second article of the constitution contains a general enumeration of the powers and duties of the President; it makes him commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and of the militia, when called into actual service; it gives him the power of appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and directs him to receive ambassadors and other public ministers; but it gives him no power over the treasury, or the collection or disbursement of the revenue. But, mark, sir, the duties specially assigned to Congress by the eighth section of the first article: “to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence.” Congress not only lays, but collects duties and imposts. Why collect? The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVZ] pronounces the collection of the revenue an act appropriate to the Executive; and it might well be so, if the constitution had not vested the duty in another department of the Government; and there is no accidental misuse of language here, for it is carried through in all the provisions of the constitution whenever the fiscal concerns of the nation are the subject of provision; and not only the laying and collecting of taxes, but the disbursement of those taxes. Congress, not the President, has power to “pay the national debt;” but, in the same sentence vesting these powers, Congress is authorized to “provide for the common defence,” not to defend, for that is one of the powers granted to the Executive. Again: in the ninth section of the same article, which relates to the power of Congress, is a provision that “no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law,” and that “a regular statement of receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time;” clearly evidencing that the whole control of the public funds, the levying, collecting, keeping, and disbursing, is intrusted fully to Congress, and not at all to the President. I might refer to numerous provisions of this instrument, showing the accurate manner in which the powers and duties of each of the great departments of Government were limited and defined in the particular enumeration of the powers of each. For example, Congress is “to provide and maintain a navy,” not to command or control it; for that power is vested in the President; but, as the purse is in the hands of Congress, they alone can provide and maintain. “To provide for calling forth the militia,” not to call them forth; for that is the duty of the President. “To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia,” not to organize, or arm them; for those are portions of the Executive duty. I have, sir, pursued this analysis far enough to show, (if, indeed, a doubt could ever seriously exist of the fact,) that, in all things relating to the public treasury, its levy, collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement, Executive interference has been carefully excluded by the framers of the constitution; and that the power of Congress extends to it throughout, in all its minutest details; but, on all subjects in which power is intended to be reposed in the Executive, Congress is merely required to provide the means by which that power may be exercised. This review of the provisions of the constitution was deemed necessary to give a full and distinct comprehension of the several acts creating the three (subsequently four) subordinate departments, whose duties and responsibilities are the more immediate subject of inquiry. The first Congress, which met in 1789, enacted the laws creating these departments; the subjects relating to them were referred to the same committee, and they, after much consideration and lengthened debate, passed the several laws in their present forms: Two of them, that of War and of Foreign Affairs, are, in their titles, called "Executive Departments," the other is simply styled "the Treasury Department." But, it is said, sir, that the title of an act proves nothing; that it cannot be used in giving it a construction. This, I admit, is true in the main; but taking into view the circumstances under which these acts were passed, and the high importance attached to them by the Congress and the people of that day, it could hardly be by accident that the title of these laws, reported by the same committee, and under consideration by the same Congress, at the same time, should differ in so important a feature. But we may, on the strictest legal principles, refer to the body of the act, and insist that that shall fix its construction, and be taken as the index of the sense of the legislature which enacted it.

[SENATE.]

The first section of the act establishing what is now called the Department of State, provides "that there shall be an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs," and the chief officer of that Department is required to "perform and execute such duties as shall, from time to time, be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeably to the constitution, relative to correspondences, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers," &c.; and, by reference to the act it will be seen that no single duty is annexed to his office, or a single trust reposed in him, which is not part and parcel of the duty of the President, as enjoined by the constitution in the special enumeration of his powers. This, then, is properly called an Executive Department, both in the title and the body of the act; and the officer at the head of this Department is properly made obedient to the President, within the sphere of his constitutional duties.

Next in order is the Department of War. The first section of the act creating it denominates it also Executive: "That there shall be an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War," and the principal officer therein is likewise charged with duties which the constitution had assigned to the Executive; and he is required to conduct the business of his department in such manner as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, order and direct.

The act creating the Treasury Department does not, either in the title or body of the act, style it executive. The first section provides "that there shall be a Department of the Treasury," and directs the appointment of a Secretary, who shall be head of the Department. His duties, also, coincide in all respects with those which arise out of the powers granted to Congress by the constitution; none of them touch the prescribed functions of the Chief Magistrate. He "shall digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; prepare and report estimates of public revenue and expenditures; superintend the collection of the revenue," &c.—all duties especially devolved upon the Congress by the constitution, as I have already shown; and that his character may be more distinctly marked as the officer of Congress, and not of the President, he alone, of all the heads of Departments, is specially required to "make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters which may be referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office." The marked distinction in the character and duties of these Departments, designated by the law—the fact that, while the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War are made directly responsible to the President, and required to perform their several duties in obedience to his instructions and commands, the Secretary of the Treasury is made subservient to no commands except those of the Houses of Congress, and is charged with no duties except such as the constitution enjoins upon them, would seem, according to all acknowledged principles of interpretation to carry with it a strong negative of the claim of power which the President has assumed to exercise over the prescribed duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. That Secretary is not an executive officer, and the President has no more right to order and direct how he shall perform any of his appropriate duties, or take their performance out of his hands, than either House of Congress has to interfere with the discharge of the appropriate duties of the Secretary of State or of War.

But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] says that the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury are executive in their character, and he instanced the duty of digesting and preparing plans for the improvement of the revenue. Now, sir, with all due deference to the superior political knowledge and acumen of the honorable Senator, I am constrained to differ from him wholly and absolutely. There is nothing more executive, in its nature, in devising, and preparing, a plan for the improvement of the revenue, than there is in devising, and preparing, and enacting a law for the same purpose. Both require the intellect, the mind, and judgment, rather than the mere active principle, to bring them to pass. The duty enjoined on this Secretary is not that executive act which follows legislation, and carries into effect the law, but it is legislation in its incipient stage, or rather a gathering together and arranging the elements out of which legislation is to arise. Now, it is obvious that this must be done by those who bear the burden of legislation, and they may do it themselves, or employ an appropriate agent or agents to perform it; they might direct a committee of Congress to perform it during vacation; they might appoint a commission by law for the same purpose; or they might do as they have done, appoint an officer, who should be emphatically theirs, and accountable to them to perform it. The same may be said of the other duties enjoined by law on this officer. In truth, sir, this very vague and indefinite sense which gentlemen attach to the term executive power and executive duty—a term which may be extended so as to overshadow all the other powers and functions of Government—is proof, if any were wanting, of the wisdom of the framers of our constitution in defining the term by a particular distribution of specially enumerated powers. But the honorable Senator contends that it is an executive duty to report to Congress, because the President himself is required to report or rather to recommend to Congress such matters as he shall think expedient. True, the constitution imposes upon him a special duty by special designation; but this does not prove that it is therefore his, in consequence of the general grant of executive power. The usual process of legal reasoning would prove directly the reverse: if it had been covered by the general grant, it would not have been afterwards specially designated.

Sir, the reason for the different frame and construction of the laws, creating the three subordinate departments of Government, must be already sufficiently obvious. The subject-matter over which the two first have charge is executive in its nature, and is vested by the constitution in the President; the last having to do only with the finances of the country—a subject-matter which, to its fullest extent, and in all its modifications, is intrusted to Congress—is placed under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress could not, without a surrender of their most sacred trust, have rendered him an executive officer, and have required or permitted him to discharge his duties in such manner as he should be directed by the President. His duties, therefore, are to be performed under the direction of the Legislature, and the subject over which he performs them is a legislative trust.

By the bank charter of 1816, section 16, we find another portion of the power of Congress vested in the same officer; a power alike relating to the finances, and for which he is, as in other cases, made responsible to Congress. The sixteenth section of the bank charter provides, “that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order and direction.” Here, again, is a power vested in the Secretary of the Treasury over the finances—a power evidently subject to revision; and as it is a power relating to a subject-matter which is placed under the control and protection of Congress, we would be led a priori to conclude that Congress would be the supervisory power over his acts; and so, indeed, it is. Our whole system of legislation is perfect and consistent; from the constitution down to the latest law passed upon the subject, all suppose the power of the finances inseparably vested in Congress, and severed by an impassable barrier from executive control: but that legislation has been set at defiance; the constitutional provisions have been disregarded; the barriers raised by its framers for the protection of popular liberty have been broken down; and the public treasure is poured into the coffers of the Executive. The Secretary of the Treasury, himself, in the reasons which he renders to Congress for the removal of the public deposits, admits that the place of safe keeping for the national funds is a matter properly of legislative determination; and he seems to wonder that Congress ever placed it under the care of the Executive. Sir, the public funds were never placed under the control of the Executive, constitutionally or legally. The control which he has exercised over them is without law, or, rather, in defiance of law; and all the authority which the Secretary is disposed to yield to the President over his official acts is so far an abandonment, on his part, of the trust reposed in him by law.

Gentlemen contend, that because the President has the power, under the law, to remove the Secretary of the Treasury, he has therefore the same power legally to interfere with and control his official acts. Sir, the conclusion by no means follows. The power of removal vests in the President one additional mean of operating on the hopes and fears of individuals in office, and of inducing them to disregard their duty and conform to his will; but it gives him no power, which can be recognised as legal, over their official actions, or the subject-matter of their official trusts. Wherever he possesses this power, he must derive it from some other source—from the constitution, as in the cases referred to over the State and War Departments, or by express legislative provision vesting in him a new trust. It is true, sir, the President has the actual power of interfering, and controlling the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, by virtue of his power of appointment and removal; but the distinction between actual and legal power is too easy of comprehension to require insisting upon in this chamber. So, too, by virtue of his power of appointment, he has the actual power of controlling, in a greater or less degree, the official conduct of men filling public stations, which it is not pretended are executive in their character; and it matters not whether these things are effected by operating upon the hopes or the fears of individuals. The actual power in either case is the same; the legal power in both is alike wanting. The President has no right to touch or control a single dollar of the public funds, unless it be in pursuance of an appropriation made by law; but he has now, by means of another power, with which the law has invested him for other purposes, (the power of appointment and removal,) obtained the potential control over the collection of the revenues, and their custody when collected. It is useful to look to other nations for political, as well as for legal wisdom; for we can find beyond the Atlantic much to imitate, as well as much to avoid. One analogy from the British constitution forcibly applies to the subject under discussion, especially the point which I am now attempting to illustrate. In England, the power of appointment and removal was, until within a recent period, in all cases, vested, without limit or restraint, in the Crown; but this has never been admitted, except in the worst of times, to give the Crown a right of interference and control over officers in the exercise of their duties, in any case were those duties involved judgment or discretion: for example, the king is the acknowledged fountain of justice as well as of power; and, prior to the act of settlement he had the power to appoint the judges, fix their salaries, and to remove them at his pleasure; but since the first dawn of constitutional liberty in that high-spirited and independent nation, every attempt on the part of the Crown to control the decisions of his courts of justice has been condemned—exclaimed against as an aggression—an invasion of the rights of freemen, of itself enough to arouse every patriot spirit to resistance. True, there have been periods in which the wakeful genius of British liberty has slumbered; true, there have been times in which the rights of that people have been trodden down, and when those who usurped them were permitted for awhile to enjoy their triumph; but the day of retribution always came, and brought with it ruin to the invaders, and new safeguards to the rights of the people. I will advert to a few of the incidents in which the Crown attempted (with what ultimate success all posterity can tell) to draw to himself the potential exercise of judicial power, through dependent judges, whose hopes and fears should make them subservient to his will.

In the reign of James I, arose the celebrated cause, known to lawyers as “the case of the Commendams,” where, in a suit between two individuals, some prerogative of the Crown was drawn in question. When the king received information of this, he signified to the chief justice, (Sir Edward Coke,) that he would not have them proceed to judgment till he had spoken with them. The judges thereupon assembled, and by a letter signed by all of them, certified to the king that they were bound by their oaths to disregard any mandate which might come to them contrary to law; that the command of the king was illegal, and that they must proceed to judgment. A noble assertion of independence in men, who held their all—office, honor, emolument—every thing, except conscience, at the will of the man whose command they had thus dared to resist. This assertion, too, of independent discharge of judicial duty shows most conclusively what the constitution of that country was, and was held to be, whenever the people were for a moment released from the strong pressure of power. But the events that followed are singularly characteristic, and of close application to certain incidents of our own times. The king was offended; called the judges together, and read them a lecture on the subject, in which he censured them with severity for their disobedience. The historian tells us that the greater part of the judges, not firm enough to endure the frown of offended majesty, humbled themselves before him, fell on their knees, and sued for pardon, promising hereafter to do all the king should command them. Thus, says the historian, did they at last prostitute their integrity and their fame, through dread of losing their offices, or rather, perhaps, of incurring the unmerciful and ruinous penalties of the star-chamber. Sir Edward Coke alone remained refractory; he was accordingly suspended from office, and afterwards dismissed. This act, all writers on that subject, with one accord, allege as a violation of the British constitution, and a gross abuse of the powers of the Crown.

The like was attempted in another age, and is better known to politicians and lawyers. I refer to the celebrated case in relation to ship money, in the reign of Charles I. The king, wishing to lay this illegal tax, contrived to get the opinion of the twelve judges, beforehand, on the question of his power to levy it. This opinion, with that of the attorney general, was published and spread abroad through the land; and the judges were held to be fairly pledged, to use a modern phrase of pregnant import, to decide in favor of the Crown, if a case under proclamation should be brought before them for adjudication. This did not deter the patriots of the time from opposing to that illegal and oppressive measure a stern and determined resistance. Hampden refused to pay the tax, and encouraged others to follow his example; and the question was brought before the twelve judges for their determination; seven of the twelve pronounced in favor of the Crown, but others, and among them Coke, displayed a most praiseworthy intrepidity. He had, unfortunately, signed the opinion in favor of the right; for this he made the best apology in his power; and, in truth, says the historian, "it was the ultimate success that sometimes attends a struggle between conscience and self-interest and timidity." It is even said that Coke had resolved to give judgment for the king, but was withheld, not in consequence of a consultation with his father, but with his wife, who implored him not to sacrifice his conscience for fear of any danger or prejudice to his family, being contented to suffer any misery with him rather than to be an occasion to him to violate his integrity. Whether he was ridiculed in his own time for seeking counsel in the domestic circle, of one whom he knew to be faithful to his person and his fame, I know not; but I do know that history consecrates the act, and all the names that are associated with it—for it was a noble and magnanimous sacrifice to conscience and law, in opposition to the will of reckless and usurping power—a power which, in that instance, as in the one more near to us, attempted to grasp the purse of the nation, by operating on the hopes and fears of those whom the law had designated as its guardians.

I hope, sir, I shall be excused for touching upon one other event in English history, referred to the other day by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] I understood the honorable Senator to say, that the veto power was a power emphatically protective of popular rights, and that it had never been exercised save for the protection of the people. I also understood him to speak in high terms of approbation of the exercise of this power by William III, of England, that whig king, to whom he attributes even republican virtue. I have examined, cursorily indeed, and can find but a single instance in which the veto was used by this sovereign, and that was to defeat a bill passed by Parliament rendering the judges independent of the Crown. Now, sir, I cannot admit that the veto power, in this instance, was exercised in defence of popular rights—[Mr. RIVES explained: He meant to say that the veto had been exercised in the United States in defence of the rights of the people.]

Mr. EWING resumed: I am ready to admit the explanation of the honorable Senator to its fullest extent, but in one thing I could not be mistaken. The honorable Senator cited with approbation, and even encomium, the exercise of the veto power by that king; and I find no example, in his reign, of its exercise, except in the case to which I have referred. I am sure the honorable Senator would not defend, much less applaud, its application in such an instance. William III seems to have been, like most other men possessed of power, willing to enlarge, but reluctant to diminish it; he knew the advantage which some of his predecessors had obtained by their influence over the judges; and that he might retain that advantage, he vetoed the bill which was to give them independence. It will be readily perceived that the case under consideration afforded much less pretence for executive interference than that to which I have assimilated it. According to the theory of the British constitution, the king is the fountain of justice. The judges who administer justice, are his judges, and, at the time referred to, he could create or destroy them at his will. Then, as they were created and sustained by him, and as the power they exercised emanated from him, and as he was charged through them with the administration of justice, there were plausible grounds for the advocates of power to rest on when they contended that the judges were bound to pronounce judgment, in any particular case, as the king should command. But what is there here on which to rest this assumption of executive power, and this right of executive interference to control the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in the given case? The subject-matter over which this discretion presides is one of which the President has no control, either by the constitution or the law. It is the purse of the nation, and its management and care is vested in the representatives of the people. The officer to whom it was intrusted (the Secretary of the Treasury) is one whose duties, whose character, and whose designation, as I have shown, are not executive, but connected by the closest bond of duty with the legislative branches, and subject to their will. The power of the President, therefore, over the public depositories, existed only in that influence which, by virtue of the power of appointment and removal, he could exercise over the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. And is it material as to the legal right, whether he possessed the means of operating on the hopes, or the fears, or the cupidity, of that officer? All and each of them are illegal influences, directed to an illegal end. The President could not give the order for removal; but he could say to the Secretary of the Treasury, I will turn you out of office if you do not give it. If one Secretary refuse, he can displace him, and say to another, I will give you this office if you will give the order. Would it not be an equally legitimate exercise of power to say to a judge upon the bench, if he would acquit or condemn, according to executive will, in a special case, that he should be elevated to a seat on the higher tribunal? and if the judge should act under the influence thus made to bear upon him, would it not be a case the same in principle as the present, more striking and obvious to the senses, but not more flagrant in its character? In either case, the discretion vested in an officer of the Government, and an administrator of the law, is seduced or compelled to bend to the influence of him who wields the patronage of the nation. I hold, therefore, that this removal of the public depositories, by the President of the United States, was an interference with a subject-matter over which he had no control, and which the constitution and the laws had placed under the care and guardianship of other authorities; and that, whatever may have been the reasons which induced the act, it was in him a violation of law and a usurpation of power.

But aside from the question which I have thus far considered, and supposing, for the sake of argument, all the power granted to the Secretary of the Treasury by the law over the public depositories, to vest at once in the President, still it is clear to my mind that the law has in this instance been violated, and that the act of the President and Secretary, of both or either, impute it where you will, has gone beyond the authority vested in them by law. I refer, sir, not to the instructions given to the collectors of the revenue, that they should cease to deposit moneys and bonds in the Bank of the United States and its branches, but to the actual withdrawal of the public moneys from that Bank, which were placed there pursuant to a special provision of law; and were, to the amount of several millions, withdrawn without legal warrant. I ask, sir, where is the authority, actual or constructive; in what clause of the constitution, or in what provision of law, is it to be found, for the removal by order of the Secretary of the Treasury, or by the President, or by both conjointly, of the public funds from the custody in which they had been placed by the act of Congress?

By the act establishing the Treasury Department, to which I have already referred, the Secretary of the Treasury is required "to superintend the collection of the revenue;" by which is to be understood all such acts as are necessary to be performed before placing the money in the public treasury. When placed there the collection of it has ceased, and the superintendence over that collection, given to the Secretary, ceases to confer on him any power over it; all that he may possess further must be derived from some other provision or principle of law. But, under this provision, most of those acts of other Secretaries, which have been adduced here as precedents, have been performed, and rightfully performed. As, for example: Alexander Hamilton, when Secretary of the Treasury, directed the collector of the port of Charleston to pay over the public money as he collected it, and to deposit the public bonds with an individual, [Mr. Habersham.] But it will be perceived, at once, that this was a part of the act of collecting, and bringing the public money into the treasury, and under the control of the treasurer; and this course must have been taken; the money must have been paid to an agent of the department, for application or transmission; or it must have remained in the hands of the collector until it should be drawn for, or be transmitted by him, and paid over to the treasury. And here, sir, arises the much disputed question, what is the treasury of the United States? The most simple idea of it would be, that it were a strong box; or a strong vault, in which the money of the nation is garnered up and kept under the custody of the treasurer. But this is not true in practice or in fact. We have no such strong box or vault. It therefore is what Congress has seen fit to make it; and here I beg leave to say, that the definition given of it by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Rives,] coincides very nearly with my own conception of the thing. It is the state and condition of the public funds as fixed by law, and it involves custody, either with or without locality. Well, the funds of the United States were, pursuant to law, collected and deposited in the Bank of the United States. Now I ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, if, according to his own definition, the state and condition of their funds in this bank, inasmuch as it was that condition provided by law—I ask him, sir, if this does not come full up to his conception of the treasury; and if the withdrawal of those funds from that prescribed condition, without law, be not a withdrawal from the treasury?

We have then, sir, settled upon a determinate notion as to what the treasury is; and I think myself safe in the conclusion that the Bank of the United States, so far forth as it contained public funds, placed in it by command of law, and of which the law has not authorized the removal, is that treasury. I will now inquire by what authority the money of the United States was removed from that custody and placed in other hands.

I have shown that the act of removal does not pertain to the collection of the revenue; and care should be taken, if we wish to arrive at a true result, that the duties of collection, and the removal from the legal custody, of funds already collected, should not be confounded.

The ninth section of the first article of the constitution ordains "that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The law defining the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury reiterates the same provision. Unless, therefore, some clause in the law incorporating the bank gives him the power claimed over the public funds, he has it not. The fifteenth section of the bank charter is that under which I understand the power is claimed: It provides "that, during the continuance of this act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States or the Territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditor." This is the clause supposed to vest in the Secretary of the Treasury this power.

It is very clear to me, sir, that this confers on the Secretary no new power; it is not the scope or aim of the act, or any part of it, to define, or limit, or extend the previously granted powers of any officer of Government; its plain object is to create a fiscal agent, which shall aid the fiscal officers in the discharge of their duties; and the mode in which that aid shall be rendered is specifically designated and defined. The Secretary of the Treasury has a right to draw money from the treasury in pursuance of an appropriation by law. The nature of the appropriation may require that the money so drawn be applied in some part of the Union remote from that in which the deposit is made. The Secretary may, therefore, require that the funds be transferred, or that the necessary facilities for transferring them be given by the bank for the purposes for which the Secretary has a right to control them. But this law does not abrogate other laws, limiting and defining the control which the Secretary lawfully has over the public purse. These funds were in the place which the law had provided for their safe-keeping, and the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority so to withdraw them. But it is said that the funds are still in the Treasury of the United States; still under the control of the treasurer, and no more within the power of the Executive than they were while in the vaults of the Bank of the United States. Is this the fact? Far from it, sir; far from it. While the United States Bank was the depository of the public funds, no money could be drawn from it without an appropriation made by law, and it could lend no money beyond a specified sum, "for the use, or on account of the Government of the United States," without incurring a forfeiture in treble the amount of the "sums so unlawfully advanced or lent." The money, therefore, while left in that place of safe-keeping, could not be seized by the Executive, or any of the heads of departments, either directly or indirectly, without an appropriation. But how is it now? The public funds are, and are to be, distributed among a host of rival State institutions, lent to them without interest—for it is, to all intents and purposes, a loan—for the same identical money which is deposited is not kept and guarded, and returned when called for; the public money, to the amount of five or six millions, is distributed by way of loan, without interest; and do you not think, sir, that the banks, who receive it thus, will wish to win the favor and the good-will of the power which is so able to oblige them, and that they will be ready to lend, on interest, any portion of this fund, or all of it, to those from whom they received it? And do we doubt that it may be applied for? Is the idea chimerical? Look, sir, at the response of your Postmaster General to the recent call made on him by the Senate, and see how much reality there is already in this hypothesis. The Post Office Department, flourishing and full of improvement and reform, as it has been represented by annual reports from the functionary at its head, and from the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Road here, has already borrowed from a few of these deposite banks, on interest, three hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the public funds, which the Secretary of the Treasury has lent to those banks without interest; and he has overdrawn his account in others, he does not know how much, but he thinks fifty thousand dollars is very near the amount. But these will be matters for future consideration. I refer to them now, at once to put down the pretence that the public funds are safe as heretofore, and out of the immediate power of the Executive. Sir, they are not safe. The sums borrowed for the use of the Post Office Department are so much of the public treasure taken and applied without an appropriation by law. Ten times that sum, or any sum within the amount of public money at any time in deposite in these banks, may be borrowed by any or all of the departments, and used and applied according to executive pleasure, without appropriation, and in defiance of Congress. The purse of the nation is thus seized into the hands of the Executive, and is held subject to his will.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] contended that the power assumed by the President over the public treasury is not the power of the purse in the sense in which it was referred to by Patrick Henry, in the passage where in the danger of uniting the purse and sword are so eloquently depicted by that fervent and patriotic orator: the power of the purse, says the honorable Senator, is the power of taxation—the unlimited power of levying money upon the people merely at executive will. As applied to our own country, sir, I deny the correctness of this position. It is true in England, but not true here.

We have now in existence, and it is perpetual, a general system of laws, which, by its regular action, produces a revenue far beyond the wants of the Government. In consequence of past legislative action, money has flowed, and will continue to flow, into the Treasury, without further laws, far beyond the wants of an economical Government, and even beyond any probable waste of the most profuse and extravagant one; of what value, then, were the power of taxation to an Executive, or where its increased effect upon the people, after that power has had a perfect action, such as will continue to fill the coffers of the country as fast as extravagance and misrule can exhaust them, to all future time? In England, the king is not in possession of the purse in a dangerous sense, merely by commanding the treasury; because the existing laws have not at any period replenished that treasury so as to satisfy, for a considerable space of time, the wants of the Government, without the aid of fresh supplies from Parliament. Thus he who wielded the sword in England, did not command an efficient purse, by the mere control of the treasury. But not so here. Our treasury is full, and it is supplied by a perennial stream which pours, and must continue to pour into it, the wealth of the nation, until legislation checks its current; and should that be attempted, behold the veto power wielded by the same hands, and efficient to arrest the attempt at legislation. If, then, this assumption of power over the treasury by the Chief Magistrate be submitted to tamely; if Congress do not assert and maintain its rights; the chief barrier which the constitution placed in the way of individual supremacy, will have been broken down and destroyed, and we have the semblance without the reality of a constitutional Government.

I will now proceed to the consideration of another branch of the subject, which I propose to pass over briefly, as it has already been much dwelt upon in the course of the discussion. The 16th section of the bank charter, which I have already referred to, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to order and direct that the public deposites shall cease to be made in the Bank of the United States and its branches, and requires him to lay before Congress the reasons of such order and direction. Here is a power granted to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be exercised for reason. He has exercised that power, and he has presented the reasons; and I now propose to examine their validity.

First, however, an important circumstance presses itself upon our consideration—the time selected for the performance of this act. This could not fail to occur to the Secretary himself as a circumstance somewhat inauspicious in its character; and he attempts to explain it in his reports to Congress. After alleging various reasons for the removal of the deposites, and arguing at much length that it was unsafe to permit them to remain in the Bank of the United States, he says, (page 11,) “yet, as a few months would, in ordinary times, have made no very serious difference, and the removal had already been delayed until the meeting of Congress was approaching, I should have preferred executing the measure in a manner that would have enabled the legislature to act on the subject in advance of the actual removal, if it had deemed it proper to do so. But the conduct of the bank left me no choice, except between the immediate removal and its final relinquishment: for, if the measure had then been suspended, to be resumed at a future time, it was in the power of the bank to produce the same evil whenever it was again attempted.”

Sir, can you doubt, from this extract, that there was impressed upon the mind of the Secretary a strong sense of the propriety of reserving this subject for the action of Congress? And yet, I am prepared to show, by conclusive evidence, that the measure was delayed until Congress should not be in session; and again, its completion was hastened before that body should sit. It will be remembered, that a committee of the House of Representatives went into a very full and elaborate investigation of the affairs of the bank in 1832; at that time nearly all the charges which are arrayed against that institution by the Secretary of the Treasury were examined and pronounced upon by that body; and at the same session, and directly consequent upon that investigation, a bill for its re-charter passed both Houses of Congress by an overwhelming majority; but the measure was defeated by the veto of the President. In his annual message at the opening of Congress in 1832, the President again called the attention of Congress to the bank—referred specially to the three per cents, and spoke of the credit which was “given throughout the country to many serious charges impeaching its character, and which, if true, might justly excite the apprehension that it is no longer a safe depository for the public funds;” and suggesting the propriety of an inquiry into the transactions of the institution, embracing its branches. The same matters were urged by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report to Congress. A gentleman of acknowledged reputation, and a warm supporter of the present administration, was appointed by the department to examine and report upon the affairs of the bank. He discharged his duty; and his report, which was laid before Congress, was enough to quiet every honest apprehension of danger, arising from rumors, however industriously circulated or implicitly believed. The subject was, at the session of 1832-’3, taken up and ably investigated by a committee of Congress, who, with full information before them, reported a resolution in these words: “Resolved, That the Government deposites may, in the opinion of the House, be safely continued in the Bank of the United States," which passed the House on the 2d of March, 1833, by a vote of 109 to 46. One would have thought this result sufficient to put the question, at least for the present, at rest. But not so. Immediately after the adjournment of Congress, new rumors reached the President; and the Government directors are instructed by him, in a letter addressed to them on the 14th April, to inquire into the truth of those new matters; which they accordingly do, and the removal is, at least as early as the 3d of June, a matter pretty fully resolved on. An agent, not the same that had reported on the safety of the depositories, is despatched, to make arrangements with the State banks, preparatory to such removal—rumors are set afloat of the impending blow, accompanied with predictions that when the blow should come it would crush its victim—a run upon the bank, or some of its weakest branches, to act simultaneously with the withdrawal of the depositories, was apprehended, if not actually put on foot—and the official paper declared that the bank should and would be put down. Now, sir, the power that presided over and controlled the Treasury Department was not compelled by circumstances to adopt any or all of these alarming measures. Is there not, on the contrary, a degree of reckless wantonness in them, considering the time and circumstances under which they were commenced and carried on? But the measures adopted and pursued by the Executive did compel the bank to adopt the strongest possible defensive and protective measures. The power that was arrayed against it was no less than the whole fiscal power of the Government, wielded, in part, without the slightest regard for law. A large amount of the public funds were in deposit in the bank; and this was to be withdrawn by a new application of a well-known fiscal power—the transfer draft; but the bank knew not when, or by whom, they were to be called upon for a sum of from seven to ten millions of dollars. As an auxiliary measure, they were threatened with a run on their branches; and they knew not—indeed, it was impossible to know—where the attack would first be made. One thing they did know—they had spies in the camp, in the capacity of Government directors, who, they had reason to believe, would facilitate, by information or otherwise, any catastrophe, even to the destruction of the institution, if they believed it would be deemed acceptable service by the Executive. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] assures us that those transfer drafts were small in amount; and although the bank had no notice of them, yet they were registered at Washington and might have been inspected by the bank's agent here. The honorable Senator is also clearly of opinion that the bank should have shown a little forbearance, and waited at least the sixty days, until the meeting of Congress, before it made preparations for its defence. Now, sir, this may pass pretty well for a candid opinion and impartial counsel; but would not the proposed moderation have been quite as justly recommended to the party making the attack as to the party assailed? The manifest injustice of the honorable Senator's censure on the directors of the bank for their efforts to defend the institution, and protect it from ruin, cannot but strike every unbiassed mind. Why, asks the honorable Senator, could they not wait the short space of sixty days, until the session of Congress, before bringing distress on the community by withdrawing their issues? Sir, I can tell the honorable Senator why. Had they done so, they must have gone down—they would not even have "died hard"—the bank would have been crushed at once, had it followed that prudent and very friendly counsel. But the honorable Senator says the bank was cruel in its distress; it refused its accustomed relief even to its friends and neighbors; and the tendency of his remarks, as I understand them, is to cast odium upon the directors for refusing those accommodations.—

Can any thing be more unfounded and unjust? The bank has been wantonly and unjustly assailed, and, in making good its defence, it is compelled to withdraw the benefits which it had heretofore extended to the public; and the honorable Senator now attempts to cast the odium arising from public suffering on the injured instead of the aggressor.

Sir, it was no light responsibility that rested on the directors of this institution. The duty which they owed to the stockholders, and more especially to the country, required them at all events to preserve its solvency. They would have been inexcusable had they even exposed it to any risk; and though their measures of precaution may have been more than adequate for its protection, and though the pressure may be temporary, if justice be now done here, yet, if the bank had fallen in the struggle, the shock upon the credit of our country would have been universal, and its mischief without remedy for a generation to come. If this bank had been put down, and its bills dishonored, every bank in the Union must then have fallen with it. The shock would have been sudden, and the State institutions would have had no time to prepare to meet and ward off the blow; all, even the best, must have crumbled; and there would have been a total destruction of our currency, and an end to all credit and confidence. Look, for example, at the situation of the banks of New York, bound together as they are by that most vicious of all systems that ever human head devised—the safety-fund system. They owe on depositories about six millions; they have a circulation of more than six millions; and have, altogether, a little more than three hundred thousand dollars of specie in their vaults. If the shock attempted to be brought about had taken place, followed as it must have been by a run on all the banks, these safety-fund banks could, if they dealt fairly, have paid four cents on the dollar in ready cash to all their creditors, but those who held their paper would not have fared so well. Those who have money in depository are always the first to see the approach of danger, and are generally in a situation to protect themselves first; and the specie in these banks would have paid about eight cents on the dollar upon their depositories. The shock would have been severe enough every where; but there, under a system cunningly framed to avoid all salutary checks upon over-issues, where every thing like wholesome control over excessive banking is removed—where there is no redeeming principle—no solvency at the bottom of all the mass that is afloat—there must have been a total crush of business and credit.

In considering the Secretary's reasons for removing the depositories, it is in the first place important to settle upon some definite notions of the principles on which they were placed in the Bank of the United States by Congress—whether as a matter of mere grace to the bank, as a matter of mere convenience to the Government, or as a matter of contract founded on the mutual convenience of both parties. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] is of opinion that it was considered, at the time of the enactment of the law, an onerous duty which was thrown upon the bank, rather than a matter of favor. This, sir, is a thing about which I will not contend. I have no doubt that at first it was a burden; considering the state of the currency at the time—a burden to the bank and a benefit to the treasury. But, we are hardly to suppose that the forecast of the parties was so very limited as not to perceive that, in that respect, the times would most materially change. The difficulty in the beginning arose from the deranged state of the currency. One great object of the bank was to set this right; and, when that should be effected, the depositories would, as a matter of course, cease to be a burden, and become a benefit; this was doubtless foreseen, as it actually took place. It is not, therefore, fair to reason from the supposition that, because the bank necessarily sustained losses from receiving the deposits for the first few years of its existence, that therefore the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to take them away as soon as they became a source of profit, especially as this improved state of things was, in a great measure, brought about by the bank itself. I will resort, then, sir, to the face of the charter—which is the contract between the Government and the stockholders of this bank—to determine whether this important matter is included in that contract.

It is an express stipulation that the deposits shall be made in the Bank of the United States, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise order and direct, and that direction is to be for reasons which are to be made known to Congress. As the Secretary is authorized to do this, it would seem essential that he should have power to obtain such information of the affairs of the bank as would enable him to discharge, understandingly, this important duty. And, inasmuch as this duty is intrusted to a functionary who is, in effect, the financial agent or commissioner of Congress, it follows that the causes of removal should relate especially to the safe and convenient management of the finances of the country. On looking into the charter, we find ample powers of inspection and examination, vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, to answer all financial purposes, and nothing more. He "shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation; of the debts due to the same; of the money deposited therein; of the notes in circulation; and of the specie in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of said bank as shall relate to the said statements;" or, in other words, the Secretary of the Treasury may examine, once a week, the state of the bank, by which he can instantly determine the ability of the bank, at any time, to discharge its debts, or meet its engagements; and this is all that he can ascertain by any examination which he is authorized by law to make. Now, as the Secretary is authorized to make no other examination into the affairs of the bank than this, and there is no use which he can officially make of this examination, except to determine whether he will or will not remove the deposits, it would seem to follow, as a consequence, that his reasons for removing them, and the subject and scope of his examination, must coincide; that the reasons for the removal must flow out of the examination. I think the contracting parties may be fairly held so to have considered it at the time of entering into the stipulations. These suggestions will require additional force if we compare the measured power meted out to the Secretary of the Treasury, limited and restricted as it, is with the uncontrolled power of either House of Congress to investigate all the concerns of the bank, without reservation or limit. The Secretary had care of the safety of the public treasure, and he must investigate so as to preserve it. Congress had care of the whole public weal, and all that could in anywise affect that must be reserved to their examination and censure.

The Secretary, then, had no right to resort to reasons other than those of a financial character—the safe keeping and convenient use of the public funds, as a cause of the removal; every thing else should have been left to the decision of Congress. But what are the Secretary's reasons? Let us look at them: First, the charter of the bank was drawing near its termination; and, therefore, he thought it necessary for the public good to remove the deposits. Now surely it was never contemplated by the legislature who passed the law chartering the bank, that this would be argued as a reason for this exercise of power. Did not that legislature know, in 1816, as well as Mr. Secretary Taney knows now, that in 1833 this charter would be within three years of its termination? and, if that had been esteemed a sufficient reason why the deposits should cease to be made there, it would have been easy to settle it by enactment, not leave it open to discretion. But, sir, the legislature of 1832—'3, who had the question of the deposits before them, down to the 2d day of March last, and who considered them safe and well in that bank, were as fully informed as the Secretary could be, as to the time of the termination of this charter; and they did not think that a fit cause of removal. Sir, there is a precedent in point upon this subject. The charter of the bank of 1791 expired on the 4th of March, 1811; and the public deposits were made in it, pursuant to a law of 1800, until shortly before its termination. Mr. Gallatin was at that time Secretary of the Treasury, and he exercised what must be admitted a sound discretion as to the time, previous to the termination of the charter, at which it should cease to be a place of deposit. And how long, Mr. President, do you suppose he thought sufficient? Just seven days, neither more nor less. The charter expired on the 4th day of March; and he wrote his first letter, directing a change of the place of deposit, on the 25th of February preceding; and it is not to be forgotten that the present bank has two years to close its business after its charter shall have expired, but the old bank had not a day. There seems to have been a striking difference of opinion between Mr. Gallatin, then Secretary, and Mr. Taney, now Secretary, as to the necessities imposed on that department, by the near approach of the dissolution of its fiscal agent. Between the financial talents of those gentlemen I can institute no comparison by way of giving the force of authority to the opinion of either; but there was certainly some difference in the experience which each had had in the conduct of the Department. Mr. Gallatin had watched over and governed its affairs with distinguished ability, for more than nine years. Mr. Taney had been Secretary just three days.

The right to remove the deposits, for other reasons than those of safety and convenience, is supposed to be supported by the authority of Mr. Crawford, who, in 1817, placed a portion of the public funds in some of the local banks for the purpose of sustaining them. I will not now, sir, inquire whether Mr. Crawford acted in this under the resolution of Congress, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, or with reference to his general power over the finances; if the latter, he mistook the extent of his authority, as men in power too frequently do; and, at any rate, whatever may have been his power, and whatever his motive (and I have no doubt it was an honest one, for no man can respect Mr. Crawford more highly than I do,) it was a most unfortunate step; one that stands as an example to be shunned, not as a precedent to be followed. Much of the money so deposited was lost to the Government, and, in some instances, it gave the banks for a short time a fictitious credit, and enabled them to throw out large amounts of their paper upon the community, which soon fell to nothing in the hands of the innocent holders. A reference to that transaction proves nothing in support of the policy of the act.

The Secretary of the Treasury next characterizes the bank as the agent of the Department, and thereupon founds various charges against it, in the conduct of that general agency. It is well to inquire how far, and for what purposes, this bank was and is the agent of Government; and we can then form a just opinion, whether its duty in that capacity has been violated or not. This bank, sir, as such agent, had distinct and well-defined duties to perform; there were certain lines and bounds marked out for it, on either side of which it must not swerve. If the bank were too gracious to the ruling powers, its charter visited it with an enormous penalty; if it fell short in the way of legal and just accommodation, it was also a subject of due animadversion. But what are the prescribed duties of this bank, as fiscal agent? To receive and keep safely the public deposits; to afford facilities for transmitting the public funds from place to place, free of charge; to disburse the public moneys where required; and to perform the duties of commissioner of loans. These, I believe, are all the prescribed duties of an active kind; as to the passive or subjective duties, there is but one—to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to inspect the state of the bank weekly. Now, it is not pretended that, in any one of these particulars, this bank has violated or failed in its duty as agent—not in the smallest tittle. What, then, does the Secretary complain of, as a breach of delegated trust? Why, that the bank concealed from him the manner in which it was employing its funds; that the directors did not let him into the whole business and conduct of the bank. This complaint is spread over nearly a page of his report, stating the reasons of the removal. Sir, had he any right to inspect the affairs of the bank, in the manner and to the extent of this pretence? The charter does not give it to him; nay, it in express terms denies him the right, and, in effect, forbids the directors to permit it. "Provided, That this shall not imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual, or individuals, with said bank." Besides, it is a long-established principle of faith and honor, that the accounts of no individual with a bank shall be disclosed out of the directory itself. The subject of complaint is, that the Government directors, who made frequent and free communications to the Executive of those private affairs which the charter did not permit to be disclosed, were not placed on committees which would enable them to get and communicate all that they wished. They were not trusted with as many secrets as they wished to betray. Well, sir, was not this right? The directors of that bank were as much bound to keep the secrets of their customers, as to keep their cash in safety; and if any director was detected in making free, in an illegal way, with either the one or the other, it was the duty of the rest to keep them out of his power. The Secretary of the Treasury was permitted to know all that the law intended he should know of the affairs of the bank; and if there was any deficiency in his legitimate information, if any thing more was wanting for any honest purpose, it was the fault in the law, not in the directors, that it was not given.

But it does not appear that the Government directors, even after they commenced their system of espionage, were excluded from any of the sources of information accessible to the rest of the board. On the contrary, it is abundantly evident that they were placed upon a footing of exact equality—having reference to their capacity for business—and that, in truth, is one of their subjects of complaint. They express surprise that they should be thought of and treated as no better than the rest of the directors, and boast of being clothed with all the majesty of the people, and representing the power and authority of the Executive. Now, sir, all the power these gentlemen possess, and all their authority, spring from the charter solely; and it would be in vain that we should look in that instrument for any the slightest distinction between them and the other twenty directors. There is a difference in their mode of creation; these five are appointed by the Executive, and the other twenty hold their station by the more vulgar mode of election; but any privilege claimed on that score is similar to that of being better born than their neighbors, and is entitled to the same respect. Those gentlemen have one other peculiar privilege, if they please to call it one, which I had liked to have overlooked—that of being removable by the President at his pleasure, while the others hold their offices during the year. But this is not all. If they were any thing more than directors, their additional powers and duties would have been defined; for surely they have not the whole management of the bank intrusted to their care, and if they have not, and are still more than mere directors, I would be obliged to any one who will tell me exactly what their additional powers and privileges are.

The committee of exchange, which the Secretary makes another cause of complaint, performs, as far as I am able to ascertain, the duties allotted in other banks to the president and cashier. The nature and extent of those duties, and the manner of their performance, were disclosed to the committee of the House of Representatives in 1832, and passed the ordeal of that House without the slightest censure. Indeed, it might as well be made a subject of complaint, that bills are paid in cash at the counter by the teller, instead of a board of seven directors, as that the ordinary exchanges are conducted without the constant attendance of that board.

The affair of the three per cents was made the subject of special investigation last year before the House of Representatives. All that could be urged against the conduct of the bank on that subject was brought forward and pressed by the Executive and the Secretary of the Treasury on that occasion, before (what was then thought to be) the proper forum; and a resolution, which grew out of this inquiry, declaring the deposits safe, in that bank, passed that body by an overwhelming majority—more than two to one. It does not seem to me necessary to recapitulate the reasons and the facts presented then to Congress, showing not only the propriety, but the merit of their course in the very affair complained of. For, when a question like this is once settled, and by the proper tribunal, it ought to be at rest forever. In politics, as well as in law, there ought to be some end to litigation.

Next in order is the French bill—another instance in which the Secretary says the bank has violated its duty as agent of the Government. Now, sir, we have a right to expect fairness on the part of the Secretary towards the bank, accompanied with what we know he does possess—legal knowledge; and the Secretary does know, or at least ought to know, whether this transaction comes within the range of duty prescribed to this bank, in its character of fiscal agent. It does not, so far as it relates to the transmission of funds from place to place, for that is confined to the United States, and its Territories; and here was no order of transmission. It does not fall within their duty as commissioner of loans or paying agent. The bill was not placed in their hands for collection. They offered to receive it in that capacity, and it was refused them. It was set up for sale; hawked about in Wall street; and as no one could be found who would give so good a price for it, it was at last sold to the bank. Sir, did not the Secretary know that there was nothing of the character of agency in this? Suppose the broker who bid the next best price for the bill had got it, would any man have thought of complaining of him for claiming his damages for the protest? If he would have been entitled to it, the bank that overbid him is entitled to it; if not, the bank could not come into fair competition with him as a bidder. This pretext is indeed a shallow one; for, if the bank were not entitled to the penalty, the Secretary has no right, for that cause, to remove the deposits. This claim made by the bank, right or wrong, does not endanger them. He might refuse to allow the claim of the bank, and leave the right to be determined by the proper authorities. There seems, however, to be an impression on the mind of the Secretary, which he does not very explicitly express, that, when this bill was protested, the bank ought to have been prepared with funds to take it up on account of Government, and not on their own account, and thus have made the transaction one of agency. Now, the decisive objection to this is, that the bank had no such authority. They could not take the money of the United States then on deposit in their vaults, (if a sufficient sum were there at the time,) and apply it to any such purpose. An act of that kind would have been presumptuous indeed, and could not have failed to draw down on them the severest animadversions. The Secretary had ordered no such thing; he would have permitted no such thing; and the funds deposited to the credit of the Treasurer would have been still subject to his draft, notwithstanding such payment. A payment in that character would therefore have been an advance of more than $500,000, for the use and on account of Government; and it would have subjected all concerned in it to a penalty three-fold the amount of the sum advanced. And, from the spirit of hostility now displayed against that institution, I appeal to you, sir, whether, in your opinion, that penalty would not have been enforced?

Last among the charges preferred against this institution, is, that it has interfered with the elective franchise that it has entered the lists as a political gladiator; that it has attempted to control the election of Chief Magistrate, by printing and issuing papers, hand-bills, &c. The whole proof is, that, when the bank was attacked by public communications, or through the public press, it did defend, or attempt to defend, itself against accusations false in fact or false in argument. There is no proof of its having gone beyond this; and this, I contend, was not only a right, but a duty. What were the papers which the bank did publish and circulate? Mr. Gallatin's report on the finance; the speeches of honorable members on this and the other floor of Congress; talented, dignified, and decorous state papers. But gentlemen deny the right of the bank to defend itself when attacked; to repel falsehood by a statement of the truth; or even a right to petition Congress. I can only say that I differ from gentlemen in this, and it is a point which most clearly admits of no argument. But if the bank should happen to be wrong in this, does the error render the deposites unsafe? Is there real danger that the moneyed men concerned in this bank will permit themselves to be made bankrupt by the publication of reports and documents, so that there will not be money enough left on hand to pay the public its deposites? There is an evident attempt to exaggerate a very trifling pecuniary transaction into one of vast magnitude and danger. The political influence of this and all other moneyed institutions is, and must ever be in our country, absolutely nothing, or rather a negative quantity. They must exist as matters of commercial and financial necessity; but they possess no popularity and can attain no power. The serious evils which, as a people, we suffer, when they are destroyed, is all that induces us to sustain them.

Now, sir, having glanced at the reasons rendered by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposites, I take the issue which he has tendered, and ask, with him—and wish the vote of the Senate to contain the answer—would a prudent man, mindful of his own affairs, under all these circumstances, permit his money to remain in deposit in the hands of this agent? Would a prudent capitalist, who necessarily kept on hand an average sum of five millions of dollars, and received and disbursed thirty millions annually, permit it to remain in deposit in this bank, or would he transfer it to the local banks to which the public funds have been transferred? It is not passion or excited feeling to which the Secretary addresses, or has a right to address, this inquiry; it is reason, cool, calculating reason—the coldest and least excitable of all reason—that of the capitalist, watching over the safety of his treasure. And, sir, would the prudent capitalist trust his own money in this bank, with all the facts before him, or would he remove it, as the Secretary has the public funds, to a horde of local banks? No man, in his senses, can hesitate as to the answer. A wary capitalist would not ensure the safety of the funds, where they now are, for an excess of two per cent. over the value of such insurance in the Bank of the United States. Indeed, sir, the agent of the Treasury, who negotiated the transfer, aware of the precarious situation of the public money where he was about to place it, attempted a kind of safety-fund system, to be made up of two per cent. interest on the deposites. This was to make all safe, and perhaps to answer certain other purposes; but, as that did not take, he at last resorted to the private bonds of the directors of the several banks; and there lies our security. The public money is lent out to local banks, on the faith of private bonds, and what are those bonds worth in law, and where the authority to take or enforce them? And where now is the public treasury? Where and what is that "state and condition of the public funds" which, according to the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] constitutes the treasury? Floating upon the wide waste of water, without anchor, or compass, or helm—obedient only to the breath of party, it is left to drift into whatever haven or whatever gulf that blind and reckless power may drive it—here to-day, and there to-morrow; the bark has been boarded by the demon party, and the freight seized as spoils out of the hands of the people and of the law, and placed in the magazine of the victors. Sir, the public money in the local banks is not a deposit for safe keeping; it is lent to them without interest, and they lend the same money with interest, to whom they please now, and by-and-by they must lend it to whomever the agent of the Treasury shall dictate. Let this act be passed by without rebuke, and what is to prevent the Department from lending to individuals as well as banks? The doctrine is, indeed, established by the admission of this fact; for here is a loan to artificial beings, over whose creation or whose existence the general Government has not and cannot have any legislative control. But the Department may have a kind of control over these banks of a character the most dangerous, the most corrupting, that can be conceived. Suppose these five millions of dollars distributed among one hundred local banks, well chosen to exert a political influence in their vicinity; let them receive it in the first place, as I presume they will, without the imposition of any degrading terms; yet, when they are once fairly drawn within the political vortex, they must submit to such terms, however dishonorable, as may be imposed. Suppose, sir, but fifty thousand dollars deposited in a bank, with specie to twice the amount, and the condition should be at once exacted—do the bidding of the Treasury agent, or the deposites shall be withdrawn to-morrow; and let this be accompanied with a gentle hint that the public should be informed, through a host of official papers, that the reason of removal respected the safety of the public funds; could any bank promise themselves an escape from the alternative of submission or ruin? And will not this be the tactics? Is not this the use which is to be henceforth made of the finances of the country? The agent of the Treasury is to preside over the directory of these banks; he is to command and to prohibit loans, as a political view may be advanced in one or the other mode; he is to exact gratuitous loans, or even gifts, in extraordinary cases; and all must be yielded or refused at the price of ruin. Human ingenuity never devised a scheme more effectual to destroy the independence or curb the energies of a people.

The Senator from Pennsylvania near me, [Mr. WICKES,] assures us, that the removal of the deposites has caused no pressure in his portion of the country. In his own city—the flourishing, populous, enterprising city of Pittsburgh—he says there is no pressure; all is flourishing and prosperous as heretofore; all is easy, and all is well. I confess, sir, I was not a little surprised at this assertion. The communication between that city and the interior of Ohio is close and constant; and, unless my information was fallacious indeed, a severe pressure was felt there upon the money market, even before the commencement of the present session of Congress; and recently, I have been assured by gentlemen of undoubted information, from its immediate vicinity, that there is now, and has been for some time past, the most extraordinary pressure and alarm that has been witnessed for many years. This, however, is a fact about which it is idle to dispute; the people know whether they feel an unusual inconvenience, and pressure, and embarrassment in their moneyed concerns from any cause. If they do, those who cannot perceive the facts will hardly be appealed to, to explain the cause or point out the remedy.

Removal of the Deposites.

Some gentlemen, who admit that there is pecuniary pressure in portions of our country, have discovered that it extends only to banks, or individuals connected directly or indirectly with the Bank of the United States. Sir, I agree with them—"it needs no ghost to come from the grave to tell us that;" there is no bank, and no individual within the limits of this widely-extended republic, whatever be his occupation—merchant, farmer, mechanic, or laborer—who buys a bushel of salt, or pays a tax to the value of fifty cents, but is, in a greater or less degree, directly or indirectly, connected in and through his daily avocations with the Bank of the United States and its issues. That bank, sir, is the life-preserving, invigorating principle of our whole moneyed system; and no one can foresee the chaos into which that system is to fall, when that principle is destroyed. But the evil is just begun, and scenes of darkness and tribulation will follow in its train. The Executive of the country has not sheathed the sword with which he attacked, but it is still suspended for the final, fatal blow. If a single point of assault be exposed—if a penetrable spot in the armor of his devoted victim be left unguarded—the vengeful shock will be instantaneous: it will fall there, and it will be struck home. Sir, the bank is upon its defence, and it must continue to defend its citadel, and guard its outposts; for the man who has pronounced its doom is one who never falters and never spares. And what, Mr. President, is to be the sequel of this conflict? Why, it must go on until the charter of the bank terminates, if executive influence can (and what can it not?) keep up the conflict to that day. As a continued measure of self-defence and self-protection, the bank must continue to withdraw its issues; it must call in its debts; and where are the people to procure the funds necessary to meet them? Can they expect relief from the State banks? No, sir; those banks, to preserve their own existence, must contract their issues, and call in their loans, for, if they do not, their paper will flow into the Bank of the United States, in payment of debts due them, and their specie will be exhausted to redeem their notes. From that quarter there is no relief. Shall it be found in the charter of banks, connected with the States, and with a loan secured on the real property of the country? Shall it be done by a host of local banks spread over all parts of the country? Sir, this were but the expedient of the bankrupt to ward off for a time the approaching ruin, making it fall heavier and more fatally at last. In this alarming crisis I look home to my own State, with deep anxiety for its welfare and security. And suppose a bank founded upon State capital in Ohio, what would it avail? Every dollar of its capital would be borrowed by the needy debtors of the Bank of the United States, or the debtors of those debtors, and flow into the vaults of that bank, and be shipped to Europe, or wagoned to the Atlantic cities, to pay off the stockholders of this prostrate institution; and we should have there a State bank without capital, and a debt cast upon the State, for the experiment, more than equal to the whole cost of all her internal improvements. There are other evils which I need not enumerate. Ohio has too many near examples before her eyes to think of resorting to that suicidal policy. New local banks can afford no relief; they cannot be set up with capital, for it is swept from the country, or, like waters frozen in their fountains, it ceases to flow over and fertilize the earth. If set up without capital, let past examples witness—let the scene of trial and of misery from which our country a few years since emerged, witness, and warn them against a recurrence of those evils. I believe, sir, sincerely believe, that the Western country, especially the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, suffers at present much less than the average share of the evil resulting from this ill-judged measure. But her day of tribulation is, I fear, at hand. The business of that State, and, indeed, of the whole West, is principally based upon her exports of pork, flour, and tobacco; which staples are purchased with money raised on bills of exchange, to be paid out of the produce when shipped to and laid down in the eastern markets. It is when that produce is offered in those markets, and cannot be sold for any price because of the want of money; it is when those bills are at maturity, and cannot be paid, that the western banks and the western merchants will feel the full extent of the pressure that is coming upon them; it will then descend with accelerated force upon the common mass of the community there. The bank, whose bills were not paid, and which has been pressed for the payment in specie of every dollar of its notes in circulation, will not lend to the merchant to buy produce. The merchant, who has been ruined, or suffered loss, by the misfortune of the times, in his last shipment, will not purchase at all, or, if he do, it will not be at his accustomed prices. The rich produce of our country—the dependance, the stay, and the wealth of the farmer, is struck down to nothing, and must lie on his hands, or be sold for a mere song. Sir, I will not pursue the picture further; I have viewed it only in its mildest aspects; but there is bankruptcy, misery, and ruin following in its train. But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES,] says we are to expect all this, and worse—he bids us prepare for it. How was it in 1811, when the old Bank of the United States went down, without violence or injustice, but by law? He tells you that flour sunk four dollars per barrel in a single week, and other produce in proportion; and he warns us to expect even severer trials than those, as the business of this bank is greater than was that, and more intimately blended with all the business of the country. But, does the honorable Senator propose to avert the evil, because of its magnitude and severity? No, sir—no; it must be borne, he says, and not only borne, but hastened to its crisis—and why? The bank charter, he tells us, is a violation of the constitution—the first-born of the violations of the constitution; and who was it, sir, whose folly or wickedness, according to the honorable Senator, brought this curse upon the country, which the people must now expiate at the price of so much suffering? The first Congress who met after the adoption of the constitution, and many of whom were members of the convention—Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, who had been a leading member of the convention, advised it; and General Washington, who presided over the convention which framed the constitution, sanctioned the enormity. Mr. Madison, too—the pure and upright Madison—after having committed himself in early life against the institution, in maturer years, after a life of political experience, yielded his early impressions to that conviction which time and a sober and a calm inquiry after truth could not fail to produce on a mind like his; and he affixed his signature to the present bill. Those were the times in which the archetype of this much abused institution was created—in the first days of constitutional Government—in its hour of prime and purity, ere factions had arisen to distract, or party had acquired a sway over the public mind, superior to patriotism; and such were the men who created it—the fathers of the constitution, and the father of his country; and it is the solemn and deliberate act of such times, and of such men, which the honorable Senator visits with his heaviest censure and most unqualified denunciation. It is the curse which they have entailed upon the nation that must be expiated by the suffering and sorrows of a whole people. The evil, as he calls it, was about to expire of itself; but that is not enough—it must be stricken down by violence, that its death-pangs may convulse and agitate the nation.

But the honorable Senator has discovered in the distance, through the dim vista of years, a remedy for all our evils, and a haven of rest for our agitated country. He has discovered a potent charm by which the winds are to be hushed to silence, the waves lulled to rest, and the clouds of adversity which now hover over us dissipated and dispelled. We are to have a metallic currency only, and this is the panacea which is to heal the wounds of the constitution, and to restore our country to its wonted vigor and prosperity. Sir, the idea is a strange one to be uttered at this day in a deliberative assembly in a populous country, and an enterprising, especially a commercial community. Would the merchant, with his wagon-load of specie, surrounded by a guard of armed men to secure it against robbery, thank the Senator for his improvement in our currency? Will the grazier, with his horse-load of metallic coin, instead of his pocket full of fifty dollar notes on the Bank of the United States, thank him? Would the laborer, who, instead of the five dollar bill which was the price of his week's labor, and which he could change into coin at will, and who in the improved state of things shall receive half that sum in metal only, will he thank the honorable Senator for the improvement in his condition? Sir, this will not do; the merchant, the mechanic, the laborer, would laugh at the idea; they know as well as we know, that it could never be effected, and, if it could, that it were only distressing the community for the purpose of substituting a currency which would be inconvenient, and would not answer the necessities of business, for one that is every way convenient and does fully answer those necessities. It is to effect this object that the honorable Senator is about to apply the "cautery and the knife" to the institutions of our country. Sir, he must resort to another instrument, the scalpel also, and make the skeleton complete, lest he leave some muscle, sinew, or integument, which will swell and expand again into the form of life; and he must bind his patient or victim, whichever the country may be called, while suffering under his surgery, in closer bonds than it has even yet been bound; or, my word for it, it will not submit in quiet to the infliction.

But, if I understood the gentleman right, it is not only incorporated but accumulated and combined wealth against which he is disposed to wage this exterminating warfare; and, if so, it is perhaps the actual and not the potential cautery merely which he proposes to apply. If this be his true meaning, the remedy proposed is not a new one; fire and steel have been long an approved recipe, potent in extirpating stubborn corporations and contumacious individuals, and for opening the hoards and scattering abroad the abundance of accumulated as well as incorporated wealth.

Mr. President, the necessities of the country do at present require this institution, and it cannot be now destroyed without ruin to many, and injury to the whole people of the Union. It were wise, therefore, to permit it to exist undisturbed in the possession of its chartered privileges until that charter shall expire; and let it thus effect, during its appointed time, the object of its creation; and if, when that time expires, the public will shall be opposed to its continued or renewed and modified existence, why, be it so. I see, as I think, clearly, manifestly, a train of evils that will follow, until after a period of political and pecuniary suffering, the same remedy must again be late and tardily applied. But let the public will be done, and let the exigencies of the times dictate at last the remedy. It were worse than madness in us to violate law and right, in order to hasten the crisis.

Mr. President, the power of removal from office as a constitutional, contradistinguished from a legal power, has been asserted in this debate to exist in the Executive; and it has been pressed with an energy and emphasis which is not easily accounted for by any bearing which its determination either way can have upon the present question. It is, however, a familiar practice with the supporters of high prerogative, to go as far back as possible in tracing its origin. Hence, the theory of the divine right of kings, which it is said to be blasphemy to call in question. To question this imputed power of the President is, according to gentlemen here, a violation of the constitution. It is only on account of the general bearing of this doctrine, its tendency to centre and combine all the powers of the Government in one man, that I here touch the subject, as time will not permit me to dwell upon it. And let me be understood; I admit that the power of removal in the given case is vested in the President by law; but I deny that it is a power granted by or growing out of the constitution.

From what I said at the opening of my remarks on the nature of Executive power, and from the authority then cited, it will, I think, be manifest, that in no country, except those purely despotic in their form of government, or those closely verging on despotism in their genius and character, does the single abstract idea of Executive power carry with it, as of its essence, or even of its nature, the power also to appoint to or remove from office. The opinions of men are, in this respect, moulded and fashioned to the nature of their Government—where all power is supposed to be originally vested in the sovereign Executive; who holds that power by right of conquest or divine right—where the king is the fountain of justice and the fountain of honor, and the chief source of law, the opinion that this power is an essential power of the prerogative may well prevail; and that a king is possessed of it until, by charter, he shall have in whole or in part resigned it. But in a Government which rests upon the principle that all power originates with and centres in the people, the Executive power, and every other power which they may vest in their governors, is just what they please to make it. Such is our Government in its form and theory, and the powers of our Executive are to be sought for in the constitution, by a just and legitimate construction of that instrument.

The opinion of M. Necker, which I have already referred to, that "the executive power represents in the political system that mysterious principle which, in the moral man, unites action to the will," does not seem to carry with it the idea of the power of creation or destruction over the instruments with which that will is to be performed. The same writer, in another place, speaking of the wild views of the framers of the French constitution of 1790, says, "They treated this power (the Executive) as if it had been a supernatural pre-existent faculty;" and he complains that they created an Executive, without conferring on it a participation in the appointment to office, and some other patronage necessary to sustain its dignity and independence. Hence, I conclude that, in the opinion of this writer, at least, the term Executive power did not, of itself, ex vi termini, involve the power of appointment and removal from office. I will also take leave to refer to a writer (Ackerly) on the British constitution, whose work appeared about the middle of the 18th century. The author supposes a convention of the people assembled to fix, by mutual consent, the constitution of the monarchy; and in this assembly, Britannicus, a leading member, proposed "that the intended king, as head, should have the whole ex-executive power of the laws, and to take care of the administration of justice, and that he should neither deny, delay, nor sell justice to any man. He further propounded, that the intended king should have the sole appointment and nomination of all his judges, ministers of state, his admirals and generals, and all other officers in the state, both civil and military."

Now, it is perfectly apparent, from the consecutive sentences above quoted, that the author did not consider the grant of executive power to the king, accompanied by a charge that he enforce the laws, as conferring on him the power of appointment to office. The turn of expression connecting the second proposition with the first, "he further propounded," carries with it the idea of an additional proposition—a further grant of power—not the mere enumeration of powers already granted. Had the previous grant of the whole executive power been supposed to carry with it the power of appointment, and had the author thought fit to enumerate a class of appendant powers, he would have used other language appropriate to convey that idea. The expressions used wholly exclude it. The grant of executive power, and the injunction to see to the execution of the laws, did not, in the sense in which it was used by European writers, mean all that it is now said to mean in giving fullness to that power. But how was it in the several State Governments, from which the framers of the constitution more immediately derived their opinions and their views? Few of them, I believe, vested the power of appointment in their Governor, and still fewer the power of removal. In the memorable debate of 1789, on the bill establishing the Department of State, Mr Madison contends that both the appointing and removing powers are, in their very nature, executive; and that the simple grant of executive power to the President carried with it the power of appointment and removal, except so far as they are restrained by other provisions of the constitution. Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, denies the position, and says, that he has turned over the constitutions of all the States, and does not find that any of them have granted this power to the Governor; and Mr. Gerry inquires whether that maxim is supported by precedents, drawn from the practice of particular States? "The direct contrary," he adds, "is established;" and in the course of the debate this view of the subject is not again pressed by Mr. Madison, nor does he refer to any authority in support of the proposition.

If, sir, we look into the constitution itself, with a view to the opinion of its framers, we shall find that, as far as language can indicate, in strict accordance with the authorities which I have cited. The executive power is granted, in general terms, by the first section of the second article. Had that grant been intended to carry with it all powers now said to be in their nature executive, the subsequent clauses would have contained words of restriction instead of enumeration; instead of conferring on the President, in the subsequent clauses, certain enumerated powers, in their nature (as it is said) executive, that instrument would, after the manner of magna charta, have restrained him from exercising powers not intended to be conferred on him. But, sir, even if we consider all the powers enumerated in the second article of the constitution of such a nature that they are included in the general term, executive power, and are by that single term sufficiently granted, then the enumeration of those powers in the succeeding sections, does, by a well known rule of construction, exclude him from every power which is not thus specially expressed.

Mr. President, the appointing power is, say gentlemen, vested by the constitution in the President; and they argue that the power of removal is a necessary incident to the power of appointment. The error lies in the proposition which is taken for granted in the argument; the appointing power is not vested by the constitution in the President, but in the President and Senate; the right of nomination vests in the President alone; but in the appointment, the Senate is equal and co-ordinate. The language of the constitution, in conferring this power, "The President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint"—is the same precisely as that used in the enacting clause of a British statute—"be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of his Lords Spiritual and Temporal, &c. &c. in Parliament assembled." This analogy of expression could not have escaped the notice of the framers of the constitution; and they intended to grant, and did grant to that body, a participation in appointment to office, like that which the British Parliament had in the enactment of laws—an equal and co-ordinate power. If, then, the power of appointment carry with it, as a consequence, the power of removal, that power vests in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not in the President alone; and if the power of temporary appointments to fill vacancies which happen in the recess of the Senate must have its correlative power of removal, it gives a power of temporary removal or suspension from office, until the meeting of the Senate. This is all that reason and analogy would give him; and it is sufficient to meet all the exigencies of the case.

The opinion which the framers of the constitution held, and which they promulgated to the people, to induce them to sanction that instrument, was the same that I now hold and attempted to advocate. Alexander Hamilton, in the 77th number of the Federalist, says: "It has been mentioned as one of the advantages to be expected from the co-operation of the Senate in the business of appointments, that it would contribute to the stability of the administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as appoint; a change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, would not occasion so violent, or so general a revolution in the officers of the Government as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of office." This paper, with others, was sent abroad as the true exposition of the instrument which the people were called upon to adopt as their constitution; it was written and published by one of the framers of that instrument, and one standing high before the country for talent and intelligence. It was doubtless read by every man who had been a member of the convention; for it was circulated widely through all the States, and the correctness of the construction in this particular was contradicted by no one. Is not here a strong, nay, a decisive fact, to show that this is the true construction of the constitution?

Mr. President, I have dwelt longer on this subject than I intended, and I regret that it has arisen as an incidental question in debate; it is itself worthy of a separate and a full discussion; but I could not consent that, by this induction, the constitutional rights of this body should be cast as an offering at the footstool of power, without entering my most solemn protest against the surrender.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] visits with his heaviest censure the doings of the first Congress that met under the constitution, so far as they recognised implied or constructive powers vested by that instrument in the legislative departments of our Government. The charter of a bank in 1791 he styles "the first-born of the violations of the constitution." The protective policy, which traces its origin to the same exalted source, he equally condemns; but the acts of that body, when they tend to centre power in the executive—as, for example, the power of removal, whether by construction or implication, are authority so high and sacred, that it is almost impiety in us to contest it. If I understand the scope of his argument right, he denies any and all implied powers that have been exercised by the legislative department, and he sanctions all which are claimed, or ever have been claimed by the executive. Mark but the tendency of these doctrines—the tendency of the times—and let any man answer for himself whither are they to carry us? What power is there which has never been claimed by the Executive which is not now conceded? What power, heretofore of rare and uncommon exercise, which is not now of daily and familiar use in the same potent hand? Implied powers, heretofore exercised, have become the fruitful soil out of which other implied powers are springing; and thus powers are implied from the existence of powers which are implied from the constitution; and for every new implication or new exercise of power, hosannas are raised, and psalms sung, as if in honor of some mighty achievement. Sir, we are in a vortex, whose every whirl brings us nearer and nearer to that engulfing centre, in which the liberties of our country, unless some redeeming spirit stretch forth a hand to save, are destined, ere long, to sink and perish. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] reiterating the language of my honorable friend from Kentucky, says, and repeats, "We are in the midst of a revolution"—a revolution which he admits, nay, boasts, is the handy-work of one man; and he likens it to that revolution which, more than thirty years ago, placed the republican party in power. Sir, if I have read history aright, and observed well the signs of the times, the present bears no close analogy to that era. The creed of the present day, which goes to centre all power, and all honor, and all consideration, in one man—which makes that man every thing, and the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and the country, and the people, nothing—is not the republicanism of 1801, but more like that of Rome under the first of the Cæsars.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 21.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Department of State, transmitting an account of the presents received from foreign Powers by our ministers, consuls, and other agents of the Government, with a specification of each article, and the disposition made of them; which, on motion of Mr. WILKINS, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER, who was not in his seat when the above motion was adopted, suggested that the vote be reconsidered, by general consent, with a view of taking no notice of the report on the Journal, and of returning it to the Department of State, in order that a report might be made more in conformity with the resolution. It would be recollected by the Senate, that the resolution, which he had the honor of submitting, called on the President of the United States for the information contained in the report just read. Now, the proper course would have been, and it was the usual one, for the Secretary to make his report direct to the President, and then for the President to report to the Senate; but, instead of this, the Secretary of State had made his report to the Senate. There, was, therefore some discrepancy between the resolution and the report, and it would appear awkward on the Journal for the answer to come from the Secretary of State to a call made on the President. It was for these reasons he wished the vote, ordering the reference of the report, might be reconsidered by general consent, in order that it might be returned to the Department of State without appearing on the Journal.

Mr. KING said, the report was not an unusual one. Reports of that nature frequently came from the Departments; and every object sought by the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi had been gained by the receipt of the report.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the explanation of the gentleman from Mississippi was perfectly correct as to the usual course of answering calls of the Senate by resolution. He had, therefore, no objection to a reconsideration of the vote on the reference of the report, as the Senate might then decide what further disposition should be made of it; and he would suggest that the motion of the gentleman be received. He did not approve, however, of expunging the proceedings in relation to the report from the Journal, and would vote against it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had no object in asking for a reconsideration of the vote, but to prevent a report which came in an unusual manner, and from an officer of the Government who had not been called on by the Senate, from appearing on the Journal; and also for the purpose of obtaining a report more in accordance with the terms of the resolution. He, however, would not press the motion if any gentleman objected to it. He was willing, in such a case, to withdraw it.

Mr. FORSYTH said he objected; and

Mr. POINDEXTER withdrew the motion.

The resolution offered by Mr. KNIGHT, ordering the printing of an extra number of copies of the chart of Narragansett bay, coming up for consideration—

Mr. FORSYTH made one or two observations in opposition to this mode of expending the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. KNIGHT said it was his intention to modify the resolution now under consideration. Since the resolution was filed, he had received information that the chart is already engraved, therefore it was not necessary to have it again engraved, but only to procure the copies that shall be needed. It is proposed, also, said he, to alter the number of copies to one thousand. It will be recollected that a proposition is now pending before Congress to establish a naval station somewhere in the waters of Narragansett bay. To show to the Senate the advantageous situation of this place for a naval station is the object of this resolution. It is considered by us to be a place most desirable for that purpose, of any in the Eastern portion of the Atlantic coast. We are anxious of convincing the Senate of this proposition, and in no way can we show it so well as to have a correct chart of those waters; they have been accurately surveyed by persons appointed for that purpose. The principal expense has been incurred, and needs nothing to complete the work but printing. Perhaps a smaller number might answer the purpose of the Senate, but it will be recollected that of every paper ordered to be printed, about eight hundred copies are distributed. This resolution will add about one hundred and fifty to the usual number. We are anxious not only to convince the Senate that this is a proper place for a naval station, but others also. In a commercial point of view, this is of considerable importance, as this chart will show.

Mr. ROBBINS said that this chart was reported at the last session of the Senate, by the Secretary of the Navy, when he reported upon the expediency of establishing a naval station in the waters of Narragansett bay; but no motion was then made for extra copies of this chart; though such a motion was made in the House of Representatives, and there prevailed: this resolution is offered to supply this omission. This subject, at this session, has again been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and the business is in the train of preparation to be brought before this body. This chart will be auxiliary to the discussions which this business may elicit; and auxiliary, too, to general information on this subject. Here I beg leave to say one word on the public interest as connected with this subject. The report will present to us an object, the importance of which has not, as yet, as it appears to me, been duly appreciated by the councils of this country; indeed the importance of which has been strangely overlooked. For then I shall venture to say, and shall be warranted in saying it by the concurring opinions of the most enlightened engineers of the world, of this country, of Great Britain, of France, that of all the points for a naval station on the whole of our maritime frontier, the waters of Narragansett bay present by far the most important—the most important in war both to prevent and to repel invasion; the most important for all the expeditions of maritime warfare; that may enable us, and will enable us, to repel the war from our shores and carry it back to the shores of the enemy: and these opinions will be accompanied with details that will guaranty their correctness; and show, to the clearness of demonstration, that this station, prepared as it may be, and as it ought to be, will give to this country these powerful and invincible faculties for defence and offence; and that it will be as important to economy, as to the command of this effective and controlling force; and will reduce the expenses of future wars, should any arise, at least one-half, compared with what they otherwise must be. It is in relation to an object so important as this that these extra copies of this chart are desired. The plate is prepared, and the additional expense will be but a trifle—very little more than the cost of the paper.

The resolution was then agreed to—ayes 33—noes not counted.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate then proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations, in part, for the service of the year 1834, with the message from the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate for striking out the clause restricting the application of the contingent fund of each House on the subject of printing.

Mr. WEBSTER explained, that this bill had been already before the Committee on Finance, who had reported two amendments to the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. One of these amendments related to an error in the estimate of the expenses of the Secretary's office, which had been agreed to by the House, and there was nothing more to be said about it. The other amendment of the Senate was to strike out the clause in the bill which limited the application of the contingent fund in the printing department, to the printing of such documents only as related to the ordinary proceedings of Congress, and were executed by the public printer under his contract; and to this amendment the House of Representatives had disagreed. He should now close the few remarks he had to make with a motion that the Senate adhere to their amendment.

The contingent expenditures of the House of Representatives are stated in the bill at $150,000, including fuel, stationary, printing, &c. The contingent expenses of the Senate were estimated at $32,000. Whether these sums were too large, or too small, he did not pretend to say. He had no doubt that they were large enough, and he should be content with any order which the Senate might take concerning them. But he wished to call the attention of the Senate to the clause which had been stricken out by the Senate, and which he asked the Secretary now to read. [The clause having been read, Mr. WEBSTER resumed.] If the Senate agreed to retain this clause, so let it be. His disposition was, to adhere to the amendment by which it had been stricken out. A similar provision to this had been in the bill for some years, and such was its inconvenience, and the impracticability of carrying it into effect, that the officers of the two Houses had been compelled to disobey the restriction. It excepted works which were printed by order of the House of Representatives, but not those which were printed by order of the Senate. He objected to the principle involved in the clause, and desired to know why the Senate were not to be trusted with the regulation and application of their own contingent fund? If they were allowed to purchase what fuel they chose, they ought to be also allowed to order the printing of such works as they desired. The clause excepted such works as were executed by the public printer. He knew no such officer as the public printer. Each House made a contract with a printer, but there is no such officer as public printer. The House ordered books with as much liberality as did the Senate, but the House might pay for the books which they ordered, under this construction, while the Senate could do no such thing. A member near him [Mr. WILKINS] had recently moved for an additional number of a work which had been ordered by a previous Congress, for the supply of new members. But if this clause were to be retained, the Senate could not pay for these books. So the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. POINDRESTER] had, at the instance of two of the Committee of the Senate—the Committee on Public Lands, and the Committee on Private Land Claims—introduced a resolution, under which a compilation of the land laws was ordered. But the Senate, with this clause standing in the bill, could not pay for them. Even the little map of Narragansett bay, of which the printing had been asked, could not be paid for, and the gentleman from Georgia might have spared himself the labor of opposing the order.

He moved that the Senate do adhere to their amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH called for the reading of the clause which had been stricken out by the Senate. After the clause had been read, he stated that this subject had been before Congress formerly, and he thought that the House was in the right. Their object was to check the abuses which had been practised on the contingent fund. That fund was created for the payment of the necessary expenses of Congress, while the Houses were in session. Abuses had subsequently crept in, one of which was to bestow the patronage of Congress on a variety of works, political and otherwise. A man who had on hand a large stock of copies of a book which he could not throw into the market, could come here, and, through the agency of a friend in one of the Houses, ask for a subscription, the advantage of which was exclusively to himself. And thus Congress were made the purchasers of a great many bad books, which were thus thrust upon the public. Another abuse was the application of this fund to enable publishers to get up new works, which could not be published without the aid of Congress. He recollected at the first session in which he was in Congress, a large appropriation for the publication of Seybert's Statistics. This patronage encouraged Mr. Pitkin afterwards to get up his Statistics. Another subscription was made by the House of Representatives to Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, by which an annual appropriation of $2,500 was made to sustain that work. This course of expenditure continued for some years; until, finally, in consequence of doubts which had arisen as to the merits of the work on which this patronage was conferred, this clause was attached to the appropriation bill. He was of opinion that the clause was a very proper one, and he hoped the Senate would agree to retain it. He should vote against the motion to adhere.

Mr. KANE admitted that it might be all true that the Senate had acted unwisely in ordering works. But he did not view that as the question now before the Senate. The Senate has ordered a number of new books, and the question was, whether the works which had been so ordered, and which were in use by the Senate, were to be paid for, or not. He thought that the faith of the Senate was pledged for the payment of the works they had ordered, and he could not see any other mode by which this could be effected, than by striking out this restriction. There appeared to him to be no other mode than to hold on to the clause, by agreeing to the motion of the

[SENATE.]

Senator from Massachusetts. The Senate had made up their minds that certain books were useful, and had ordered these works. On the faith of this procedure, the contractors had gone on with the publication of the works, and the Senate were bound to fulfil their obligation to pay for them. He should therefore vote in favor of the motion to adhere.

Mr. KING said, that he had for some time seen a disposition to squander the contingent fund of Congress, and it was this disposition which had led to the introduction of this clause into the bill. He objected to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it risked the loss of the bill. It was not usual to make such a motion at so early a stage of the proceedings, and he regarded it as disrespectful to the House of Representatives. The earliest motion ought to have been to insist: then, in case of disagreement on the part of the House, it was the usual course to call a conference. If the Senate were now to agree to a motion to adhere, would not the bill be lost in the event of disagreement on the part of the House? [Mr. WEBSTER—"Certainly."] He would then oppose this motion, as he did not see any thing in the clause introduced by the House which ought to excite opposition.

Mr. WEBSTER rose merely to answer that point in the argument of the Senator from Alabama which attributed to him (Mr. W.) an intention to offer disrespect to the House. He had looked into this matter before he submitted his motion, and, on examining the precedents, had found that a similar motion had been made, in this stage, by many distinguished persons, and inter alia, by the gentleman from Alabama himself, on a question of great public interest. In reference to the relative rights of the two Houses over their own contingent fund, he considered this clause as not being in true taste. If the Senate believe they have the control of their own contingent fund, they should say so. The very nature of the contingent fund looked to other objects than such as were specified. Otherwise, there could be no contingency about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER asked for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adhere, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kane, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Morris, Rives, Shepley, Tallmadge, White, Wright—13.

So the motion to ADHERE was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR having announced the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the deposits,

Mr. EWING rose and resumed his remarks in opposition to the act of the Secretary, as given above, entire; when,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business. After which, The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22.

The resolution submitted by Mr. SHEPLEY, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in detail, respecting the trade between the United States and the British ports in the West Indies, and in the American Provinces of Great Britain, (the same information having been previously given at large, in reply to the resolution submitted by Mr. SPRAGUE,) was taken up for consideration.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, that he desired to submit to the Senate, the following statements, which were read:

From these statements, said Mr. S., if they are correct, and I hope there may not be found any error, or none of importance, the following results appear:

1. That our trade, both with the British West Indies and American Colonies, was prosperous up to the year 1827—and that it was so both as to the extent of the trade and tonnage employed in it.

2. That, in the year 1827, our trade with the British West Indies was lessened - $1,420,227
And the trade to her colonies increased only 242,125

Leaving us, in the whole, losers $1,178,102
And, while our tonnage decreased from 99,732 tons to 26,796, employed in the British West India trade, it fell off also in that with her provinces from 76,191 to 60,370 tons.

3. That the trade with the British West Indies continued to "wax worse and worse" during the years 1828, '29 and '30, until in 1830, from more than two millions in 1826, it was less than two thousand. This loss was compensated only by an increase of trade with the British Provinces, to an amount a little rising one million, and a like increase of tonnage in that trade, leaving us with a loss of nearly a million in the British West India trade, and the loss of difference in value in another million, between the West India and Provincial trade.

4. That, while we were suffering under such a loss of two millions, in our trade with the British West Indies, during those years, we were not compensated, as has often been supposed, by an increase in the whole West India trade, comprehending that with all nations having dominion there.

The whole trade with the West Indies lessened during those years, and almost to the same amount as the loss on the trade to the British West Indies. It will be perceived, therefore, that it was not easy to change for the worse.

5. That, since the arrangement of that trade, the commerce with the British West Indies has been increased from less than two thousand to more than eighteen hundred thousand.

And that this increase has not occasioned a loss of the trade to the other West Indies generally, because the whole West India trade increased, from 1830 to 1832, more than two and a half millions.

6. That the comparative increase of British tonnage can be accounted for easily. It is mostly to be found in the simple fact, that British vessels, from the provinces, enter in the Passamaquoddy district, in Maine. And the occasion of this increase of British tonnage in that district is this: While the British colonial vessels were accustomed to bring plaster, and other property, to the centre of the waters between Maine, and the Provinces, and American vessels, most of them being under a coasting license, to obtain that plaster, must change their papers, pay fees, and clear out for a foreign port, and pass only a few hundred yards, and receive that plaster and other property, from vessels lying in the waters, which could not enter our ports.

Now, the foreign vessels, instead of lying close to our shores, enter the port of Passamaquoddy, pay the fees formerly paid by our vessels, and our vessels, without change of papers and payment of fees, receive the property from the foreign vessels in the same place, in the waters where they formerly did.

Thus the increase of the British tonnage is seen, and a decrease of our own, arising greatly from the mere manner of conducting that trade, while the British gain no carrying trade by it—gain nothing but payment of the fees—and we lose nothing, unless it be a loss to be excused from paying fees and changing papers.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to inquire whether the information sought for had not been given in answer to the resolution offered by the colleague of the gentleman [Mr. SPRAGUE.]

Mr. SHEPLEY explained, that the information had been given in reply to the resolution of his colleague; but it had been given, he said, as a whole. He now asked for the same information in detail, for the purpose of showing that the trade of the United States with the British insular and provincial ports, had been increased, instead of diminished by the arrangement of 1830.

Mr. KNIGHT said he did not rise to make any objection to the resolution under consideration, but, on the contrary, was in favor of information on all subjects; but merely to make a suggestion in regard to the West India trade. It is stated (said he, by the Senator from Maine, that during the year '28 or '29, not recollected) that the trade to the British West Indies amounted to only a few thousand dollars. That it had now increased to a large amount. Sir, at the time referred to, the trade was wholly suspended, or, rather, prohibited. We should not have had any direct trade, according to my understanding of it, notwithstanding this trade did exist in another form. We furnished the British, indirectly, with our productions, carried in our own vessels, through the Swedish, Danish, and other West India islands. One great object was the navigating interest, or who should have the carrying trade? Who should have the freight? We then possessed it indirectly. Much has since taken an indirect course through the Northern colonies to the advantage of the British navigation. It will gradually slip out of our hands into theirs. They are now pursuing the same course, and deriving the same advantages, that we did under the prohibitory system. The discriminating duties in favor of the Northern colonies cause our productions to be carried to the Northern colonies, thence transhipped to the West Indies, and elsewhere, in British vessels, increasing their business and tonnage.

Sir, I well recollect after the arrangement was made with the British Government, our Minister there remonstrated against the discriminating duties of the British Government; and when he informed this Government of his objections or protest, you, sir, wrote him, that the President approved of his proceedings, and requested him not to commit the Government as to the course necessary in regard to it. The impression on my mind is, it has increased the British tonnage. I have not looked into it latterly, and do not remember details.

The resolution was then adopted without a division.

The resolution offered by Mr. SWIFT, in regard to the navigation of Lake Champlain, was taken up.

Mr. SWIFT said, much of the commerce of Lake Champlain went through the channel which it was proposed to improve. There were rocks for a distance of twenty-five or thirty miles; and at low water, vessels were much obstructed, unless they made a circuit of about an equal distance. The bill for this improvement had formerly passed the other House, but had failed in the Senate for want of time. He hoped the resolution would be adopted; and it was, accordingly.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAY, in relation to the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States; when,

Mr. EWING rose, and concluded his remarks, as given heretofore.

Mr. PRESTON then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; but withdrew the motion for the present, and,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; after which, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 23.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, asking a conference on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, relative to the amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834, and stating that the House had appointed managers on their part.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it appeared, by the message, that the House simply asked a conference without having insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate. He thought if the case were at all within Parliamentary usage, a conference would not be declined by the Senate. But as the House had not insisted on its disagreement, the most proper course would be to refer the message to a committee, who could refer to the precedents in such cases, and report to the Senate to-morrow. The last case of the kind which came before the Senate, was one in which the House had disagreed to an amendment of the Senate, and a conference had been refused by the latter. In accordance with the courtesy which had hitherto, and ought to regulate the intercourse between the two Houses of Congress, Mr. W. thought the best course would be to refer the message to the Committee on Finance, and made a motion to that effect, which was carried.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, made the following report on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Appropriation Bill; which was ordered to be printed:

"The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution, 'That the House of Representatives do ask a conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the second amendment to the bill (No. 36) entitled 'an act making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834,' have had the same under consideration, and now report—

"The House requests a conference after the Senate had adhered to its amendment, to which the House had previously disagreed. It cannot be denied that the Senate has a right to refuse such conference—a case exactly similar having been so disposed of by the Senate in 1826, as will be seen by the extracts from its Journals which are appended to this report; but the committee think it equally clear that such is not the usual and ordinary mode of proceeding in cases of this kind. It is usually esteemed more respectful, and more conducive to that good understanding and harmony of intercourse between the two Houses, which the public interest so strongly requires, to accede to requests for conferences even after an adhering vote. Such conferences have long been regarded as the established and approved mode of seeking to bring about a final concurrence of judgment, in cases where the Houses have differed; and the committee think it unwise either to depart from the practice altogether, or to abridge it, or decline to conform to it, in cases such as those in which it has usually prevailed. It should only be, therefore, as the committee think, in instances of a very peculiar character, that a free conference, invited by the House, should be declined by the Senate.

"The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate agree to the conference proposed by the House of Representatives, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendment, and that four managers be chosen to manage the said conference on the part of the Senate."

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAY, in relation to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate in opposition to the removal of the deposits, until 3 o'clock, when, without coming to a conclusion, he gave way to a motion to adjourn.

[In the course of the remarks of Mr. PRESTON, the spectators in the galleries began to applaud, when the Vice President ordered the galleries to be cleared. While the officers were carrying the order into execution, a motion was made by Mr. POINDEXTER to suspend the order; and, after a few words from Mr. WEBSTER, indicating that the Senate would support the Chair in the course he might pursue, the Vice President rescinded the order.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the proceedings of a public meeting held in the town of New Bedford, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WEBSTER said that New Bedford had been one of the most prosperous and fast-growing towns in Massachusetts. Its citizens were engaged in a most useful, hardy, and adventurous commerce, in which they had met with much success; and, three months ago, their condition was flourishing and happy; but a sudden and most extensive reverse has happened to it. Thirty or forty failures are said to have happened, and great pressure and distress prevail. I feel it my duty, said Mr. W., to present these things to the consideration of the Senate. If there can be either any faith in men's statements, or if facts be any proof, the pressure, so far from diminishing, is increasing. I am informed by undoubted authority, that in one of our cities, supposed to possess its full proportion of capital, money, for the best security, is not to be had for less than from twelve to eighteen per cent. per annum, nor in large sums even for that interest; and this very week, in another city, one of the largest and most flourishing in the Union, undoubted security could be had for money at three per cent. per month. While we are talking about the danger of the moneyed aristocracy of the bank, a state of things is suffered to exist which is a perfect carnival to the real money aristocracy, if there be any such thing in the country. Capitalists holding up their money for such enormous rates of interest, and being able to command such rates, shows what sacrifices are made by industrious men, of small capital, to protect themselves from absolute ruin. In many places numerous workmen have been thrown out of employ, not only in the manufacturing establishments, but in the mines of some of the middle States. Indeed, if the information of this morning is correct, one of these States had suffered a great disappointment, in failing to receive the instalments on its loans according to contract, and was obliged to take other measures for supplying the means of carrying on its public works. I take this occasion, Mr. President, to call again on gentlemen, who may be supposed to know something of the purpose of the Administration, to know what their plan is? Have they any means [in readiness? Do they propose any relief? Or do they mean to leave it to the Secretary, and to the State Banks, to meet the crisis as they may? I implore the sober consideration of gentlemen to this matter; and I shall feel it my duty to repeat the inquiry for such reasonable time, as that, in the absence of any answer, it may be fairly inferred that the Administration has no measures to propose.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate, in conclusion of the remarks which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. FORSYTH then rose, and observed that there was not time to proceed to the discussion of the other resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, but he begged to call the attention of the Senate to one remark which had just fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina in relation to his (Mr. F.'s) course on the compromise bill of last session. The gentleman adverted to his opposition to it as an evidence of the hostility of the President of the United States to a peaceful settlement of that question. He called it to the recollection of the Senate, that his opposition to that bill was founded on a single point. In his opinion, the constitutional rights of the Senate were violated by its introduction here, as it belonged exclusively to the other House. But when it had been acted on by the House and came back here, he overlooked the objection, and gave his assent to its passage, but with the hope of making it better. He hoped the gentleman from South Carolina, and all who knew him during his political life, as well in the Senate as in the other House, would do him the justice to know that none of his acts emanated from any branch of this Government, or that his support of any measure was given to it because it was an administration measure. He had always done justice to every administration, approving or condemning according to the dictates of his own judgment. And he felt that he ought to do the President the justice to say, that it was his ardent wish to do justice to the South as regarded the tariff. Further, he would also say that he believed that the unfortunate situation of our sister State might have been more favorably settled for her than under the auspices of the gentleman from Kentucky, by whose assistance it was settled.

Mr. PRESTON replied, that when the compromise bill was pending, it was not thought as good as the South could have wished or expected. But until it was expected to pass, he never heard that the administration intended to give them a better bill than the tariff of '32. Then he did. But he never heard any proposition of a modified tariff till the compromise bill was introduced.

Mr. FORSYTH said he made the remarks just offered in justification of the President. As to his (Mr. P.'s) course upon the compromise bill, he observed that the final question on the bill was suspended till the action of the House was had, and then it was admitted that the ground he had taken was correct. In reference to the President he would only say, that his opening message to Congress, at the period alluded to, was hailed by the whole South, as the harbinger of peace and justice to that section. And the gentleman from Kentucky appealed to that circumstance to show that the President had determined the bill should go down, and that his popularity was sufficient to carry it through.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein—

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition from a number of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying that the deposits of the public moneys may be restored to the Bank of the United States.

On presenting this memorial, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said: he had before him, to offer for the consideration of the Senate, a memorial of the citizens of Newark, New Jersey, on the subject of the present agitation of the country. This document is signed by thirteen hundred and forty-one of the citizens of that town, and combines the great mass, at least four-fifths, of its business population. They deplore the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and the consequent breach upon the credit and derangement of the currency of the country.

This memorial knows no distinction of party: I find among its numbers, many of the hardy sons of honest labor, who feel this blow most deeply, in the reduced demand and wages of their industry. For, however visionary speculatists may reason, a plain man knows that the value of his industry is depreciated by every act that alarms the credit and confidence in the money market. There is not a political economist on earth, in the use of his intellectual perceptions, but must admit that such a sudden and violent measure, as the order of the Secretary, and proceeding from the hand of the Government, must inflict injury—it is inevitable. Why, sir, consider, for a moment, the time: when a prosperity prevailed in all the branches of commerce and trade, without a parallel in this or any other country—when all the channels of confidence were full—when enterprise and trade were strained to their highest pressure—then, to strike a sudden blow at the great moneyed representative of capital, could not but produce a crash. The confidence of the country is smitten. Men do not know where they stand, or what may be the coming crisis.

It is most marvellous, Mr. President, that it should never have occurred to the Executive, that his remedy does not and cannot reach the evil. Let it be granted that the bank is a dangerous agent, and that the president and directors deserve all the suspicions and denunciations that have so liberally assailed them—that they are now engaged in meditating all manner of terrible designs—"gorgons, hydras, and chimeras, dire"—why, sir, do you not see that the removal of the deposits does not touch the transgressors? There sits the president of the bank, with his board of directors, around the exchequer table, as calm, I doubt not, as a summer's morning—his salary goes on—his official functions are uninterrupted—and the bank itself, the only object which the general panic has left, without a concussion or even excitement.

The executive dreads and condemns the bank; and punishes by distracting the country and distressing his friends. Yes, sir, I have said that this memorial had no party characteristics about it. I wish sincerely that I could so persuade the administration and its friends. It ranges above party—far above it. It assails the business and the firesides of those, many of whose names are here, who have stood by the President in good and evil report. What motive can they have, or what inducement is there for any man, to decry his administration or embarrass, without good and strong cause, his policy? Sir, they would far rather persuade him to add another laurel to his well-earned wreath—not by military victories, but by a nobler triumph—the self conquest that would prevail with him to retrace a step that is so calamitous to the country.

Mr. President, I know that I shall have the sympathies of the Senate, when I recall to them the instructions lately transmitted by the legislature of the State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. This is a great national question, of common concern to us all: for these instructions are multiplying, and call certainly from me, sir, for distinct and respectful notice. The import of these instructions, I admit, sir, cannot be mistaken. The terms are unequivocal, and plain to any apprehensions. They instruct us to sustain, by our votes and influence, the course of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the removal of the deposits. What are the nature and claims of legislative instructions? That a legislature has the inherent right, legislatively and detached from their constituents, to direct the political conduct of a Senator in Congress, I can never subscribe to. Sir, where has such a right been delegated by the people? A legislature of the State instruct or direct the Senate of the United States! Why, Mr. President, we had better change place at once. But where the resolutions of the legislature can be satisfactorily regarded as the clear indication of public sentiment, deliberate and abiding, I am bound to hold them, as I do hold them, in most respectful consideration. And on such an occasion, where that opinion interfered with my own judgment and conscience, I should promptly surrender a trust that could no longer be held in harmony with my constituents. But here, sir, my embarrassment commences. I am not satisfied that these resolutions are the sure index of decided public sentiment. Sir, you know, that, for the last five years, our political atmosphere has been very much given to change. The wheel is turning now, and unless I misread the language of events that are passing, impulses are given to its motions, that will bring them to a whirl. Now, sir, will it be right to surrender private convictions of duty to an influence from this giddy seat of power? I think not. I am quite conscious of the delicacy of my position, but I trust that I shall meet it without fear. I will further say, sir, that even where the opinions of a State may be well known, occasions may arise to a representative of the people, rare I grant—when the emergency is of that deeply eventful nature—when he must go alone, so to speak, in the purity of his own purposes, and cast himself, with all his fame and all the confidence of his country, into the crisis, and sink or rise, as success shall crown his intrepid conduct. I do not pretend that this question offers any parallel, or even analogy—nor would I presume to be equal to its claims. Sir, we have recently been witnesses, on this floor, to a most illustrious example of such a noble daring, of which I may not say more, but hand it over to fill one of the brightest pages in the future history of these eventful times.

But, Mr. President, the difficulties of my situation are not diminished by the arrival of this memorial. Here, sir, I hold in one hand the voice of the State representatives, and in the other, in louder, deeper tones, the voice of the people—and they are antagonist to each other—they begin to diverge from the very starting point—what shall we do? Sir, I believe I may speak for my friend and colleague, when I answer, we will go for the people. There, after all, springs our power and our responsibilities. We will meet them there. I have no other course: I must follow the lead of my own conscience, with the consolation that my conduct will be subjected to the sober judgment and impartial scrutiny of a generous people. Sir, I cannot afford to lose the confidence of my fellow citizens. It is a plant of slow growth, and when smitten, seldom thrives again. I have not the desperate resoluteness to forfeit what I hold so valuable. Vote to justify the rash and ill-considered order of the Secretary! Sir, I should fear to meet the disappointed countenance of a grieved and injured community—and, worse than all, I should lose that which no earthly distinction, no voice of human praise, can repair or supply—the respect of my own mind. I will cherish that, and should I fail, it will be with consolations of which power cannot deprive me.

At some proper time, Mr. President, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate, to state briefly the reasons of my dissent from the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury. At present, I will not interrupt the regular debate, but only ask, sir, that the memorial may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee of Managers appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with the Managers of the House of Representatives on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment to the appropriation bill, made a report; which, without reading, was ordered to be printed. The report is as follows:

“The managers appointed by the Senate to meet the Managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in conference, on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled ‘An act making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834,’ report—

“That they have met the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and have held a free conference with them upon the difference existing between the two Houses, and have the pleasure to inform the Senate that the managers of the two Houses have come to an agreement upon the matter in difference. They have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses the following amendment to the bill, viz:

“Strike out all the bill from the 16th line of the printed bill, inclusive, and insert—

“And be it further enacted, That, hereafter, neither the Senate nor House of Representatives shall subscribe for or purchase any book, unless an appropriation shall be made specially for that purpose, and the sum of five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, annually, for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, in addition to the sum of five thousand dollars heretofore usually appropriated for that purpose.

“And be it further enacted, That all books already purchased, or ordered by either House, shall be paid for out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.”

The CHAIR announced the special order to be the motion of Mr. CALHOUN for the repeal of the Force Bill. Mr. CALHOUN not feeling disposed to interrupt the debate now in progress on the removal of the deposits, declined calling it up, but intimated that he should do so this day two weeks.

The resolutions offered on Friday were adopted, with the exception of that of Mr. POINDEXTER calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the public lands, Mr. FORSYTH having made a statement of the causes which prevented the Commissioner of the Land office from complying with the call of the 19th of December.

Mr. POINDEXTER was under the impression that the commissioner had misunderstood the character of the information sought for; and from the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] had gone into unnecessary labor. The resolution merely called for abstracts. He hoped in a few days the Senate would get the information, and he therefore should not press the subject, and moved that it be laid upon the table; which was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the removal of the deposits: when

Mr. FORSYTH took the floor and addressed the Senate as follows:

I hold it fortunate, Mr. President, (said Mr. F.,) that it was not necessary for me to enter upon the cold and temperate examination that I propose to make of this subject, at the close of the very impassioned address of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PIERCE.] I can now scarcely hope to secure so much of the attention of the Senate as shall be necessary for my purpose—then it would have been impracticable. Long a member of Congress, I have witnessed, frequently, scenes like the present, when difficulties and dangers were said to hover over us; have often heard animated appeals to popular feeling; fervid denunciations of abuse of power; awful anticipations of forth-coming evil. The country has thrived, nevertheless—the lapse of a few months, or weeks, or days, has dissipated the apprehensions of the timid, and falsified the prophecies of the bold. The crises have, in succession, passed away, and the frightful pictures that have been exhibited here have proved to be but “fancy sketches.” To those who have not been long members of the legislative body, I will recall an incident brought to mind by an allusion, in this discussion, that may serve to sustain them under the gloomy forebodings of the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina. The establishment of the independence of the United States was followed by trials of the virtue and fortitude of the people, equal, if not greater than those of war. Out of those trials arose the Federal Convention; the result of their labors was the constitution of our Government, which was presented to the people of the States for their ratification or rejection. To every ued to "wax worse and worse" during the years 1828, '29 and '30, until in 1830, from more than two millions in 1826, it was less than two thousand. This loss was compensated only by an increase of trade with the British Provinces, to an amount a little rising one million, and a like increase of tonnage in that trade, leaving us with a loss of nearly a million in the British West India trade, and the loss of difference in value in another million, between the West India and Provincial trade.

4. That, while we were suffering under such a loss of two millions, in our trade with the British West Indies, during those years, we were not compensated, as has often been supposed, by an increase in the whole West India trade, comprehending that with all nations having dominion there.

The whole trade with the West Indies lessened during those years, and almost to the same amount as the loss on the trade to the British West Indies. It will be perceived, therefore, that it was not easy to change for the worse.

5. That, since the arrangement of that trade, the commerce with the British West Indies has been increased from less than two thousand to more than eighteen hundred thousand.

And that this increase has not occasioned a loss of the trade to the other West Indies generally, because the whole West India trade increased, from 1830 to 1832, more than two and a half millions.

6. That the comparative increase of British tonnage can be accounted for easily. It is mostly to be found in the simple fact, that British vessels, from the provinces, enter in the Passamaquoddy district, in Maine. And the occasion of this increase of British tonnage in that district is this: While the British colonial vessels were accustomed to bring plaster, and other property, to the centre of the waters between Maine, and the Provinces, and American vessels, most of them being under a coasting license, to obtain that plaster, must change their papers, pay fees, and clear out for a foreign port, and pass only a few hundred yards, and receive that plaster and other property, from vessels lying in the waters, which could not enter our ports.

Now, the foreign vessels, instead of lying close to our shores, enter the port of Passamaquoddy, pay the fees formerly paid by our vessels, and our vessels, without change of papers and payment of fees, receive the property from the foreign vessels in the same place, in the waters where they formerly did.

Thus the increase of the British tonnage is seen, and a decrease of our own, arising greatly from the mere manner of conducting that trade, while the British gain no carrying trade by it—gain nothing but payment of the fees—and we lose nothing, unless it be a loss to be excused from paying fees and changing papers.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to inquire whether the information sought for had not been given in answer to the resolution offered by the colleague of the gentleman [Mr. SPRAGUE.]

Mr. SHEPLEY explained, that the information had been given in reply to the resolution of his colleague; but it had been given, he said, as a whole. He now asked for the same information in detail, for the purpose of showing that the trade of the United States with the British insular and provincial ports, had been increased, instead of diminished by the arrangement of 1830.

Mr. KNIGHT said he did not rise to make any objection to the resolution under consideration, but, on the contrary, was in favor of information on all subjects; but merely to make a suggestion in regard to the West India trade. It is stated (said he, by the Senator from Maine, that during the year '28 or '29, not recollected) that the trade to the British West Indies amounted to only a few thousand dollars. That it had now increased to a large amount. Sir, at the time referred to, the trade was wholly suspended, or, rather, prohibited. We should not have had any direct trade, according to my understanding of it, notwithstanding this trade did exist in another form. We furnished the British, indirectly, with our productions, carried in our own vessels, through the Swedish, Danish, and other West India islands. One great object was the navigating interest, or who should have the carrying trade? Who should have the freight? We then possessed it indirectly. Much has since taken an indirect course through the Northern colonies to the advantage of the British navigation. It will gradually slip out of our hands into theirs. They are now pursuing the same course, and deriving the same advantages, that we did under the prohibitory system. The discriminating duties in favor of the Northern colonies cause our productions to be carried to the Northern colonies, thence transhipped to the West Indies, and elsewhere, in British vessels, increasing their business and tonnage.

Sir, I well recollect after the arrangement was made with the British Government, our Minister there remonstrated against the discriminating duties of the British Government; and when he informed this Government of his objections or protest, you, sir, wrote him, that the President approved of his proceedings, and requested him not to commit the Government as to the course necessary in regard to it. The impression on my mind is, it has increased the British tonnage. I have not looked into it latterly, and do not remember details.

The resolution was then adopted without a division.

The resolution offered by Mr. SWIFT, in regard to the navigation of Lake Champlain, was taken up.

Mr. SWIFT said, much of the commerce of Lake Champlain went through the channel which it was proposed to improve. There were rocks for a distance of twenty-five or thirty miles; and at low water, vessels were much obstructed, unless they made a circuit of about an equal distance. The bill for this improvement had formerly passed the other House, but had failed in the Senate for want of time. He hoped the resolution would be adopted; and it was, accordingly.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAY, in relation to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; when,

Mr. EWING rose, and concluded his remarks, as given heretofore.

Mr. PRESTON then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; but withdrew the motion for the present, and,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; after which, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 23.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, asking a conference on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, relative to the amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834, and stating that the House had appointed managers on their part.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it appeared, by the message, that the House simply asked a conference without having insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate. He thought if the case were at all within Parliamentary usage, a conference would not be declined by the Senate. But as the House had not insisted on its disagreement, the most proper course would be to refer the message to a committee, who could refer to the precedents in such cases, and report to the Senate to-morrow. The last case of the kind which came before the Senate, was one in which the House had disagreed to an amendment of the Senate, and a conference had been refused by the latter. In accordance with the courtesy which had hitherto, and ought to regulate the intercourse between the two Houses of Congress, Mr. W. thought the best course would be to refer the message to the Committee on Finance, and made a motion to that effect, which was carried.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, made the following report on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Appropriation Bill; which was ordered to be printed:

"The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the resolution, 'That the House of Representatives do ask a conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the second amendment to the bill (No. 36) entitled 'an act making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834,' have had the same under consideration, and now report—

"The House requests a conference after the Senate had adhered to its amendment, to which the House had previously disagreed. It cannot be denied that the Senate has a right to refuse such conference—a case exactly similar having been so disposed of by the Senate in 1826, as will be seen by the extracts from its Journals which are appended to this report; but the committee think it equally clear that such is not the usual and ordinary mode of proceeding in cases of this kind. It is usually esteemed more respectful, and more conducive to that good understanding and harmony of intercourse between the two Houses, which the public interest so strongly requires, to accede to requests for conferences even after an adhering vote. Such conferences have long been regarded as the established and approved mode of seeking to bring about a final concurrence of judgment, in cases where the Houses have differed; and the committee think it unwise either to depart from the practice altogether, or to abridge it, or decline to conform to it, in cases such as those in which it has usually prevailed. It should only be, therefore, as the committee think, in instances of a very peculiar character, that a free conference, invited by the House, should be declined by the Senate.

"The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate agree to the conference proposed by the House of Representatives, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendment, and that four managers be chosen to manage the said conference on the part of the Senate."

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAY, in relation to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate in opposition to the removal of the deposits, until 3 o'clock, when, without coming to a conclusion, he gave way to a motion to adjourn.

[In the course of the remarks of Mr. PRESTON, the spectators in the galleries began to applaud, when the Vice President ordered the galleries to be cleared. While the officers were carrying the order into execution, a motion was made by Mr. POINDEXTER to suspend the order; and, after a few words from Mr. WEBSTER, indicating that the Senate would support the Chair in the course he might pursue, the Vice President rescinded the order.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the proceedings of a public meeting held in the town of New Bedford, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WEBSTER said that New Bedford had been one of the most prosperous and fast-growing towns in Massachusetts. Its citizens were engaged in almost useful, hardy, and adventurous commerce, in which they had met with much success; and, three months ago, their condition was flourishing and happy; but a sudden and most extensive reverse has happened to it. Thirty or forty failures are said to have happened, and great pressure and distress prevail. I feel it my duty, said Mr. W., to present these things to the consideration of the Senate. If there can be either any faith in men's statements, or if facts be any proof, the pressure, so far from diminishing, is increasing. I am informed by undoubted authority, that in one of our cities, supposed to possess its full proportion of capital, money, for the best security, is not to be had for less than from twelve to eighteen per cent. per annum, nor in large sums even for that interest; and this very week, in another city, one of the largest and most flourishing in the Union, undoubted security could be had for money at three per cent. per month. While we are talking about the danger of the moneyed aristocracy of the bank, a state of things is suffered to exist which is a perfect carnival to the real money aristocracy, if there be any such thing in the country. Capitalists holding up their money for such enormous rates of interest, and being able to command such rates, shows what sacrifices are made by industrious men, of small capital, to protect themselves from absolute ruin. In many places numerous workmen have been thrown out of employ, not only in the manufacturing establishments, but in the mines of some of the middle States. Indeed, if the information of this morning is correct, one of these States had suffered a great disappointment, in failing to receive the instalments on its loans according to contract, and was obliged to take other measures for supplying the means of carrying on its public works. I take this occasion, Mr. President, to call again on gentlemen, who may be supposed to know something of the purpose of the Administration, to know what their plan is? Have they any means in readiness? Do they propose any relief? Or do they mean to leave it to the Secretary, and to the State Banks, to meet the crisis as they may? I implore the sober consideration of gentlemen to this matter; and I shall feel it my duty to repeat the inquiry for such reasonable time, as that, in the absence of any answer, it may be fairly inferred that the Administration has no measures to propose.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate, in conclusion of the remarks which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. FORSYTH then rose, and observed that there was not time to proceed to the discussion of the other resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, but he begged to call the attention of the Senate to one remark which had just fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina in relation to his (Mr. F.'s) course on the compromise bill of last session. The gentleman adverted to his opposition to it as an evidence of the hostility of the President of the United States to a peaceful settlement of that question. He called it to the recollection of the Senate, that his opposition to that bill was founded on a single point. In his opinion, the constitutional rights of the Senate were violated by its introduction here, as it belonged exclusively to the other House. But when it had been acted on by the House and came back here, he overlooked the objection, and gave his assent to its passage, but with the hope of making it better. He hoped the gentleman from South Carolina, and all who knew him during his political life, as well in the Senate as in the other House, would do him the justice to know that none of his acts emanated from any branch of this Government, or that his support of any measure was given to it because it was an administration measure. He had always done justice to every administration, approving or condemning according to the dictates of his own judgment. And he felt that he ought to do the President the justice to say, that it was his ardent wish to do justice to the South as regarded the tariff. Further, he would also say that he believed that the unfortunate situation of our sister State might have been more favorably settled for her than under the auspices of the gentleman from Kentucky, by whose assistance it was settled.

Mr. PRESTON replied, that when the compromise bill was pending, it was not thought as good as the South could have wished or expected. But until it was expected to pass, he never heard that the administration intended to give them a better bill than the tariff of '32. Then he did. But he never heard any proposition of a modified tariff till the compromise bill was introduced.

Mr. FORSYTH said he made the remarks just offered in justification of the President. As to his (Mr. F.'s) course upon the compromise bill, he observed that the final question on the bill was suspended till the action of the House was had, and then it was admitted that the ground he had taken was correct. In reference to the President he would only say, that his opening message to Congress, at the period alluded to, was hailed by the whole South, as the harbinger of peace and justice to that section. And the gentleman from Kentucky appealed to that circumstance to show that the President had determined the bill should go down, and that his popularity was sufficient to carry it through.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein—

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 27.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition from a number of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying that the deposits of the public moneys may be restored to the Bank of the United States.

On presenting this memorial, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said: he had before him, to offer for the consideration of the Senate, a memorial of the citizens of Newark, New Jersey, on the subject of the present agitation of the country. This document is signed by thirteen hundred and forty-one of the citizens of that town, and combines the great mass, at least four-fifths, of its business population. They deplore the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and the consequent breach upon the credit and derangement of the currency of the country.

This memorial knows no distinction of party: I find among its numbers, many of the hardy sons of honest labor, who feel this blow most deeply, in the reduced demand and wages of their industry. For, however visionary speculators may reason, a plain man knows that the value of his industry is depreciated by every act that alarms the credit and confidence in the money market. There is not a political economist on earth, in the use of his intellectual perceptions, but must admit that such a sudden and violent measure, as the order of the Secretary, and proceeding from the hand of the Government, must inflict injury—it is inevitable. Why, sir, consider, for a moment, the time: when a prosperity prevailed in all the branches of commerce and trade, without a parallel in this or any other country—when all the channels of confidence were full—when enterprise and trade were strained to their highest pressure—then, to strike a sudden blow at the great moneyed representative of capital, could not but produce a crash. The confidence of the country is smitten. Men do not know where they stand, or what may be the coming crisis.

It is most marvellous, Mr. President, that it should never have occurred to the Executive, that his remedy does not and cannot reach the evil. Let it be granted that the bank is a dangerous agent, and that the president and directors deserve all the suspicions and denunciations that have so liberally assailed them—that they are now engaged in meditating all manner of terrible designs—"gorgons, hydras, and chimeras, dire"—why, sir, do you not see that the removal of the deposits does not touch the transgressors? There sits the president of the bank, with his board of directors, around the exchequer table, as calm, I doubt not, as a summer's morning—his salary goes on—his official functions are uninterrupted—and the bank itself, the only object which the general panic has left, without a concussion or even excitement.

The executive dreads and condemns the bank; and punishes by distracting the country and distressing his friends. Yes, sir, I have said that this memorial had no party characteristics about it. I wish sincerely that I could so persuade the administration and its friends. It ranges above party—far above it. It assails the business and the firesides of those, many of whose names are here, who have stood by the President in good and evil report. What motive can they have, or what inducement is there for any man, to decry his administration or embarrass, without good and strong cause, his policy? Sir, they would far rather persuade him to add another laurel to his well-earned wreath—not by military victories, but by a nobler triumph—the self conquest that would prevail with him to retrace a step that is so calamitous to the country.

Mr. President, I know that I shall have the sympathies of the Senate, when I recall to them the instructions lately transmitted by the legislature of the State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. This is a great national question, of common concern to us all: for these instructions are multiplying, and call certainly from me, sir, for distinct and respectful notice. The import of these instructions, I admit, sir, cannot be mistaken. The terms are unequivocal, and plain to any apprehensions. They instruct us to sustain, by our votes and influence, the course of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the removal of the deposits. What are the nature and claims of legislative instructions? That a legislature has the inherent right, legislatively and detached from their constituents, to direct the political conduct of a Senator in Congress, I can never subscribe to. Sir, where has such a right been delegated by the people? A legislature of the State instruct or direct the Senate of the United States! Why, Mr. President, we had better change place at once. But where the resolutions of the legislature can be satisfactorily regarded as the clear indication of public sentiment, deliberate and abiding, I am bound to hold them, as I do hold them, in most respectful consideration. And on such an occasion, where that opinion interfered with my own judgment and conscience, I should promptly surrender a trust that could no longer be held in harmony with my constituents. But here, sir, my embarrassment commences. I am not satisfied that these resolutions are the sure index of decided public sentiment. Sir, you know, that, for the last five years, our political atmosphere has been very much given to change. The wheel is turning now, and unless I misread the language of events that are passing, impulses are given to its motions, that will bring them to a whirl. Now, sir, will it be right to surrender private convictions of duty to an influence from this giddy seat of power? I think not. I am quite conscious of the delicacy of my position, but I trust that I shall meet it without fear. I will further say, sir, that even where the opinions of a State may be well known, occasions may arise to a representative of the people, rare I grant—when the emergency is of that deeply eventful nature—when he must go alone, so to speak, in the purity of his own purposes, and cast himself, with all his fame and all the confidence of his country, into the crisis, and sink or rise, as success shall crown his intrepid conduct. I do not pretend that this question offers any parallel, or even analogy—nor would I presume to be equal to its claims. Sir, we have recently been witnesses, on this floor, to a most illustrious example of such a noble daring, of which I may not say more, but hand it over to fill one of the brightest pages in the future history of these eventful times.

But, Mr. President, the difficulties of my situation are not diminished by the arrival of this memorial. Here, sir, I hold in one hand the voice of the State representatives, and in the other, in louder, deeper tones, the voice of the people—and they are antagonist to each other—they begin to diverge from the very starting point—what shall we do? Sir, I believe I may speak for my friend and colleague, when I answer, we will go for the people. There, after all, springs our power and our responsibilities. We will meet them there. I have no other course: I must follow the lead of my own conscience, with the consolation that my conduct will be subjected to the sober judgment and impartial scrutiny of a generous people. Sir, I cannot afford to lose the confidence of my fellow citizens. It is a plant of slow growth, and when smitten, seldom thrives again. I have not the desperate resoluteness to forfeit what I hold so valuable. Vote to justify the rash and ill-considered order of the Secretary? Sir, I should fear to meet the disappointed countenance of a grieved and injured community—and, worse than all, I should lose that which no earthly distinction, no voice of human praise, can repair or supply—the respect of my own mind. I will cherish that, and should I fail, it will be with consolations of which power cannot deprive me.

At some proper time, Mr. President, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate, to state briefly the reasons of my dissent from the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury. At present, I will not interrupt the regular debate, but only ask, sir, that the memorial may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee of Managers appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with the Managers of the House of Representatives on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment to the appropriation bill, made a report; which, without reading, was ordered to be printed. The report is as follows:

“The managers appointed by the Senate to meet the Managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in conference, on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the second amendment of the Senate to the bill entitled ‘An act making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1834,’ report—

“That they have met the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and have held a free conference with them upon the difference existing between the two Houses, and have the pleasure to inform the Senate that the managers of the two Houses have come to an agreement upon the matter in difference. They have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses the following amendment to the bill, viz:

“Strike out all the bill from the 16th line of the printed bill, inclusive, and insert—

“And be it further enacted, That, hereafter, neither the Senate nor House of Representatives shall subscribe for or purchase any book, unless an appropriation shall be made specially for that purpose, and the sum of five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, annually, for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, in addition to the sum of five thousand dollars heretofore usually appropriated for that purpose.

“And be it further enacted, That all books already purchased, or ordered by either House, shall be paid for out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.”

The CHAIR announced the special order to be the motion of Mr. CALHOUN for the repeal of the Force Bill. Mr. CALHOUN not feeling disposed to interrupt the debate now in progress on the removal of the depositories, declined calling it up, but intimated that he should do so this day two weeks.

The resolutions offered on Friday were adopted, with the exception of that of Mr. POINDEXTER calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the public lands, Mr. FORSYTH having made a statement of the causes which prevented the Commissioner of the Land office from complying with the call of the 19th of December.

Mr. POINDEXTER was under the impression that the commissioner had misunderstood the character of the information sought for; and from the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FOSBERT,] had gone into unnecessary labor. The resolution merely called for abstracts. He hoped in a few days the Senate would get the information, and he therefore should not press the subject, and moved that it be laid upon the table; which was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the removal of the depositories: when

Mr. FORSYTH took the floor and addressed the Senate as follows:

I hold it fortunate, Mr. President, (said Mr. F.,) that it was not necessary for me to enter upon the cold and temperate examination that I propose to make of this subject, at the close of the very impassioned address of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] I can now scarcely hope to secure so much of the attention of the Senate as shall be necessary for my purpose—then it would have been impracticable. Long a member of Congress, I have witnessed, frequently, scenes like the present, when difficulties and dangers were said to hover over us; have often heard animated appeals to popular feeling; fervid denunciations of abuse of power; awful anticipations of forth-coming evil. The country has thrived, nevertheless—the lapse of a few months, or weeks, or days, has dissipated the apprehensions of the timid, and falsified the prophecies of the bold. The crises have, in succession, passed away, and the frightful pictures that have been exhibited here have proved to be but “fancy sketches.” To those who have not been long members of the legislative body, I will recall an incident brought to mind by an allusion, in this discussion, that may serve to sustain them under the gloomy forebodings of the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina. The establishment of the independence of the United States was followed by trials of the virtue and fortitude of the people, equal, if not greater than those of war. Out of those trials arose the Federal Convention; the result of their labors was the constitution of our Government, which was presented to the people of the States for their ratification or rejection. To every State, as the question of adoption was submitted, anxious eyes were turned; but to none with such deep and solemn earnestness, as to the State of Virginia, then the leading State in population, revolutionary services, and intellectual power. Among her celebrated sons who were assembled to discuss and decide that vital topic, appeared a man endowed by nature with the rarest gifts of eloquence, cultivated assiduously through a long life at the forum, and in the halls of legislation. Patrick Henry—who was, I understand, connected with the Senator from South Carolina, and it is not difficult to believe that blood from the same source runs in his veins, since the exhibition of his powers here)—was opposed to the adoption of the proposed constitution—that voice, which, like the trumpet-call, had animated the hopes, and fortified the courage of his country in the hours of her severest suffering, was raised to warn her against the new and dangerous system prepared for her future Government. He persuaded, he threatened, he argued, he prophesied—public liberty was to be lost—property, life, and honor, were to be unsafe. But all was vain. The purse and the sword were intrusted to an alien government, and peace, prosperity, and glory, were secured to the people and to the States. That illustrious man lived long to enjoy the glorious spectacle of his country's happiness—to rejoice that the dulcet and harmonious sounds he had poured into the ears of his entranced auditors, the images of fearful portent he had created in their inflamed imaginations, were powerless to produce convictions on their judgment, or to make abiding impressions on their hearts.

Both the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky are objectionable, in form and substance. They are censorial, not corrective; vindictive, not legislative. They strike at a supposed offender—they offer no redress for the asserted injury. They are justly exposed to all the reprehension of the Senator from Missouri. The first resolution can be defended on but one ground—the right of the Senate, by the expression of its opinions, to appeal to the people, to control the exercise of power by the elective franchise—a call upon the people to awaken from a false security, and rescue their endangered prosperity from the hands of a corrupt, improvident, or unwise administration. Occasions for such expressions of opinion are of rare occurrence. They cannot be made with any show of justification when the legislative power of Congress is ample to correct the existing, to avert the coming evil. Is it pretended that the power of Congress is not ample to redress this imputed wrong? If the act done is corrupt in the Chief Magistrate or Secretary, impeach and punish—if they have acted unwisely, but not corruptly, legislate and control them.

The depositories have been removed from the United States Bank. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us that, in the exercise of the power given to him by the charter, he has decided that time and circumstances required him to perform the act. The President approves the act. He has done more: he urged the former Secretary of the Treasury to perform it. In my judgment the disposition of the depositories is neither the primary nor preliminary, but a dependent question. Changing the place of collecting eight or nine millions of dollars can be of no great consequence in its effects on the business or currency of the country. The most enlightened of the friends of the bank admit, that, of itself, the order of the Secretary has not produced, or ought not to have produced serious embarrassments in the systems of credit or exchange. The derangement, the pressure in the moneyed transactions of the commercial cities, proceed from the act of the bank, which wants to ascertain what is to be its fate. Is the charter to expire in 1836, or to be renewed? If the charter is not to be renewed, a change in the place of depositories was a thing of course, and certainly there can be no ground for clamorous complaints at the performance of an act now, which must be performed at no distant day.

On this preliminary question, I have no desire to conceal my opinions. Under the stern necessities of the year 1814, I advocated, with zeal, the establishment of a national bank, as the best, if, not the only certain mode of procuring funds for carrying on the war. In 1816, I voted to charter the present bank, not as a measure of necessity, but of convenience, to aid in the restoration of a sound currency. I believe it has done good. I am sure it has attempted to do much evil. I will not consent to the renewal of the present charter—but for a bank properly controlled, with salutary restrictions upon its power, I stand ready to vote to-morrow, without regard to the wishes of the existing or expected administrations. My opinions of the constitutionality or the expediency of public measures are not regulated by the probable effects of those measures on the fortunes of administrations or of men. Recharter the bank, with or without modifications, establish another, to be the immediate successor of the present, and the clamor and the question about the depositories is at an end. Let those who believe it practicable to create an institution which will reconcile conflicting opinions, make the experiment at once. I do not. To me the question seems virtually decided. The people are against the bank. For expressing and acting upon this conviction, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury have been severely arraigned by the Senator from Kentucky.

He has examined at large the messages of the President to prove that he made no issue with the bank at the late election. The opinions of the Chief Magistrate are clearly and explicitly expressed in all his messages. The veto of the bill for re-chartering the bank could not be mistaken; admitting, however, that the Senator is correct, that the President did not present the issue of bank or no bank to the people. The issue, the Senator well knows, is made by the two parties, and not by one of them; that was done by his opponents, by the bank itself, and all the parties who were connected with it in the struggle for power—they made the issue—they presented the question distinctly and intelligibly to the people. After the bank had, contrary to the earnest remonstrances of its friends, who were also the friends of the administration, urged its pretensions successfully to Congress, and had been foiled by the President, did they not appeal to the President? did they not appeal to the people through all their organs of the press? What said the Senator from Massachusetts in his examination of the veto message? "There is no longer doubt of the President's opinions"—"the bank has fallen, or is to fall." The only hope of escaping the impending ruin is "a change in the councils of the nation." By the right of self-defence, which it claims, the bank poured out its money to the owners of presses to spread abroad this and other similar speeches, all of them burdened with the same song—"the councils of the nation must be changed or the bank must go down." Of this right of self-defence, to which the bank makes claim, I shall say nothing. Unfortunately, it committed the mistake too common to us all—it confounded recrimination and defence. The strongest efforts were made to poison the public mind against the President—especially in Pennsylvania, the strong hold of the bank, whose legislature had, by unanimous vote, recommended a re-charter: more than one hundred thousand speeches of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] had been distributed in Pennsylvania alone. True to her early love and early hate, Pennsylvania preferred General Jackson and no bank, to a bank and any other candidate; and now, amidst all the fury of the storm raised by the recent act of the administration, he rests triumphantly secure upon that great key-stone of the federal arch. Shall we be told, sir, that the people had no right to settle this question? I had not supposed it possible for any man who had ever held an office from the people to deny the power, the right of the people thus to decide all questions of Government policy. Can we, acting on the broad assertion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PAXSON,] control, or even embarrass, for any length of time, the exercise of the power of the people? Remember, sir, this is not a question of repealing, but re-enacting laws. The will of the people of the United States—the bare majority of the people of the United States, residing in the great States only, can and will decide, if they have not already pronounced their decree. A majority of the other branch of Congress, selected by a majority of the whole people, can control the fate of the bank against the united force of this body, and of the Executive, and of the Governments of all the States. How powerless are we, when the executive and the popular branch combine against us, and the State sovereignties direct their representatives here to follow in their train! Of the decision which has been, or will be made, I shall speak with the respect due to those who have made, or will make it. The second experiment of abandoning a national bank, will indeed be tried under the happiest auspices. Specie is abundant; the Government is free from debt; the people are prosperous, the State institutions in the best credit; the Government deposites, and the deposites of individuals in the banks, are unusually large; foreign exchange is, and promises to continue, in our favor; large and constantly increasing supplies of the precious metals are drawn from recently discovered sources, of whose existence no one dreamed. While peace and prosperous days are ours, the aid of a bank will not be required; but when the hour of danger and difficulty comes, when large and unrestrained emissions of paper, necessary for the Government itself, drive the precious metals from our shores, the want of the great balance-wheel will, I fear, be felt, and we may be driven, under circumstances adverse to salutary precaution, to force it again into the machine. I sincerely hope, that, in this opinion, I am greatly deceived,—that the hard-money days may indeed come, and speedily come, and always continue. All the measures appropriate to hasten that period, I shall freely support, having learned the necessity, and, indeed, the duty, of cheerful obedience to the will of the people.

The time chosen for changing the place of the Government deposites has been a subject of reprehension; it was done, Senators say, but two months before Congress met. Had I been an adviser of the President, I should have recommended delay. I should have said to him, I believe that the people have decided against a bank; that the majority of the representatives of the people, elected under the new census, bringing with them the popular sentiment, will record that judgment; but I advise you not to take it for granted that you understand the opinions of the House of Representatives. It is possible that the people may have continued you in place, and yet desire the continuance of the institution; wait until a vote of the House of Representatives renders their opinion not a matter of argument, but of undisputed and indisputable fact. The President has chosen to act upon the strong presumption afforded by the result of his own, and of the other popular elections. His justification depends upon the establishment of the fact presumed. But what right have we to complain? The course of the Senate was not misunderstood. Had it been, would it have been criminal in the President, or in the Secretary of the Treasury, to believe, and to act on the belief, that changes of opinion regarding the bank had been wrought here by changes in the State Governments? Can it be matter of supposition what are the wishes of the State sovereignties? Do they not correspond with the wishes of their respective sovereign, with the wishes of the sovereign of the United States.

But, sir, the President is arraigned for the exercise of a usurped authority over the public treasure. In the language of the Senator from Kentucky, he has laid an unhallowed hand upon the public purse. Is this fact or groundless assumption? By changing the places of collecting and depositing the revenue, has he increased his power over the money of the people? Can he now touch it without polluting his hands? Can the Secretary of the Treasury use one dollar of the public money in the State banks, more than he could before, when it was in the Bank of the United States and its branches? The same guarantees for the safety of our treasure now exist that formerly existed. The power of the President is neither increased nor diminished. If corrupt, the public money was equally within his reach in the Bank of the United States as in the State banks. But gentlemen assert that he has assumed the same power over the purse that he has over the sword. True, sir, he has exercised the same power over the purse and the sword. He has rightfully the same power over the sword and purse. He cannot use, and never has used, either, without legislative authority, given according to the provisions of the constitution. Can he unsheath the sword to strike abroad or at home? Can he lift his hand against foreign violence or domestic treason without our leave? So is it with the purse; he cannot, he dare not, touch one mill without legislative permission. A suggestion has been made, Mr. President, which I heard with regret, that the public money has been placed in favorite partisan banks, where it is likely to be used for all purposes of speculation and speculation. This means, I presume, that the deposites being changed to the State banks, a new and unworthy class of persons will receive loans who could not have obtained them from the Bank of the United States. This sweeping denunciation of the respectable and irreproachable directors of all the State institutions trusted by the Secretary of the Treasury, is without the shadow of foundation. For skill and integrity they stand as fair as the directors of the Bank of the United States or any of its branches. The phrase of "favorite partisan banks" shows how idle the suggestion is. Of the banks now the depositories of the public money, the great mass are managed by persons decidedly opposed to the administration; who, on the question of re-chartering the Bank of the United States, differ with the Executive; whose influence and whose votes were against the present Chief Magistrate at the last election.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] denies that the President has any control over the Treasury Department and that his interference in the exercise of the discretion vested in that officer is a usurpation of authority, if not for corrupt purposes, leading to dangerous results. He admits that the control of the Executive over the other cabinet ministers is complete. The Secretary of the Treasury is asserted to be exempt from this controlling power, and is responsible to Congress, and to Congress only, for the wisdom or purity with which his discretion is exercised. This distinction seems to me to be fancied, not resting upon any sufficient basis in the constitution of the United States, or in the laws organizing the Departments. In truth sir, it is really founded upon a difference in the title of the acts establishing the Treasury, and the other Executive Departments. The titles are "An act to establish the Treasury Department—An act to establish an Executive Department, called the Department of War," &c. How this difference of title arose is not apparent from the Journal of the Congress of 1789. All the bills for establishing the Departments were reported under a resolution of the House of Representatives. "That it was expedient to establish Executive Departments of War, Navy, and Treasury." The bill had the same titles; yet, when the bills passed and it was necessary to give titles to the acts, the title of the bill respecting the Treasury Department was not given to the act. The words "to establish an Executive Department, to be called the Treasury Department" were changed, and became, "to establish the Treasury Department." Is it not obvious to the most superficial observation, that the alteration was made to avoid tautology? A design to make a distinction between the responsibilities of the heads of the Treasury Department and the other Executive Departments, cannot be even plausibly inferred from this cause.

It is further alleged that the terms of the act establishing the Treasury Department prove that the Secretary was not to be under the control of the Executive. It is made his duty "to prepare and report plans for the improvement and management of the public revenue, and for the support of public credit," and "to report to either House of Congress upon any subject referred to him," &c. The Secretary being bound to report to Congress, and not to the Executive, it is gravely urged that the responsibility of the Secretary must be to Congress and not to the Executive. These clauses in the act of 1789 were not admitted without dispute and animadversion. The construction now put upon them would be truly surprising to the disputants of that day. Then it was urged by the objectors to the introduction of them, that it gave power to the Secretary over Congress; not power to Congress over the Secretary. [See Marshall's Life of Washington—pages 200 to 205.] They were defended and retained on the simple ground that they were intended merely to procure, directly and conveniently, information in detail from the best and most practical source. No one maintained or imagined that any change in the responsibility of the Secretary was to result from them. Gentlemen seem to be entirely unconscious of the effect of their hypothesis. If they are right, the responsibility of a Secretary of the Treasury for a wise administration of his Department, is nominal—it has no sanction. According to true theory, all the Executive officers of Government are responsible for the purity and wisdom of their conduct in the execution of the duties devolved upon them: to the Executive and to Congress, for their purity—to the Executive alone for their wisdom. The hypothesis of Senators does not touch the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury through an impeachment; but in this he is in no respect different from the other Heads of Departments—it destroys all responsibility for the wisdom of his acts. He reports to Congress, and proves his folly of improvidence. What remedy has Congress to apply? It can apply none. The two branches of the legislature may indeed decide that the removal of the officer would be proper. But this act must be performed by the Executive. We have here then a nominal responsibility to Congress, resting for its efficacy on the only constitutional sanction, the Executive power of removal.

There is another strange consequence to which I would call the attention of honorable Senators, springing from their hypothesis. If the obligation to report to a particular part of the Government establishes the exclusive responsibility of the officer to the authority to which his report is made, then the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible to the whole legislature for his general reports on the revenue and for his plans for supporting public credit, and responsible to that branch of Congress only to which his reports on referred subjects are made. Here we have established another and still more loose responsibility in that officer. Supposing him to betray gross ignorance and consummate folly, what can either House do to rescue the administration of the Treasury from his hands? Must there be a supplication to the President to remove him? a supplication from Congress to remove the officer for acts, for the faithful or wise performance of which he is not responsible to the Executive! What a whimsical spectacle would be exhibited if this theory were practically applied, and the President should, as he justly might, reply to us or to the House of Representatives, Gentlemen, the Secretary is bound by law to make report to you, and to you alone, therefore, is he responsible. It is no part of my duty to control or to punish the honest exercise of a conscientious discretion vested by yourselves. Thus, sir, honorable Senators, in seeking to withdraw the Secretary of the Treasury from his constitutional responsibility to the Chief Magistrate, are proving that he is above all control, while his conduct cannot be connected by proof with criminal intention. The contradictory language to which the honorable Senator has been driven in describing the character of this Department, should have shaken his faith in the accuracy of his theory. He does not pretend that it is legislative or judicial. Not being executive, what is it? We are told that its duties are administrative. Indeed, and what are administrative duties but executive duties? Administrative relates to administration—that which administers is administrative. As applied to government, the Chief Executive Magistrate, a President, or holding any other title, administers. His duties are administrative. The honorable Senator is thus driven, in seeking to find a distinctive, descriptive word, to use one equivalent to executive, in his attempt to prove that the Treasury duties are not executive in their character.

It is alleged, Mr. President, that the charter of the bank vests an authority over the Government deposits in the Secretary of the Treasury independent of the Chief Magistrate, because the reasons for removing the deposits must be reported to Congress. I have already shown that the obligation to report to Congress did not change the responsibility of the Secretary, or if it did, it renders him in effect an irresponsible agent, beyond all control, while his errors proceed from no criminal intent. I have not attempted to show that Congress can have no power to weaken the authority of the President by creating a new and diminishing the ordinary responsibility of a subordinate to the Chief Executive Magistrate. Congress never intended to give a personal discretion to the officer at the head of the Treasury. The discretion given is official, and subject, like all other discretionary power to inferior officers, to the controlling authority of the Executive. The discretion was given with the well-understood qualification, that it was to be exercised in subordination to the duty of the President, who is bound by the most solemn of all obligations to see the laws faithfully executed—who is responsible to his country and to his God for the purity and wisdom of all the officers under his control in the discharge of their respective trusts. I like not the phrase, "I take the responsibility," which has been so harshly condemned. I like it not, because it would seem to imply that the President could have avoided the responsibility of the removal of the deposits. He could not escape his just share of the public odium or approbation of this measure. What would have been the language of those who have condemned the President, if the removal had been made under the Secretary's discretionary power, contrary to his declared judgment of the injustice and impolicy of the act? He would have escaped the odious appellations of usurper and tyrant, bestowed so freely upon him, but he would have been saluted with the not less vile epithets of driveller and dotard. He would have been called a miserable old woman, fit only to hatch chickens at the Hermitage, since he was incapable, by the exercise of his constitutional authority, of preventing the ruin brought down upon us by the folly or madness of a perverse subordinate.

In utter forgetfulness of the express provision of the constitution empowering the President to require the opinion of the heads of Departments in writing, on their respective duties, the Senator from Kentucky said, in a tone of triumph, "the President had no right either by the constitution or law to go to the other Secretaries to ask them how a service should be performed, which was confided exclusively to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury; he might as well have asked the Secretary of the Treasury how a movement of the army should be made by the Secretary of War," &c. &c. Well, sir, is it not in the experience of that Senator that Secretaries of the Treasury have been consulted about the plans of campaigns and the movements of the military and naval force of the United States? Is it not every day's practice to call upon him for opinions relating to the duties of all the other Secretaries? If any doubt could exist of the power of the President to see that every discretion vested in the heads of Departments was faithfully and wisely exercised, the clause in the constitution to which I have alluded would remove it. Why should the President be authorized to require the opinions of one Secretary about the duties of another, but to enlighten his judgment as to the proper mode of having those duties performed? Why should he form a deliberate judgment, if the power is not given him to control the Secretary, to see that the laws prescribing that Secretary's duties are faithfully executed? Under the constitution, Congress cannot divest the Executive of control over those who are his eyes and hands to perform his appropriate functions. Congress have, by no previous enactments, made such pretension.

It has been justly urged, Mr. President, that under this view of the Executive power over subordinate officers of the Treasury, he might interfere directly in the settlement of accounts by the Auditors and Comptrollers—could say, "pass this account," or "refuse that account," under penalty of rejection from office. The personal interference of the Chief Magistrate in the settlement of accounts certainly never was contemplated—that he has the power to interfere is undoubted—that it would be his duty, under probable circumstances, cannot be fairly questioned. Suppose a corrupt understanding, or an erroneous judgment of an Auditor and Comptroller operating with uniform injustice to a particular class of persons, or injuriously to the public, the duty of the Executive is apparent—the instant expulsion of the officers, if corrupt—the correction of their judgments, if erroneous. If the error was persisted in, a removal from office, and the substitution of those who would be just to individuals and to the public. That a President might interfere corruptly is certainly true—this possibility does not prove the want of power or the propriety of withholding it. No President can, in this regard, act corruptly without certain detection, immediate exposure, and probable punishment by impeachment. Sad, indeed, sir, would be the condition of the country if the rights of individuals and of the public were in the irresponsible hands of every subordinate officer who settles accounts in the Treasury or other Departments of the Government.

The President of the United States and the late Secretary of the Treasury seem, sir, to have well understood their respective powers and obligations. When the question of the removal of the deposites was first agitated, Mr. Duane, with the frankness and firmness entitled to public respect, opposed the measure—it was one he could not sanction, but if resolved upon by the President, he would give way for another, who, coinciding with the President, could act without scruple or hesitation. After thorough investigation of the various arguments submitted to him, the President made his decision; and then, unfortunately, Mr. Duane declined fulfilling his voluntary engagement. The cause assigned was still more unfortunate. He conceived that he was insulted. This did not absolve him from his engagement; indeed it should have furnished a new motive for withdrawing. If treated courteously, his resignation should have been tendered out of respect to the President; if rudely, he should have thrown back upon the President his commission from respect to himself. Honorable Senators censure without measure the paper read to the cabinet by the President. The exercise of ordinary charity would place the subject in a very different light from that thrown upon it here. Is it not apparent from the document itself, recollecting the preceding and attendant circumstances, that the sole object of the President was to shield Mr. Duane from the responsibility of the act which he seemed to dread. The President desired to take the whole, to reconcile his Secretary to the course resolved on. Entertaining a conscientious conviction that the course was fraught with injurious consequences to the public, the Secretary would have been faithless had he accepted the offered shelter. He was only wrong in shifting the ground upon which he stood. No honest Secretary will ever put his hand to a work which, in his judgment, will bring ruin or distress upon his country. No public officer is bound to suffer even uncourteous treatment from the Chief Magistrate; the only honorable step, in either case, is resignation of office, and submission of his conduct to the judgment of that great tribunal, public opinion, to which all must yield a cheerful or forced obedience. If little charity has been shown to the President, by what term shall I describe the treatment of the present Secretary of the Treasury, distinguished through a long life as a politician and as a man by his urbanity, and courtesy, and virtue. To call it harsh would not convey an adequate idea of its extreme injustice. An officer, who, previous to appointment to the Treasury Department, had urged upon the President by fact and argument the propriety of a removal of the deposites, is accused of being made the supple tool of the Executive for the performance of that act; is represented as standing by, the cold spectator of the struggles of his colleague in the contest, between his conscience and his attachment to the Chief Magistrate; as witnessing the contemptuous expulsion of that colleague from office, and then coolly entering the vacant place without sympathy or the smallest emotion for the man who preferred the loss of honors and emoluments to a betrayal of the interests of the people. The present Secretary left a place of honor for another not more honorable, a place of great responsibility for one of greater responsibility, a place uniting honor and profit, which the condition of a large family impelled him to regard, for an honorable place, the profits of which are insufficient to defray his necessarily increased expenditures. These circumstances alone should protect him from the slightest censure, but he stood committed to the President by his previously given advice, and when called upon to perform a task he had urged upon his colleague, he could not, without dishonor, have disobeyed the call. He stood pledged to the Chief Magistrate and to the country, and he has not shrunk from his duty. He abides with unshaken confidence in the justice of his country, for all the consequences of the act he recommended to another and performed himself. And how is he represented here by the Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY,] and South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN,] as claiming all power to himself, and denying all power to Congress, as claiming to himself and the Executive an authoritative control over the whole treasure of the nation, and denying the right of Congress to interfere. This is a terrible position to an officer whose duties are prescribed by Congress, who is now dependent upon one branch of Congress for his continuance in an office which he is accused of having earned regardless of the feelings and honors of a colleague, by base subserviency to the mandates of a ruthless master.

Let us examine if in fact the Secretary claims this extensive, exclusive power. The Secretary holds that the charter of the bank is a contract between the Government of the United States, and the stockholders—is this denied? The Secretary holds that by that contract the power to remove the deposits is expressly given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to him alone. Is this denied? In the execution of that contract, the Secretary holds that he must be the agent to exercise that power, and that it cannot be exercised by any other agent without a violation of the obligation of the Government. Is this denied? The Secretary holds that the removal of the deposits by himself is in conformity with the contract, and prostrates the only obstacle to the exertion of the power of Congress over the whole subject, and all the interests connected with it. So far from claiming, therefore, power to the prejudice of Congress; so far from denying or attempting to resist their authority, he has loosened the bonds imposed by Congress upon their own hands. Supposing him to have been mistaken in his construction of the charter of the bank, admitting that Congress had the same power as the Secretary, or unlimited power over the deposits, there is now no pretext for accusing the Secretary of the Treasury of setting up claims to an authority above the power of Congress.

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 27, 1834.]

The honorable censors of the Secretary accuse him of a misconstruction of the sixteenth section of the bank charter. The power given to the Secretary "to order and direct" the Government deposits to be "otherwise" made than in the Bank of the United States is alleged to have been given for a single object, the safety of the public money. This construction, in glaring contradiction of the broad and unqualified terms of the section, is founded upon an assumption that the discretion of the department is necessarily limited by the nature of its duties, these being fiscal, his reasons for exercising the discretion must be fiscal reasons. Hence it is concluded that the deposits must be in danger before he can properly act. The premises and the conclusion are not very closely connected. If the premises are true; if the discretion is limited by the fiscal character of the department, there might exist many and various fiscal reasons for changing the place of deposit, perfectly consistent with their safety in the bank. I will mention but one. Suppose the bank systematically refused the accommodations to the merchants indebted to the Government, with or without regard to their political opinions, the safety of the deposits would not be endangered, yet I can scarcely conceive that it will be denied, that the fact being certain it did not afford a sufficient fiscal reason for the exercise of the Secretary's discretionary power. This construction of the sixteenth section has, however, Mr. President, one great and uncommon merit; it is perfectly new. It may be correct, but I will proceed to show, that from the establishment of the bank to the late order of Mr. Taney, all the opinions expressed by individuals or committees in Congress, sustain the opposite construction; opinions in perfect accordance with the actions and convictions of every head of the Treasury Department from that hour to the present. Without referring to the general doctrines of those who advocated the Bank of the United States, I confine myself to the period succeeding to the incorporation of the present bank. The subscription to the capital stock of the bank was in due time filled, the first instalment paid, the first board of directors appointed. Prior to any preparation of notes for circulation, the board of directors at their first meeting, very shortly preceding the time fixed for the payment of the second instalment due by the stockholders, adopted a resolution by which the subscribers could, by the use of stock notes, secured by transfers of their bank stock or public stock at ninety per cent. on nominal value, evade the payment of the specie required by the charter. A resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, directing the Committee on the Currency—the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] was its chairman—to inquire into the facts—and into the expediency of adopting measures to enforce the payment of the specie part of the capital within a limited time. The committee addressed themselves to Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, a director of the bank. The fact was admitted, the convenience of the resolution alleged, and an argument offered to prove that it was not inconsistent with the obligations of the charter. The committee, convinced by Mr. Lloyd, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution. Not satisfied with the letter of Mr. Lloyd, or the opinion of the committee, I had the honor to propose two resolutions to the House, to correct the proceedings of the board, and to compel a future observance of the charter. The Senate will not understand me as quoting my own resolutions as authority: I read them to show the opinion then entertained of the use which might be properly made of the deposits, as an instrument to correct or to restrain the usurpations or irregularities of the bank.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the arrangement made by the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, under which the notes of the stockholders, secured by deposit of six per cent. stock of the United States, are received in place of the specie required to be paid as a part of the second instalment, is an unwarrantable extension of the corporate power of that body; and that the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury be, and he is hereby directed to withhold the deposits of the Government from the said bank, until the proportion of specie, required as part of the second instalment, is actually paid, according to the true intent and meaning of the act of incorporation."

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the discount of any note, or the loan of money by the Bank of the United States to individuals, on the credit of the funded debt of the United States, either transferred to the bank or to any of its officers, or deposited with an authority to sell the same for the payment of the debt contracted, is a manifest violation of the ninth rule, or fundamental article of the constitution of said bank, and is contrary to the spirit of the fifth section of the act of incorporation; and that the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury be, and he is hereby directed, whenever he shall hereafter ascertain that any discount of notes, or loan of money, has been made on such security, to proceed forthwith to withdraw from the said bank the deposits of the Government; and that it shall be his duty to give information thereof to Congress during the first week of the present session."

Unfortunately for the country and the bank, these resolutions were not passed by Congress. The bank continued to substitute stock notes for specie, and also for public debt. Instead of 4,200,000 dollars in specie, it began its business with $1,724,109, only $325,000 more than the coin required to be paid as the first instalment. How much coin was eventually paid cannot be ascertained, but this fact is certain, that while stock notes were almost wholly substituted for coin in the second and subsequent instalments, only $13,872,000 of public debt was, in the whole, paid in as part of the capital of the bank, instead of $21,000,000, contemplated by and required by law. The consequences of this omission to enforce the charter became too notorious to be overlooked. A Committee of Investigation was appointed in 1818—Mr. Spencer of New York, Mr. Lowndes of South Carolina, Mr. McLane of Delaware, Mr. Burwell and Mr. Tyler of Virginia. The committee, after investigation in Philadelphia, reported sundry violations of the charter. They recommended no measures to Congress to correct the many evils and mischiefs they had depicted, "because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy," [the reremoval of the deposits] "whenever the situation of the bank shall require it. And if, after the stockholders shall have become acquainted with the mismanagement of the institution, they shall adopt no means to prevent its continuance, or the directors themselves shall persist in a course of conduct requiring correction, the committee cannot entertain a doubt that the salutary power lodged in the Treasury Department will be exerted, as occasion may require, with reference to the best interests of the United States." Being a member of Congress at that period, I can say, with confidence, that there was a general acquiescence in the views of the committee, and no doubt can be entertained that the power of the Secretary of the Treasury would have been exercised according to the expectation of the committee, had not a change in the direction, and, consequently, in the management of the bank, restored public confidence. The popularity of a new president (Mr. Cheves) was of decisive effect in its favor. The chairman of the Committee of Investigation [Mr. Spencer] did not think it wise to leave this subject to the power of the Secretary alone. He proposed resolutions for altering the charter of the bank, and to require the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the deposits, unless the bank consented to the proposed alterations. The opinions of Mr. Crawford, Mr. Rush, and Mr. Ingham, coincide with that of Mr. Taney. Mr. Crawford acted upon it in a variety of instances, expressed it on numerous occasions. He continued the deposits in State banks, to induce them to resume specie payments in 1817, after the Bank of the United States was incorporated. He made special deposits in banks of the District of Columbia, for the same purpose. After specie payments were resumed, he made limited deposits in 1819, in the West, in places where there was a branch bank of the United States, to maintain the credit of the State institutions, to prevent them from dishonoring their own bills. He offered to make deposits for a limited time in the banks of Georgia, to prevent collision with the United States Bank. Honorable Senators entirely misconceive the effect and operation of the joint resolution of 1816, under which it is alleged that Mr. Crawford acted. It gave him no power over the deposits inconsistent with the bank charter; he never so treated it. In fact, if the history of the day is recollected, it will be seen that the resolution did not enlarge, but diminished the then exercised authority over the currency of the country. By the act of 1789, nothing but coin was receivable for duties.

By the bank charter, notes of the United States Bank were to be received. By practice and necessity, all bank notes, not forbidden by the Secretary, were received in payment. The resolution of the year 1816 directed such measures to be taken by the Secretary as he should deem necessary for collecting duties, &c. in specie, notes of the Bank of the United States, Treasury notes, and notes of specie-paying banks, and that after "February 20th, 1817, no duties, taxes, &c. &c. ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States." Mr. Dallas, in his report to Congress of that year, said: "No State bank notes are receivable by law in payment of debts to the United States; the acceptance of such notes has been properly left to the vigilance and discretion of the Executive Department." The resolution changed the existing law by authorizing all specie-paying bank notes to be received by the collecting officers; it authorized measures for causing such only to be taken and it expresses an opinion of the time beyond which none others ought to be taken. In none of these provisions is to be found a disregard of the sixteenth section of the bank charter, nor can a command or permission to the Secretary to overlook his obligations to that institution be inferred. The Senator from New Jersey, who quoted this resolution, read the word ought as shall, and when corrected, asked, with some surprise, if ought and shall be did not mean the same thing. Certainly not, sir: the words are not identical, nor are they always of equivalent signification; in this instance the word "ought" was selected because it implied what really existed—a doubt as to the practicability of effecting the object. It was intended to justify the Secretary in the adoption of unpalatable and unpopular regulations, that what was anxiously desired might be obtained, and at the same time to leave him a full justification to receive duties, &c. in notes of banks not paying specie, if no other notes could be obtained. The precaution was wise, and an act of justice to the head of the Department. No one who remembers the condition of the currency at that day, will deny that the efforts of the Secretary, Mr. Crawford, were crowned with unlooked-for success. The measures he adopted more than realized the hopes of Congress.

One other reference to the proceedings of Congress, and I shall dismiss the point. I shall read to the Senate part of a report to Congress, and afterwards explain why it is, that I look upon it, not as an argument of the correctness of Mr. Taney's opinion, but, as an authority conclusive against the bank pretension.

"The country has a deep interest that the bank should maintain specie payments, and the Government an additional interest that it should keep the public funds safely, and transfer them, free of expense, wherever they may be wanted. The Government, therefore, has no power over the bank, but the salutary power of enforcing a compliance with the terms of its charter. Every thing is fixed by law, and nothing left to arbitrary discretion. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the sanction of Congress, would have the power to prevent the bank from using its power unjustly and oppressively, and to punish any attempt on the part of the directors to bring the pecuniary influence of the institution to bear upon the politics of the country, by withdrawing the deposits from the offending branches. But this power would not be lightly exercised by the Treasury, as its exercise would necessarily be subject to be reviewed by Congress; it is, in its nature, a salutary corrective, creating no undue dependance on the part of the bank."

So, sir, the Secretary was believed to have the power to prevent the bank from using its power unjustly and oppressively; to punish any attempt by the directors to bring the pecuniary influence of the institution to bear on the politics of the country, and that the provision of the charter is a salutary corrective. This opinion goes far beyond the Treasury Department. Mr. Taney thought he could look into the conduct of the bank, and remove the deposits, if its course was injurious to the public; this report gives him the power to remove the deposits from offending branches to punish any attempt of the directors of them to bring pecuniary influence to bear upon the politics of the country. From whence does the Senator suppose this extract is taken? It is from a celebrated report. Its author—an honor to Georgia where he was born; the pride of a sister State by whom he has been adopted and cherished; one of the most zealous, disinterested, and enlightened friends of the bank, to whose opinions it looks with profound respect, and from whose unwearied exertions it hopes to be sustained against even the overwhelming popularity of the President of the United States—is, Major General George McDuffie, of the first division of the militia of South Carolina, under the new organization. The extract is from the report of 1830, the bank's To Kalon, beau ideal of perfectibility, stamped by itself as worthy of universal credit, as a bank token it was always ready to redeem, which it has lavishly expended its funds to distribute through every portion of our country. Yes, sir, under its golden influence, that report has ascended our loftiest mountains, and penetrated our remotest valleys, has been laid on the parlor table of the rich man's palace, and the humble shelf of the poor man's cabin, to give all the people just and accurate ideas of the obligations, the innoxiousness, the utility, and the responsibilities of the institution. With this broad, decisive opinion in front, as an impregnable defence, the bank must have the impudence of the Devil himself to assail the Secretary of the Treasury for his exercise of power, under the sixteenth section of the charter of incorporation. Even those who do not thus stand committed to the truth of that report, must be compelled to allow that the Secretary of the Treasury has not expressed a very singular opinion when he declared he had power to remove the public deposits for good reasons, even though the safety of these deposits could not be doubted.

These paragraphs in the report of 1830, made by Mr. McDuffie, Mr. Verplanck, Mr. Dwight, Mr. Smyth, Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Gilmore, and Mr. Overton, furnish us with a key to the somewhat extraordinary letter of the president of the bank to a president of the branch bank at Charleston, South Carolina—extraordinary, not so much in the sentiments it expresses with the ordinary felicity of its author, as in the circumstances which produced it, and the time of its publication. It was published in 1832, in the National Gazette, to refute the charge that had been made against the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, of interfering in party politics, and to exemplify the plan of total abstinence which had been pursued by that institution:—total abstinence from all political interference in 1830 and 1832.

[PRIVATE.]

Bank of the United States, September 27, 1830.

Dear Sir: I have recently received a pamphlet entitled "Proceedings and the resolutions and address adopted by the State Rights party in Charleston," which contains the following passages: "We had arrayed against us the influence of the president of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, emphatically your bank, who was among the most zealous in his efforts against us, and among the most industrious in his cry of civil war, blood, and revolution. The president of the Bank of the United States was not less active, and the head which presides over this great federal institution was seen superintending with an anxious scrutiny the polls at the election."

And again: "But, if Charleston be fated to be governed by northern traders, officers of the federal judiciary, custom officers, and officers of the United States Bank, we know," &c. And further: "All the power of the custom-house, and of the Bank of the United States, all the power of the federal judiciary, and even, to a certain extent, of the banks of our own State, may be arrayed against us."

However unwilling to interpret very literally expressions provoked by the ardor of political controversy, there is yet in these extracts a direct assertion of facts, which, unless the highly respectable gentlemen who make it are entirely misinformed, is calculated to excite extreme regret. In the administration of the Bank of the United States, no principle is more fundamental than its total abstinence from politics. Its uniform object has been to devote itself exclusively to its own concerns, leaving public affairs to the public councils; to belong to the country, not to any section of it; to be true to every administration of the government, yet subservient to none, and, while composed of fellow-citizens of all parties, to be wholly unconnected with any. You know that during the many years in which I have enjoyed the pleasure of your correspondence, I have never made a single inquiry into the political opinions of any individual attached to the branch. I am at this moment equally ignorant and indifferent, and my only anxiety is, that they should so exercise their own rights as not to violate those of the institution. Undoubtedly, the officers of the bank are citizens, retaining all their privileges of free thought and free action, nor would the directors presume to control the political opinions of the humblest individual in their service. Yet it is not an unreasonable expectation that they who voluntarily engage in the employment of the institution should conform to its essential policy, and cautiously abstain from any conduct which may bring upon it undeserved odium. Now, there is nothing more adapted to offend and estrange the community than an active and ostensible participation in popular elections by the officers of the bank. Whether they are in the right or in the wrong, whether the occasion be great or small; whether they succeed or fail, are matters of not the slightest consequence. All parties think themselves always right. To all parties all contests seem important; and all, if they do not succeed, are sure they ought to succeed; so that, whether victorious or defeated, each party retains a feeling against its prominent adversaries, which it inevitably transfers to the institutions identified with them.

The board of directors are therefore extremely unwilling that the officers of the bank should be zealous or conspicuous at elections, and the reproach thus publicly vouches is of a character to excite great sensibility. That feeling I trust you will be able to remove or allay, so as to relieve the institution from the imputation of political interference, and I therefore take the earliest opportunity of inviting you to furnish me with the means of placing the subject before the board in a satisfactory light. This will be very acceptable to them, and particularly gratifying to yours, with great respect,

N. BIDDLE, President.

JOSEPH JOHNSTON, Esq.

President of the office of the bank of the United States at Charleston, South Carolina.

The election, Mr. President, for activity at which Mr. Johnston was thus rebuked, involved, in the view of the contending parties, the liberty of the people, and the union of the States. That gentleman exerted, attempted to exert, no rights but those of a simple citizen, to whom liberty and union was far more dear than the emolument of his office, or the popularity of that institution under which he held it. While the bank has thus professed to abstain from politics, to leave public affairs to public councils, to be true to every administration, to be wholly unconnected with all parties, it has actively engaged in enlightening the community through the public press; it has endeavored to demonstrate the necessity of a change in the councils of the nation, and has connected its fate intimately and indissolubly with the fortunes of the party adverse to the administration. No surprise ought to be felt by itself, or its friends, if the feelings of the victorious party 'against its prominent adversaries, should be transferred to the institution identified with them' in the contest.

It is asserted, Mr. President, that the Chief Magistrate and Secretary of the Treasury have found a new source of power in the result of a Presidential election. This is a most wonderful misconception of a very simple and unpretended truth, that the result of the election proved that the principles which had governed the administration were approved by the people, especially on the bank question, on which the President had been, in the canvass, most fiercely assailed. The popular approbation of the veto message was not supposed to confer new powers, but to direct that the regular constitutional authority of the Executive should be exerted as it had been exerted until the bank charter expired. I know, sir, that the Senator from Kentucky alleges that there is no color or justification for the assertion that the question of bank or no bank was fully and fairly submitted to the people, and a decision pronounced against it by them. I have already attempted to prove that there was not only color of proof but certain proof that the question was originally made by the bank itself. Will the honorable Senator tell us why so much money was expended, and so many explanatory pamphlets distributed, the few months immediately pending the last election, and why the expenditure and distribution ceased as soon as the election was decided? There can be but one answer to this question. The object is notoriously apparent. The means adopted, sir, were not well calculated to promote the end. In one aspect of the subject I am not sorry that the experiment was made to test the influence of this moneyed corporation upon popular will. This signal failure may be hereafter safely quoted as an answer to the alleged dangers of such an institution to free Governments. Sir, if this experiment had been successful, if the weight of the bank in the scale had rendered the issue doubtful, I would have sworn to it an unceasing hostility. That bank never was and never can be a popular institution—money against well-earned popularity is but dust in the balance—the resort to it works the destruction of the miscreant who uses it—ambitious rivalry, calumnies, even personal violence at elections, the people will endure and forgive; but he who uses money to corrupt, commits the unpardonable crime—the plague-spot betokening certain political death is upon him—humble penitence before the throne of the Most High may purify him from the moral guilt, but here there is no escape from public neglect or public execration but in the grave of oblivion.

The President and Secretary are accused of the high crime of usurping power over the morality of the people. I presume, sir, that the President, in the execution of the laws, is bound to regard, to watch over the morality of the people, in the same manner that we are bound to regard and watch over it in the enactment of laws. Why, sir, we cannot have a tax proposed on foreign spirits or molasses without a homily on the demoralizing effects of imported and New England rum—it is true that the object of such tax—the encouragement of the manufacture of spirits from grain—is not quite consistent with the moral tendencies of the homily. Yet, sir, those who use such arguments must believe the preservation of the morals of the people within the range of constitutional obligation in making, and therefore cannot deny that to the same extent the President may look to the public morals in the manner of executing the laws.

A kindred accusation is, that the President and his Secretary pretend to exercise a power over the public press. In this body this assertion is made with a peculiarly bad grace. How long is it since we have seen persons rejected by the Senate when nominated to office, men of unblemished reputation and every way qualified, in order to preserve the press from Executive influence? Surely we who guard the purity of the press from Executive influence may permit without censure the Secretary to interpose a shield between the press and the Bank of the United States. There is this striking difference between the action of the Senate and of the President. He strikes at the supposed corrupter; we struck at those who were in danger of being corrupted. I think, however, Mr. President, that the bank is not truly charged. The president and directors are, I trust and believe, incapable of corrupting innocence or seducing virtue, but, like men of the world, when they want the services of knaves, they know how to command them. A highly censurable application of the funds intrusted to their care has been made, but they have not corrupted the press. The sentinel, who suffered the body of the malefactor he was stationed to watch, to be stolen at midnight from the gibbet, was guilty of a grave offence, but he did not corrupt the Ephesian matron.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] censures the President for declaring that he had very much at heart "the purity of the elective franchise," and asks, what part of the constitution gives him any power over that subject. Here, sir, as in the other preceding instances, a remark made relative to the bank, a special guardianship over its movements, granted by the charter of incorporation, is transformed into a claim of general authority over elections. The Executive has made no such claim; but can it be doubted that within the limits of his authority he is bound to have "much at heart the purity of elections?"—to preserve it by the exertion of all his constitutional authority—to remove every public officer subject to his removing power who shall attempt to poison the great fountain of liberty—to punish the bank for bribery at the polls, or any other use of its money destructive to the free and unrestrained exercise of the elective right? He would be false to the principles of the Government—to his own character and high duties—a renegade and a traitor, to suffer any violation of the elective franchise he has constitutional power to prevent.

Mr. F. proceeded to correct what he termed the misapprehension of several parts of Mr. Taney's report. Mr. Taney was censured for not having seen the charters of the banks in which he deposited the public treasure. Mr. T. did not say he had not examined the charters. He did not send the charters of all the banks—preferring, to avoid delay, to wait until copies were received, daily expected from the banks. But he expressly states that the charters of all those banks, except one, are in the library of the Department of State.

He was supposed to assert that the great credit of the notes of the United States Bank was to be imputed entirely to their being receivable by law in payment of drafts, &c. He asserted that the superior credit of those notes was to be imputed to that cause.

Mr. Taney is thought by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to have considered himself the joint agent or trustee of the bank and the Government, to superintend the stipulation and faithful observance of the charter. He throughout assumes that the Secretary of the Treasury is the agent of the Government only, representing the power of the whole Government so far as regards the removal of the depositories.

He was supposed to claim a right to decide officially upon the constitutionality of the bank, and to have said that Congress had nothing to do with it. On the contrary, he admits throughout his obligation to consider the charter as obligatory and in force until it expires by its own limitation, in 1836. He speaks of his opinion of the constitutionality of the bank, as one of the reasons why, entertaining that opinion, he had not a right to act on the assumption that the charter would be renewed. He nowhere even intimates that Congress has nothing to do with it.

He is supposed to have withdrawn the depositories on the ground that the charter was forfeited. He has not placed the removal on that ground, nor has he anywhere expressed an opinion that the acts of misconduct amounted to a forfeiture. He had not said, as has been assumed, that money on deposit in the bank, is not in the Treasury—it is undoubtedly so, but it is equally in the Treasury when transferred to another place of deposit, to any State bank, where there is one, or where there is not, a branch bank of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has asked, why did not the Secretary of the Treasury let the public money remain in the bank until the last day of the charter? The answer to the question may be found by the Senator in the report of the Secretary. He believed it his duty to look to the future, and prepare for an expected event. He knew the charter was limited to 1836, and did not anticipate its renewal. The suggestion that no preparatory precautions were necessary, because the bank has two years after 1836 to settle its affairs, is entitled to little consideration. If, in this respect, however, the Secretary has erred, his error is to be traced to the bank itself, and to its ablest friends. What said the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech on the veto message?

"In three years and nine months from the present moment, (July, 1830,) the charter of the bank expires; within that period, therefore, it must wind up its concerns. It must call in its debts, withdraw its bills from circulation, and cease from all its ordinary operations. All this is to be done in three years and nine months; because, although there is a provision in the charter rendering it lawful to use the corporate name for two years after the expiration of the charter, yet this is allowed only for the purpose of suits, and for the sale of the estate belonging to the bank, and for no other purpose whatever; the whole active business of the bank, its custody of public deposits, its transfers of public moneys, its dealings in exchange, all its loans and discounts, and all its issues of bills for circulation, must cease and determine on, or before, the 3d day of March, 1836; and, within the same period, its debts must be collected," &c. &c.

The truth of this statement was and is undoubted. Indeed, sir, it is but a repetition of that made by the bank in the memorial for a renewal of its charter:

"If, satisfied with the practical operations of the institution, your honorable body shall deem it worthy of continuance, it seems expedient to relieve the country, as soon as may consist with mature deliberation, from the uncertainty in which all private transactions, and all public improvements, dependent on the future condition of the currency, and amount of capital disposable for those objects, must necessarily be involved until your decision is known. If, on the other hand, the wisdom of Congress shall determine that the bank must cease to exist, it is still more important that the country should begin early to prepare for the expected change, and that the institution should have as much time as possible to execute the duty, always a very delicate and difficult one, of aiding the community to seek new channels of business, and, by gradual and gentle movements, to press with the least inconvenience on the great interests connected with it."

The language of the bank memorial is explicit; the directors well understand their duty to the institution and to the public, and if the Secretary began too early to provide for winding up the concerns of the bank in the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] he began too late by one year and three months in the opinion of the bank and the Senator from Massachusetts.

That difference of opinion should exist as to the wisdom of the act of changing the place of deposits, is not surprising, but it is unaccountable that the power of the head of the Treasury Department over them should be denied. Since the establishment of our government, the Department, by its head, has exercised precisely the same authority lately exerted by Mr. Taney. Gentlemen cannot reflect seriously when they tell us that this subject belongs to the Treasurer, and not to the Secretary of the Treasury. They do not consider what is deposited, or who are the officers who make deposits. Bonds for the duties due to government given to collectors, money paid to receivers for public lands, taxes paid to collectors—these are the deposits, in places supposed to be safe. And who, sir, can direct these officers? Is it the Treasurer? He has no control over them, no intercourse with them, except to give the discharges when the moneys are put into the Treasury by the warrant of the Secretary. Originally these bonds and moneys were left in the care of the collectors, receivers, and taxgatherers, until paid into the Treasury, and this is yet done where there are no banks at convenient distances from the place of collection or payment. All these officers, are by law subject to the directions of the head of the Department, and all deposits made of bonds, notes, or money, under his directions, are made in strict compliance with his ordinary duty. His power over the deposits is connected in argument with the regulation of the currency, and the Secretary is severely censured for attempting to wrest all control over both from Congress, to place it in the hands of the Executive. With the certain consumption of a portion of the Senate's time, and no little danger of exhausting its patience, I venture to give, by reference to public documents, a brief sketch of the history of this branch of our polity. By the act of Congress of 1789, sec. 30, it is provided that nothing shall be received in payment of duties but specie. Now, sir, this first act on this subject has never been obeyed. The Secretary of the Treasury not only directed where the depository of bonds was to be made by his collectors, &c. as he had a right to do, but he disregarded the provision of the act of Congress, and permitted bank notes to be taken as specie. On the 23d of April, 1790, in obedience to a call of the House of Representatives, Mr. Hamilton made a detailed report on the subject of that act of 1789, "imposing duties on goods, wares," &c. The part relating to sec. 30, although long, is so striking that I shall read the whole of it.

"SEC. 30. This section provides for the receipt of the duties in gold and silver coin only. The Secretary has considered this provision as having for object the exclusion of payments in the paper emissions of the particular States, and the securing the immediate or ultimate collection of the duties in specie, as intended to prohibit to individuals the right of paying in any thing except gold or silver coin, but not to hinder the Treasury from making such arrangements as its exigencies, the speedy command of the public resources, and the convenience of the community, might dictate; those arrangements being compatible with the eventual receipt of the duties in specie. For instance, the Secretary did not imagine that the provision ought to be so understood as to prevent, if necessary, an anticipation of duties by Treasury drafts, receivable at the several custom-houses. And if it ought to be understood in this sense, it appeared to him that the principle of a different construction would extend to the permitting the receipt of the notes of public banks, issued on a specie fund. Unless it can be supposed that the exchanging of specie, after it has been received, for the bank notes to be remitted to the Treasury, is also interdicted, it seems difficult to conclude that the receipt of them, in the first instance, is forbidden.

"Such were the reflections of the Secretary with regard to the authority to permit bank notes to be taken in payment of duties. The expediency of doing it appeared to him to be still less questionable. The extension of their circulation by the measure, is calculated to increase both the ability and the inclination of the banks to aid the Government. It also accelerates the command of the product of the revenues for the public service, and it facilitates the payment of the duties. It has the first effect, because if business occasions the notes to be sent beforehand to distant places; and being ready on the spot, either for payment or exchange, the first post after the duties become payable, or are received, conveys them to the Treasury. The substitution of Treasury drafts, anticipating the duties, could hardly be made without some sacrifice on the part of the public. As they would be drawn upon time, and upon the expectation of funds to be collected, and, of course, contingent, it is not probable that they would obtain a ready sale but at a discount, or upon long credit. As they would also be more or less liable to accident, from the failure of expected payments, there would be continually a degree of hazard to public credit. And to other considerations it may be added that the practice of anticipation of this kind, is, in its nature, so capable of abuse, as to render it an ineligible instrument of administration, in ordinary cases, and fit only for times of necessity.

"If the idea of anticipation should be excluded, then the relying wholly upon Treasury drafts would be productive of considerable delay. The knowledge that funds were in hand must precede the issuing of them. Here would, of course, be some loss of time. And as the moment of demand, created by the course of business, would frequently elapse, there would as frequently be a further loss of time in waiting for a new demand. In such intervals, the public service would suffer, the specie would be locked up, and circulation checked. Bank notes, being a convenient species of money, whatever increases their circulation, increases the quantity of current money. Hence the payment of duties is doubly promoted by their aid; they at once add to the quantity of medium, and serve to prevent the stagnation of specie.

"The tendency of the measure to lessen the necessity of drawing specie from distant places to the seat of Government, results from the foregoing considerations. The slow operations of Treasury drafts would frequently involve a necessity of bringing on specie to answer the exigencies of Government; the avoiding of which, as much as possible, in the particular situation of this country, need not be insisted upon.

"But convinced, as the Secretary is, of the usefulness of the regulation, yet, considering the nature of the clause upon which these remarks arise, he thought it his duty to bring the subject under the eye of the House. The measure is understood, by all concerned, to be temporary.

"Indeed, whenever a national bank shall be instituted, some new disposition of the thing will be a matter of course."

This construction of the act of Congress was quietly acquiesced in, indeed legitimated, by the singular authority given to the Secretary by the subsequent act of 1792, quoted by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. SHERLEY,] to collect the revenue as he should judge best. The first bank of the United States being established, as anticipated by Mr. Hamilton, the bonds, &c., belonging to Government, were deposited in the mother bank and its branches, and such other banks as the Secretary chose to direct in the supposed ordinary exercise of his acknowledged power. The subject of the control and accountability for public moneys never was neglected by Congress; and in February, 1794, a committee of the House of Representatives, by their chairman, Mr. Sedgwick, put to Col. Hamilton these queries—[5th vol. State Papers, Finance 1, page 274, 275.]

"1. Whether money collected on account of the United States, and deposited in banks, is, from the time of deposit, considered as in the Treasury?

"2. Are any, and, if any, what, means necessary to subject money so deposited, to the control of the Treasurer?

"3. In case money so deposited is not considered as in the Treasury from the time of deposit, who is, from that time until it passes into the Treasury, responsible to the United States?"

The answers to these questions will show what then was the true theory on several points now under discussion.

In his letter of February 25, 1794, Col. Hamilton answers—

To question first.—"All moneys collected on account of the United States, and deposited in banks to the credit of the Treasurer, are considered as in the Treasury from the time of deposit. The steady course with regard to standing revenue, is, that the money deposited in banks passes immediately to the credit of the Treasurer. But it is necessary, to discharge the payers, that receipts of the Treasurer should be endorsed upon warrants signed by the Secretary, countersigned by the Comptroller, and registered by the Register, which is the course regularly observed."

To question second.—"After moneys are deposited in banks to the credit of the Treasurer, they are in his control, though they may not legally be disbursed but upon warrants of the above description. If deposited without passing, in the first instance, to the credit of the Treasurer, the means used for placing them in his custody and disposal, are warrants of the like kind."

To the third question.—"In respect to any moneys of the United States deposited in banks, but not to the credit of the Treasurer, the banks are considered as directly responsible to the United States; in the case of deposits to the credit of the Treasurer, they are responsible in the first instance to him—ultimately, to the United States."

Thus it appears, Mr. President, that, from the foundation of the Government, deposits were made in banks under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury—were put by him afterwards in the same banks under the control of the Treasurer, when, and not till then, they were considered as in the Treasury, subject to be drawn to answer appropriations, and for no other purpose whatever. That in removing money from one bank to another for the public convenience, either for the facility of paying the creditors of the nation, the money removed or transferred continuing always to the credit of the Treasurer, was in the Treasury until drawn out by regular warrants, to be disbursed under appropriation laws. No one ever imagined that there was assumption or stretch of power in these arrangements of the head of the Treasury Department. No one ever imagined that such exercise of authority by the Secretary either increased his own control, or that of the Chief Magistrate, over the public treasure, or diminished the proper responsibility of the Treasurer or any other officer in the Department. These arrangements or directions of the Department were in strict accordance with the views of Congress. At the same session in the month of May (22d, 1794,) a detailed and very elaborate report was made by a committee appointed to examine the state of the Treasury Department, and to report generally and specially thereupon. Mr. Abraham Baldwin, a member from Georgia, distinguished for his unwearied application to his public duties, his extensive information, his sober judgment, and perfect integrity, a political opponent, warmly attached to his party, of the Secretary of the Treasury, was the chairman of the committee. This report is to be found in the 5th vol. of the American State Papers, 1st vol. on Finance, 281. I recommend it to those who wish to understand the relative duties and powers of the Secretary and all the subordinate officers of the Treasury Department. The committee report the rules prevailing in the Treasury Department, and modes of proceeding observed with regard to the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money, and accounting for the same. I will content myself with a few extracts bearing directly on the questions before the Senate.

"It is a general rule that the Treasurer is the medium of all receipts and disbursements of public moneys which are received and disbursed within the United States, and that all receipts and disbursements must be sanctioned by warrants in favor of, and upon that officer. These warrants are issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and registered by the Register."

This general rule, with regard to receipts, has been carried into effect by five modes of proceeding:

"1st. By bills or drafts drawn by the Treasurer, under the special direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon those who have in their hands public moneys," &c.

"2d. By deposits made by the supervisors of the revenue, and the collectors of the customs, in the several banks, pursuant to a general direction from the Secretary of the Treasury, which immediately upon their being made, are passed to the credit of the Treasurer, the officer making the depositories taking duplicate receipts from the bank in which it is made; one of which is immediately forwarded to the Treasury, and the bank making weekly returns, one to the Secretary of the Treasury, another to the Treasurer, which specify the depositories made," &c.

All the five modes are approved by the committee. Those I have just quoted prove that the Secretary then exercised all the power since exerted over the collection and deposit of public moneys. Now, sir, as to the safe-keeping, after collection:

"The Treasurer, pursuant to general directions from the Secretary of the Treasury, keeps the public money under his control, in the several banks. Formerly the banks of North America, New York, Massachusetts, and Maryland, were places of deposit. At present, the public moneys are kept in the Bank of the United States, and its several offices of discount and deposit at Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Charleston, and in the bank of Providence." The Senate will perceive that Mr. Hamilton changed the place of deposit after the U. States Bank was chartered, as he had directed the depositories to be made in the State banks previously, without legislative direction, as none was thought necessary, for not one, even in the time of strong prejudice and party excitement against him, considered it as even an act of doubtful propriety.

"The Treasurer never has any public money in his possession or custody, which is not in fact deposited in bank, from the moment his possession or custody commences till it ceases by the disbursement of it for public purposes," &c. So it is now, and ever has been, from that hour to the present day. But, sir, what control had the Secretary of the Treasury then over the money that is in custody of the Treasurer? Precisely what Mr. Taney has since, and no more and no less.

"The Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of the Department, never has the possession or custody of any part of the public moneys, (except in cases hereafter specified.) And the possession or custody of the Treasurer is, as already stated, exercised through the banks."

Thus guarded was, and thus guarded is, the public treasure. The report contains also an analysis of the duties of the respective officers of the Department. I will confine my reading to the duties of the Secretary and Treasurer.

"The Secretary of the Treasury superintends the collection, and receipt, and the disbursements of public moneys. In consequence of this, all authority for transferring them from one public agent to another, or for the final disbursement of them, originates with him. He directs the drawing of moneys into the Treasury and regulates the time, manner, and circumstances, subject to the sanctions prescribed by law; and judges, exclusively, of the other officers of the Department, when, and what disbursements are to be made, subject nevertheless to the check, of the Comptroller, who, in countersigning warrants, is jointly responsible with him for their being conformable to appropriations made by law; and to the further check and settlement of the accounts of all persons to whom he may have caused advances of public money by the Auditor and Comptroller. All warrants for the payment of money into the Treasury, or for payment of money out of the Treasury, are first signed by him. It is also his duty to decide on the forms of keeping all public accounts."

Such are the duties of the Secretary. Now, sir, to those of the Treasurer:

"The Treasurer keeps and disburses the moneys of the United States. All his receipts and disbursements are sanctioned by warrants, of the description already given—as incident to these duties he draws, under the direction of the Secretary, all bills which are drawn for public money arising from sources foreign or domestic; which bills, as already mentioned, are always registered, or entered and countersigned by the Register."

From this accurate account of the duties of the Secretary and Treasurer, it is apparent that nothing has been done by Mr. Taney which is not in strict conformity with the views of the committee of 1794. They say, in a subsequent part of their report, 'a succinct idea of the duties of the officers of the Treasury, so far as respects the disposition of the public moneys, and in regard to the settlement of public accounts, may be obtained by considering the Secretary of the Treasury as responsible for the issuing of proper directions for the transferring and disposal of all moneys, in the first instance, and that no expenditure be made except in pursuance of appropriations; the Treasurer as the sole agent for the disposal of moneys once placed in the Treasury; the Comptroller as responsible that no warrant shall be countersigned, for which there is not an existing appropriation, and jointly with the Auditor, that no illegal or improper charges shall be admitted in the settlement of the accounts. The responsibility to the Register is, that the records be truly made, and the accounts and vouchers carefully preserved."

These are still the respective duties of the officers of the Treasury, with some improvements for additional security. The present Secretary has done no more, claims power to do no more, than was deemed the duty of his office by the committee of 1794. Money in the banks is placed by his warrant to the credit of the Treasurer, and is then in the Treasury of the United States; money in the banks in the Treasury is transferred by his warrant to another bank, and placed to the credit of the Treasurer, and is and was in either and in transitu still in the Treasury, intangible for disbursement or use unless previously appropriated by law. This subject was again agitated in 1801, and a reference made to the great accuracy of the details of the report of 1794. The committee, Mr. Otis, chairman, says, "that the Department is so organized by law, and the mode of doing business so devised, as to afford the most perfect security to the nation for the misapplication of the public moneys. These moneys do not, in any instance, pass through the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; he merely authorizes the receipts and disbursements by warrants in favor of and upon the Treasurer; those warrants are issued by the Secretary and countersigned by the Comptroller, and registered by the Register."

"All moneys received by the Treasurer are deposited by him in the Bank of the United States, and other banks; and the actual amount of money in the custody of the Treasury may be at any time ascertained, independently of his own returns, by the statements which are constantly made and communicated to the Secretary, by those who collect and receive public moneys into their custody in the different ports of the Union." One would suppose, Mr. President, from the tone and language of honorable representatives, of the President of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, that there was no longer safety to the public moneys; no longer modes used to prevent misapplication; that now money did, or could by possibility, pass through the hands of the Secretary. Yet all remains as it did, the duties of the respective officers, and their mutual checks upon each other, described as they are in the report of 1794 and 1801, with minute precision.

May I be pardoned, sir, from respect to the peculiar position of the Secretary of the Treasury, for turning aside from the question before us, to vindicate him for giving us an argument in answer to the call for documents? I found in the current of research, a report made in 1793, February 4th, in answer to resolutions of inquiry directed to the head of the Treasury Department, Colonel Hamilton. Hear what he ventured to say, and said without reproach:

"The resolutions to which I am to answer were not moved without a pretty copious display of the reasons on which they were founded. These reasons are before the public, through the channel of the press. They are of a nature to excite attention; to beget alarm; to inspire doubts. Deductions of a very extraordinary complexion may, without forcing the sense, be drawn from them. I feel it incumbent on me to meet the suggestions which have been thrown out with decision and explicitness. And while I hope I shall let fall nothing inconsistent with that cordial and unqualified respect which I feel for the House of Representatives; while I acquiesce in the sufficiency of the motives that induced on their part the giving a prompt and free course to the investigation proposed, I cannot but resolve to treat the subject with a freedom which is due to truth, and to the consciousness of a pure zeal for the public interest." Mr. Hamilton gives at length the explanation sought, and concludes: "is it not truly matter of regret, that so formal an explanation, on such a point, should have been made requisite? Could no personal inquiry, of either of the officers concerned, have superseded the necessity of calling the attention of the House of Representatives to an appearance in truth so little significant? Was it seriously supposable that there could be any real difficulty in explaining that appearance when the very disclosure of it proceeded from a voluntary act of the head of this Department?"

Such, sir, was the language of a man of high sensibility, jealous of his reputation, to a call of the House of Representatives. The temper it displays had better have been subdued. Its display does not diminish our respect for the author. That it was displayed without reproof, will go far to reconcile those disposed to complain of Mr. Taney's calm and manly argument. To return to the questions before the Senate. The two reports to which I have referred were made during the administration of General Washington and Mr. Adams. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury in directing the places where deposits should be made was exercised in the same manner and to a like extent under Mr. Jefferson's administration, when Congress determined not to re-charter the Bank of the United States. Mr. Gallatin did precisely what has been done by Mr. Taney; he directed deposits to be made in the State banks. His report in answer to a call made in the House of Representatives, 13th January, 1812, now lies before me; gentlemen will find it in the 2d vol. of Finance, 6th of American State Papers. Mr. Gallatin selected the banks; and prescribed the terms upon which the deposits should be received and held. He exercised this power without question or reproach. No one seems to have considered that there was any dangerous encroachment upon the duties of the Treasurer, or any usurpation, any exertion of undelegated powers; it was reserved for the acuteness of the present day to make these important discoveries. I have already adverted to the notices taken in Congress of the action of the Treasury Department during the administration of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe. Mr. Rush, who was at the head of the Department during the Presidency of Mr. John Q. Adams, is known to hold the same opinion on this subject that governed all his predecessors. Within the period of time from 1789 to 1832, the Government deposits have varied from three to fifty millions of dollars per annum; and yet with these vast sums to transfer from bank to bank at his discretion, not even a suggestion was made that the Secretary of the Treasury was exercising a dangerous control over the public treasure. Are we insensible, or were our predecessors too insensible, to the consequences of permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to change the place for safely and conveniently keeping our money? One thing cannot be disputed, that the accusation against the present Secretary for assuming a new, unheard-of, and monstrous power, is as singular as it is unjust.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] who last addressed the Senate, imputes the present distress and the present pressure in the money market, to the shock given to public confidence by the violation of the chartered rights of the bank. Let us examine, Mr. President, the violations enumerated by him. The first on his list is the correspondence of the Chief Magistrate with the Government directors. The honorable Senator alleges that by the charter the private accounts of individuals are sacred, and that this provision has been disregarded in the secret investigation required by the President of the directors made by them for his use. In point of fact, there is a mistake fatal to the gentleman's conclusion. No secret investigation was made by the Government directors, nor was a secret investigation required by the President. The President called on those gentlemen for information resting on their personal knowledge of facts of whose existence there had been rumor. To comply with this call, the directors made an open investigation, an investigation known to all their brethren of the board. The only thing concealed was the use intended to be made by them of the facts discovered by their research. This was concealed, from an apprehension that the disclosure would shut them out from the means of further information. An apprehension but too well founded, as was shown as soon as their purpose was made known to the board. Where does the gentleman find any prohibition in the charter to the examination or disclosure of the accounts of individuals with the bank, by any of the directors? The Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to examine the bank books, is forbidden to look into private accounts; but this prohibition does not extend to the examinations made by Congress, nor to any the Chief Magistrate may choose to institute for the execution of their respective trusts. Directors must examine into the private accounts of all in order to do their duties to the institution. It is true that there is an understood obligation not to injure individuals by disclosing the condition of their affairs with the institution, but this is subordinate to higher obligations to the institution and to the public. By a clause in the charter this higher obligation is recognised. If debts are created beyond a limited amount, without a previous authority by law of the United States, a personal liability is incurred by the directors; those who were not present or who being present dissented when this extended debt was contracted, are exempted from this liability—if within a limited time the fact is made known to the President of the United States and to the stockholders at a general meeting, which they have power to call for that purpose. Why, sir, every stockholder has a right to know how the affairs of the institution are conducted, and any director has a right to disclose to the stockholders, in mass or in detail, the transactions of the board in the instances of favoritism or imprudence in granting accommodations to individuals. It would be very strange if the directors of the Government have not the right to state to Congress, when in session, or to the President when Congress is not in session, as the constitutional representatives of the great stockholders, the United States, the general or the particular mismanagement of the funds put under their care. The President is authorized to order a scire facias in the event of misconduct in the bank justifying a forfeiture of the charter—so is Congress. Congress have power to order an investigation by a committee. The President has no specific authority as to the mode of acquiring information. What is he to do? Is he to proceed on vague or uncertain rumors, or newspaper publications, publications in the public journals, notoriously deceptive in the impressions they are calculated to produce, publications in which falsehood is made to look like truth by artful concealments and studied mis-statements, in which the truth itself is deformed and sometimes made odious by disgusting exaggeration? His only resource is the Government directors; they were created for that among other purposes, and have not mistaken their true character when they considered it part of their duty to give the Executive information. It is deeply to be regretted, Mr. President, that gentlemen of acknowledged private worth and high literary attainments should stand to each other in the relation in which now stand the Government directors and the other directors of the United States Bank. I will not unbraid the directors appointed by the stockholders, but I will endeavor to show that the gentlemen appointed by the President and Senate have not mistaken their true character in the institution.

They claim to be Government officers—guardians of the public interest, to prevent any and every violation of the duties of the bank by their influence at the board, and by giving notice to the constituted authorities. Appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, what can they be, if they are not Government officers? Mere representatives of stock they are not; for their appointment and continuance does not depend upon the stock held by Government. If it is sold under an act of Congress the Government directors are still to be appointed, and still to perform duties at the board—not as the representatives of the stock of Government, for that has passed into the hands of individuals, who are entitled to vote upon it according to the number of shares held by each—but as the representatives of Government, for Government purposes. Now, sir, what purposes can Government have for these directors, if it is not to watch over the conduct of the bank, and, in the event of dangerous or improper practices, to make the immediate disclosure of them, that injury may not be inflicted on the country? I speak confidently, on personal knowledge, when I say, that if the Government directors are mistaken in their estimate of their duties and powers, that mistake has been common to all the advocates and opposers of the introduction of them into the bank. Mr. Dallas, in his project for a bank in 1816, proposed the appointment of five out of the twenty-five directors by the President and Senate, one of the five Government directors was to be chosen by the twenty-five directors, as president of the institution. The Directors of the mother bank were to choose thirteen directors for each branch, one of them was to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, as president of each branch bank. The committee who reported the bill to charter the present bank, adopted only the first provision—the appointment of five directors, one of whom was to be president of the bank. In the House of Representatives, a motion was made to strike out the provision for the appointment of the president of the bank from the five Government directors. By the acquiescence of the chairman, [Mr. CALHOUN,] the motion succeeded. A motion was then made to limit the President in the appointment of the directors, obliging him to take not more than three from the same place of residence; and that, too, by the consent of the chairman, succeeded. Both these amendments were resisted by the friends of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, particularly warned the chairman that he might, in vainly striving to conciliate the opponents of the bill, render it obnoxious to its friends. For some years, indeed until after the appointment of Mr. Biddle, the president of the bank was always appointed from the Government directors. He himself would not probably have been chosen, but for his occupying the place of Government director. He subsequently resigned, being chosen by the stockholders, and the resignation was supposed to have been made with a view to strengthen the Government at the board. The opponents of any Government control in the direction of the bank were not satisfied with these amendments, and a proposition was made to strike the whole provision from the bill. In the discussion of this amendment the true character of the officers was described. By one party they were represented as guardians of the public interest; as watchmen to awaken the sleepers when danger occurred; as sentinels on high towers to look out and warn us of approaching peril. By the other party they were called informers, inquisitors, spies on the Napoleon plan, paid by the bank which they were set to watch, and not by Government, for whom they were watching. So highly imposing was esteemed their power, and important their duty, that a member from South Carolina, Mr. Mayrant, proposed an amendment, forbidding them to negotiate loans with the bank; and, as a compensation for this inhibition, to give them a salary of $3000 per annum each: a proposition, which, although rejected, had a respectable support. As late as the year 1830 the same opinion was entertained of the character of these officers, and an attempt made to carry them into the branches of the United States Bank. By the second section of a bill reported in the House of Representatives, to renew the bank charter in 1830, the President was to have been authorized to appoint a director in each branch bank of the United States, as he now appoints five in the mother bank. The committee, by their chairman, Mr. McDuffie, say in their report—

“The authority given to the President of the United States to appoint one of the directors of each of the branches rests upon the same principle with the existing authority to appoint a portion of the directors of the mother bank.” They state explicitly what that principle is. “It may be a matter of great convenience and utility to have a sentinel to give notice of any irregularities or abuses that may creep into the direction of the several branches.”

Sentinels in the branches, as well as in the mother bank, to give notice of irregularities or abuses! Give notice to whom? Certainly to the Government of the United States through the President, or to Congress. I think, sir, with this current of testimony, I may assume that the chartered rights of the bank have not been infringed by any misapprehension of the character and duties of the Government directors, either by themselves or by the Chief Magistrate.

The next violation charged as to the Executive, is in the assumption of judicial powers, in the infliction of punishment upon the bank for offences for which specific penalties are prescribed, without the investigation of facts before an impartial jury. Here again the honorable Senator has committed several important mistakes. The deposits were not removed to punish the bank for any past offences, nor on a charge of crime. To prevent a continued misuse of the public treasure, the Secretary alleges they might rightfully have been taken away, but they were taken away because the bank will expire in 1836. The specific, prescribed penalties in the charter, are not exclusive but cumulative penalties upon the directors for mismanagement or for offences, for all consequences of which the bank is also liable. To mention one, the directors are liable to a heavy fine for lending money to a foreign Government without being previously authorized by act of Congress. Suppose a loan to a foreign Government on the eve of war with the United States. Will the gentleman pretend that the public deposits should be permitted by the Secretary to remain in the bank and trust to the recovery of the penalties from the individual directors?

I imagine, sir, that the Senator himself would in that event, if in the Treasury, think it his first duty to wrest the money of the nation from the vaults of the institution

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

before the close of that day on which he should obtain knowledge of the fact. Strange as it may seem, this part of the charter has been overlooked by the bank. It is not long since it advanced $600,000 to a foreign Government, Great Britain, to meet its engagement with the United States for the settlement of the dispute about deported slaves under the last treaty of peace. No wrong was intended, and the transaction was one of convenience to the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and I should not have adverted to it but for the excuse given here for the failure of the bank to meet the payment of the bill drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury on France, founded on the same clause in the charter. We see, sir, that when a foreign Government was concerned, this clause was not thought of, but when our own is alone concerned, the penalty is referred to as the justification of the conduct of the present administrators of the bank. But the Senator represents the President as bent on vengeance against the establishment, and yet shrinking from a jury trial. Where has the President discovered a desire to abridge the bank of a portion of its allotted time. If governed by a spirit of hostility, the simple order and issue of a scire facias, even should it have failed to destroy the institution, would have been deeply injurious to its credit, far more fatal than the removal of any amount of deposits the Government has ever made in the bank. Does the Senator imagine that plausible ground for a scire facias does not exist. The fact that less than seven directors do all the important business of the institution is now not denied, but justified; if it were denied it would be established to the satisfaction of any jury not previously sworn to decide according to an ordinance. Now this fact, by the recorded opinion of a man who holds in his hand a larger portion of the judicial authority of the country than any man ever did or probably ever will hold, works a forfeiture of the charter.*

If the Chief Magistrate could possibly be governed by such feelings as those imputed to him, he might find ample excuse for their indulgence. The consequences of these alleged violations of chartered rights are foretold: a recharter of the bank is to grow out of them; the bleeding unconstitutional bank is to be made the instrument of willing leaders; it is to be upheld, in despite of Executive hostility, and borne aloft in triumph, only because the present President wishes to trample it down. Two honorable members of this body are pointed out as capable of again bridling the President. These are new checks and balances in our system—two Senators to balance—no, not to balance—to control the Executive. How, sir? By controlling the legislature. Admitting the vast authority of the two here, what assurance has the honorable Senator that their joint power can control the other branch of the legislature? Does it extend beyond the capitol? The President is to be bridled; the people saddled with the bank. Now if the revelation was a little further extended, it would save a great deal of painful and worrying speculation. Who is to occupy the vacant seat? That, perhaps, is not yet settled; we shall see in the fulness of time.

But what does the Senator mean by saying that the united influence which he invokes, bridled the President in a late perilous crisis? Can he suppose that the famous compromise was forced upon the Chief Magistrate? Does he imagine that the force bill was necessary to reconcile the President, by its sweet and inebriating flavor, to the bill for altering the tariff? Those of the Senator's friends who were here, might have informed him that this union of the force bill and the tariff was necessary to secure the faithful adherence of their new allies of the higher tariff school. The President unwilling to see a compromise of the vexed question! Why, sir, if he had lifted his finger; if he had employed one imprudent and reckless man in South Carolina, or given one rash order, compromise would have been impossible. How profound must be the ignorance of the people of South Carolina on this subject, when their highly gifted Senator, with his vast opportunities to obtain correct and accurate information, is thus strangely misinformed!

That the President was unable by his influence to induce many of his friends of the high tariff school to aid in the reduction of duties is certainly true, and that their attachment to their own principles and to the known wishes of their constituents was greater than their devotion to the President. This is no crime, I trust, either in the President or his friends. But, sir, let us look into the official, responsible course of the President, and his formal recommendations with regard to the tariff. In his first message he called the attention of Congress to it, and recommended modifications. He earnestly repeated this recommendation in 1830. In his annual message preceding the election he urged the subject upon us with extreme solicitude. Listen to what he pressed upon Congress:

"The confidence with which the extinguishment of the national debt may be anticipated, presents an opportunity for carrying into effect more fully the policy in relation to import duties which has been recommended in my former messages. A modification of the tariff which shall produce a reduction of our revenue to the wants of the Government, and an adjustment of the duties upon imports, with a view to equal justice in relation to all our national interests, and to the counteraction of foreign policy, so far as it may be injurious to those interests, is deemed to be one of the principal objects which demand the attention of the present Congress."

On this ground the President stood before the people pending the election, while the Senator from Kentucky, whose praises are now emphatically pronounced, maintained on this floor that "between the points of the preservation of the system" (of protection) "and its absolute repeal, there was no principle of union." Insisted that it should be preserved "in full vigor," and charged the Executive with sending to Congress, "through the Secretary of the Treasury, a tariff bill which would have destroyed numerous branches of our domestic industry and led to the sure destruction of all." At the session of Congress succeeding the election, the President, true to his trust and to his principles, once more brought the subject before Congress in these terms: "Long and patient reflection has strengthened opinions I have heretofore expressed to Congress on this subject, and I deem it my duty on the present occasion again to urge them upon the attention of the legislature. The soundest maxims of public policy and the principles upon which our republican institutions are founded recommend a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure which shall be limited to

*Mr. SPRAGUE having denied in debate that such opinion was expressed by Judge Marshall, Mr. FORSYTH read the following extract in a subsequent stage of the debate.

BANK U. S. vs. DANDRIDGE—12 Wheaton, p. 109.
Chief Justice Marshall's opinion.

[EXTRACT.]

"The 4th rule of the fundamental articles provides, that not less than seven directors, of whom the President, or some person deputed by him, shall be one, shall constitute a board for the transaction of business; but there is no clause in the charter requiring a board. Can it be pretended that not less than seven directors may make a board, and yet, that the directors may act without being assembled as a board? Congress has not thought it necessary to forbid their acting otherwise than as a board, because the whole law of corporations forbids it.

"In the event of making unlawful loans, the directors are made personally responsible; but those are exempted who were absent, or who dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contrived or created.

"No clause in the charter directs that loans shall be created only by writing. The bond of the debtor may be said to be sufficient. Yet this clause is obviously drawn in the idea that all the proceedings on the subject would necessarily be in writing. The absentees and dissentients are excused. How is this absence or dissent to be proved? Is it to depend on vague and uncertain memory?"

what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient service."

The value of these recommendations, none of the friends of the Senator from South Carolina will dispute; we have their importance stamped by the high authority of the convention of his State. They say, in the report on which the repeal of the ordinance is founded: "Great as must be the advantages of these reductions, they are small in comparison with the distinct recognition, in the same bill, of two great principles which we deem of inestimable value—that the duties shall be eventually brought down to the revenue standard," &c. &c. And "that no more money shall be raised than shall be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." The Convention omitted to state to the people of South Carolina from whence these inestimable recognitions sprung—perhaps not aware that the flattering expressions which had been forced into the bill of compromise, were torn from the context of the President's messages, and adopted as the best salvo for the abandonment of the positions which had been taken by their leaders.

Of the effect of these repeated recommendations and of the action of the Executive I will show by reference to the movements and declarations of the great advocate of the protective system. He accused the Southern politicians of an attempt to strangle the manufactures of the country—the Executive of an attempt to administer slow poison. After being partially beaten in 1832, he saw in perspective the utter ruin of his favorite policy, and with the adroitness of an able tactician, seized upon the means of postponing the hour of defeat. Why did he not, sir, to give tranquillity to the country, unite with the administration in the bills before Congress, reported to settle the vexed question? Because he could make better terms with the adversary. I will not do that honorable Senator injustice by attempting to give the substance of his address to the Senate when I can quote his own words. He said:

"Mr. President, I want to be perfectly understood as to the motives which have prompted me to this measure. I repeat what I said on the introduction of it, that they are, first, to preserve the manufacturing interest, and, secondly, to quiet the country. I believe the American system is in the greatest danger; and I believe it can be placed on a better and safer foundation at this session than the next. I heard with surprise my friend from Massachusetts say that nothing had occurred within the last six months to increase its hazard. I entreat him to review that opinion. Is it correct? Is the issue of numerous elections, including that of the highest officer of the Government, nothing? Is the explicit recommendation of that officer in his message at the opening of the session sustained as he is by a recent triumphant election, nothing? Is the introduction of a bill into the House of Representatives, during this session, sanctioned by the head of the Treasury and the administration, prostrating the greater part of the manufacturers of the country, nothing?"

Is it not apparent from these remarks that the aid of the honorable Senator and his friends in the arrangement of the compromise would not have been obtained, had not the recommendations of the President been made, and had not all the then recent political events convinced him that those recommendations would in a short time be carried into full effect by Congress.

That no doubt may rest on this point, I ask indulgence while I read another extract from the same source:

"It is well known that a majority of the dominant party is adverse to the tariff. There are many honorable exceptions—the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] among them. But for the other party, the tariff would have been long since sacrificed. Now let us look at the composition of the two branches of the Congress of the next session. In this body we lose three friends of the protective policy, without being sure of gaining one. Here, judging from appearances, we shall be at the next session in a minority. In the House it is notorious that there is a considerable accession to the number of the dominant party. How then, I ask, is the system to be sustained against numbers; against the whole weight of the administration—against the united South—and against the increased impending danger of civil war."

He anticipated also the action of the Executive and of Congress at the ensuing session. "The President, in his opening message, will urge that justice, as he terms it, be done to the South, and that the burden imposed upon it by the tariff be removed. The whole weight of the administration, the united South, and majorities of the dominant party in both branches of Congress, will be found in active co-operation. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me how we are to save the tariff against this united and irresistible force." Well, sir, did the honorable Senator play his part? Skilfully did he avail himself of the false position of South Carolina to effect this great purpose of saving, from approaching shipwreck, his favorite system. In the views which he presented of the probable fate of the tariff I entirely concurred. Nevertheless he had my aid in the passage of the bill of compromise, I knew I was doing present and prospective injustice to my constituents, but I acted under duress. I gave my aid to one great evil to avert the greatest of all evils—civil war. How imminent the danger, let the condition of the adverse parties in Charleston, the fairest of our Southern cities, attest. With passions inflamed to madness, they watched each other. Friends, cordial and familiar friends a few years since, met in the market place with the stern courtesy of predetermined hostility. Every man looked upon the ground on which he trod as the probable scene of a bloody contest. Arms and ammunition were prepared, organization complete—the array ready to be made. They stood like gladiators, stripped on the arena, with foot advanced, looks of proud defiance, hand on glave, kindling eyes, waiting the expected signal to bare their blades and rush with the fury of unchained tigers at each other's throats. And who were to be the leaders in this deadly strife? The Hamiltons, and the Haynes, and the Pinckneys, and the Rutledges, and the Draytons, and the Hugers, and the Middletons, and the Poinsetts, and the Pettigrews—men whose sires, shoulder to shoulder, had stood the blunt of revolutionary battle, cemented with their blood our Independence, raised up by the wisdom of their councils this mighty fabric of Government, which secures the happiness of millions of freemen, while its blessed influence is circulating like the sun-light over the darkness of the whole earth. Sons worthy of such sires—illustrious by their moral and intellectual worth, who had performed all their duties in peace and war; had emblazoned their names in deathless characters on the fairest pages of our history. These were the men who were about to present to a pitying and astonished world, the heart-withering spectacle of patriots' swords dyed in civil conflict with patriots' blood. It was not the will of the Omnipotent that another bloody sacrifice should be made to atone for the sins of the people—as the price of the precious blessings bestowed by his bounty. The cup of bitterness, humiliation, and woe, passed untasted from our lips. Would it thus have passed, if that despised, reprobated, villified, hated, but just and stern old man, had not occupied the house and the hearts of the people!

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, transmitting copies of the official orders of the Department for the transfer of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; a copy of the official bond of the Treasurer of the United States, and copies of some of the checks or drafts, for making the transfers, and stating that it was not in the power of the Department to furnish copies of all the drafts, or all the papers, called for by the resolution.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it was at his suggestion that the call had been made on the Secretary of the Treasury, which was answered by the report just read. The Secretary, however, seemed to have misunderstood the call, and had given a report more extensive than was necessary for any purpose he had contemplated. As Mr. W. did not think it necessary to print the whole of this voluminous document, he moved to lay it, for the present, on the table; which motion was adopted.

WEST INDIA TRADE.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, presenting in detail a statement of the American and foreign tonnage employed in the trade between the United States and the British and foreign West India ports, and the British North American Colonies, to the year ending in September 1883; together with the value of the exports from the United States to those ports.

Mr. SPRAGUE observed, that this report was in answer to a resolution submitted by his colleague, [Mr. SUMNER,] some time since, and adopted when he was unfortunately absent from the Senate, and, therefore, he did not hear the remarks which accompanied the presentation of the resolution. He had seen the statement presented by that gentleman, and he asked the attention of the Senate, while he commented briefly on it, together with the facts presented by the report just read; and he congratulated himself, and the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, that his colleague had turned his attention to the subject. He [Mr. S.] had full confidence that they would agree as to the facts and deductions that were to be deduced therefrom. From the beginning of this Government—nay, anterior to the establishment of the constitution—the subject of the carrying trade between the United States and the West Indies was considered one of deep interest to this country; and, up to the year 1830, a diplomatic and legislative controversy had been carried on between the two countries, the object of which, on both sides, was to secure to itself the advantage of tonnage to be employed in that trade.

Great Britain had always been desirous to procure the products of the United States for her West India Islands. Their situation, and the peculiarity of their productions, was such, as to render our own productions essential—he had almost said—to their existence, but certainly to the prosperity of those islands. The object that the British had always in view, was to procure the transportation of those articles to the West Indies in British vessels. The object of the United States, was to secure to themselves a fair participation in the carrying trade, and to avail themselves of the advantages which their local and geographical situation gave them, united with their superior skill in navigation, so that their shipping should have the transportation of the produce of the United States to the West India islands. That was the whole object, the whole aim of the controversy, as it was carried out from the beginning to the end. What were the expedients that the British resorted to from time to time? And let any gentleman look to the correspondence and diplomacy on the subject, with this key, and it would appear as plain and clear as daylight, that the entire object of the British was to secure to themselves the whole of the carrying trade. The whole of their efforts were directed to that end—not to prevent our produce from being carried there. They wanted it; but wished to get it in their own vessels. It would be seen in their proposition, that there was a list of articles, which articles might be carried to the North American provinces free of duty, but not to the West Indies. Why was that? It was that our vessels might carry the produce they required, across the line, a hundred rods, in order that British vessels should take it from thence to Jamaica, Barbadoes, or any other of their islands. They were willing that we should carry it across the line, and give it a circuitous direction, if the United States would consent to allow them to take the produce, in British vessels, from one port to another—our vessels not being permitted to trade with the colonies.

Look at the result of the arrangement which has been made on the subject-matter of the controversy. What, he would ask, were the deductions made from the statement the other day? It was, that the British had always desired to have our produce carried in their vessels. As to the effects on the tonnage interests of the northern cities, they were clear, and such as must have reasonably been anticipated. The arrangement, as soon as it was made, was known to be a surrender of the matter in dispute on the part of the United States. It was so considered by Mr. Herries, in the British Parliament. He said that the United States had made an unconditional surrender of her pretensions, which she had got up in relation to that claim, and our own minister at the court of St. James, when he received the act of Congress of 1830, said that, according to his construction of it, on which he acted, it unequivocally surrendered all the claims that had ever interfered with the objects of the British.

Upon these two concurrent authorities, the British themselves and the Minister of the United States, we had surrendered the matter in controversy, and he, (Mr. S.) supposed there would be very little diversity of opinion on the subject—certainly not among those who understood it. Taking the statements which had been presented, presuming them to be perfectly accurate—(for he had not had an opportunity to look into them)—and keeping in view the object of the British, let gentlemen look and see whether in effect the trade has not been diverted, and whether it is a direct trade now with regard to exports.

From the statement, it would be seen, that the exports to all the West Indies are less now, and have been less since the arrangement, than in several years before, say in 1823, '4, '5, '6, '7, and '8; that the exports in the aggregate, to all the West Indies, for the two years since the arrangement in 1830, are less than those of any two years before 1830 in the whole term embraced by the statement; that the exports to the British West Indies are less now than they were in 1826; that the exports to the British North American Colonies are more now, and have been every year since the arrangement, than they ever were before. For instance, the exports were now $4,425,185, and before the arrangement the highest amount was $3,830,674. Thus the direct trade was less since the arrangement, and the circuitous trade was far greater than it ever had been before. Having said this much as to the exports, he would now proceed to the tonnage.—The American tonnage in the trade to all the West Indies for the two years since the arrangement in 1830, has been less during any two years prior to 1830; while the foreign tonnage, in the same trade, has been, during the same two years since 1830, much greater—nearly three times as much as in any two years prior to that time, and the American tonnage to the British West Indies has been less, each year, since the arrangement, than in several years anterior, viz. 1823, '4, '5, '6. The foreign tonnage, in the same trade, has been greater every year since the arrangement than it ever was before; and has, during the last year, been nearly three times as much as in any year prior to the arrangement.

The American tonnage to the British American colonies was in 1831 and 1832, less than in some prior years, but in 1833 it was greater than ever before, while the foreign tonnage in the same trade was never, prior to the year 1830, more than 12,023 tons, but in 1831, was 94,776; in 1832, was 108,671, and in 1833 was 297,953; being more than twenty times as much in 1833 as ever it was before. He wished the Senate to recollect this last mentioned fact. The statements he had made, on a former occasion, were confirmed by the report just received—for it would be seen, that prior to the arrangement, the British tonnage employed in the trade to the British West India islands, and British North American colonies, was not equal to one-tenth of the American, but since, had actually risen to an equal amount. Before the arrangement we had always more than nine-tenths of the carrying trade; but since we have but about one half. But even this does not exhibit the actual advantages gained by the British, because a great proportion, more than three-fourths of the tonnage we have employed to the North American colonies, just cross our lines, and thence the British vessel takes the cargoes to the West Indies, having the benefits of the long voyage in transporting even those articles which our vessels convey in the first instance from our ports. In the statements presented, no notice was taken of the exports of foreign produce, which British vessels alone can take, in direct violation of our statute of 1829.

Mr. SHEPLEY said that, on a former occasion, he had sufficiently explained why the American tonnage employed in the British West India trade had been lessened, and the foreign increased. That is, British vessels were not permitted to enter our ports prior to the arrangement; and American vessels performed not a foreign voyage, for they only went across the line, where their cargoes were received by the British vessels. In fact, we had lost nothing by the arrangement; for the same business was done now, as then, only in a different form. We had one advantage, however; we were relieved from paying the fees which the British vessels paid on entering our ports. In the District of Passamaquoddy, the foreign tonnage amounted to 9,760 tons, while the whole of that of the United States engaged in that trade was 247,000. Our West India trade was gradually and constantly increasing. It had risen from $2,000 to $1,800,000, showing that we were now repairing the losses incurred when the trade was suspended. If the arrangement was permitted to go on, the trade would continue to improve.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, the results as to Passamaquoddy were such as might have been reasonably anticipated. But he would assert that, even deducting the 97,000 of foreign tonnage at Passamaquoddy, still, that in the ports of the United States was more than ten times as much. In 1830, the British trade was entirely occluded. We were engaged in a controversy, we proceeded to battle for the points in dispute, and finally succumbed, yielded all we had claimed, and then boasted that we had gained a great diplomatic victory, because we are not in the situation we were in while the trade was wholly suspended.

Mr. KNIGHT said: Mr. President, one word on the subject in controversy. Who, sir, are our competitors in this trade? With whom, in fact, do we compete? We, of the United States, composed of thirteen millions of people, well skilled in the arts of trade, navigation, and commerce—we who publicly declare we are ready and willing to compete with the whole world, on the fair principle of reciprocity, are now contending, with all our strength, with the province of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia for this trade, and, it is admitted, a large portion is carried on by these provinces—that they are the carriers of our productions to the British West Indies, and elsewhere, to the exclusion of employment to our navigation. If we look to the items of this trade, it will be seen, that we send to the Northern colonies pot and pearl-ashes, lumber, pork, flour, rye, and India meal. That these are not consumed in these provinces, but are re-shipped to the West Indies, or other places, for consumption, is evident, on the examination of what we receive in pay for them. We receive from the Northern colonies, molasses, sugar, salt, and spirits, in payment of our productions. How do they obtain these? Does Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick make sugar, molasses, or rum—or much salt? No, sir, these are not the growth or productions of their soil. They obtain them from the West Indies with the productions carried out by them—they have the carrying both ways—they carry our productions to the West Indies, and bring back the West India productions to us. And this is the benefit to our navigation, and this is the way we are benefited by the arrangement and discriminating duties.

Mr. SILSBEE said that it was with difficulty that he could restrain himself from going fully into the subject, but he would not do it. Still he felt himself urged to say a word or two in answer to the Senator from Maine, on his left, [Mr. SHELLEY.] He went on to state that the carrying trade, which had been formerly a source of great profit to the United States, if not entirely taken away from us, was leaving us very fast. The gentleman from Maine, on his right, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] had clearly expounded the cause of this loss of the carrying trade. It was only necessary to take a brief glance at the subject to understand why the carrying trade had been thus lost, and why it could never be brought back. He then showed that the duties imposed on flour, lumber, &c., by the British Government, imported direct, were so great as to preclude all possibility of a participation, on our part, in the carrying trade. He took the articles of staves, shingles, flour, beef and pork, which had employed no less than 64,000 tons in a year, and the duties on which amounted to $1,071,000, a sum equal to the entire cost of the cargoes. He asked how it was possible that, with such enormous duties burdening the direct trade, any prospect could remain that we should again get the carrying trade into our hands.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, he would only state one fact. There had been only 222 tons of British tonnage cleared out of the whole of the New England ports during the last year.

The communication was then referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Removal of the Deposits, when

Mr. FORSYTH resumed his observations in defence of the report and the act, as given heretofore entire; when he concluded,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

After the reception of sundry memorials, and the transaction of some other business—

Mr. WILKINS rose, and said he had received that morning, by mail, two petitions from citizens of his State, with a request to present them to the Senate. He would observe that the first petition, in his opinion, related to a matter of such delicacy, that he would have avoided its presentation, could he possibly have done so. His opinions, he said, on the subject of slavery, were well known; nevertheless, he was at all times unwilling to obtrude his opinions, in a matter of such delicacy, without some strong and valid reasons for so doing. The petitions, he continued, were couched in the most respectful language, and, though they admit that Congress had no right to interfere with subjects of slavery in the States, they prayed for its abolition in the District of Columbia, where they believed Congress possessed the power to legislate. On a subject so delicate, [Mr. WILKINS said,] he could only pursue the course which had been taken in similar cases, and moved the reference of the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia. This motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINS said he also held in his hand a petition which touched on the great subject now agitating Congress and the whole nation. This petition was signed by his own neighbors and immediate constituents, and he believed had been produced by an observation which fell from him on the other day, relative to the causes of the present distress of the country. In the meeting which had been held at Pittsburg—and, he was willing to confess, numerously attended, by a large portion of his constituents—there was a resolution passed which, in some measure, bore upon him, in consequence of having used the expression to which he now referred. Out of the proceedings of that meeting, grew the petition he now held in his hand, and which he would presently present. The proceedings represented that he was mistaken in the declaration which he had made, and that it was received in his [Mr. W.'s] own town with much regret and very great astonishment. They ascribed the distress prevailing in the Western country, to a considerable extent, to the removal of the deposits. He did not know that the petition spoke actually that distress now prevailed in the Western country, but it rather referred to the alarm and consternation that had arisen, and pointed to the distress which would inevitably hereafter take place, owing to the removal of the deposits. It is referred particularly to the breaking up entirely of the internal Western exchanges, and attributed the cause particularly to the interruption of the commercial business of that country, and of the entire Western waters, to the removal of the deposits.

Notwithstanding the declarations of that meeting, and notwithstanding the facts alleged in the petition, Mr. W. did not acquiesce in the opinion, that distress did exist in the Western part of the country, to which he now particularly referred. He admitted that the transactions of the internal commerce of the country, and that which prevailed to a vast extent on the Western waters, had been interrupted, and our merchants exposed to very considerable inconvenience by a measure adopted by the Bank of the United States, in consequence of the removal of the deposits. But his constituents were entirely mistaken when they ascribed the interruptions and inconvenience now attending the internal exchanges of their country, to the removal of the deposits.

His friends—for such he might well call them—although they were his political opponents, were entirely under a wrong impression; and he should be glad to make a single observation, which he wished to be made known to his constituents, to show them that they are laboring under a material mistake. It was not owing to the removal of the deposits. There was a resolution passed by the United States Bank almost two months before this event, and it was that which had caused the breaking up of the exchanges of the Western country. It was in consequence of a rumor that the public deposits were to be transferred from the bank, that this resolution of the 13th of August was passed, almost two months preceding the removal of the deposits. It was a voluntary and an unnecessary act, on the part of the bank, long preceding the removal of the deposits, which broke up almost entirely the internal Western exchange.

Let his constituents recollect that the bank, in consequence of the vested capital, and it being spread all over the country by means of its branches, had the internal exchanges of the country in its own hands; and by a single stroke of the pen, within its banking-house, the act was accomplished.

The internal Western exchanges was dissolved on the 13th of August, which was three or four months before the public deposits were removed at New Orleans. These mistakes were perfectly natural, and would happen when a few gentlemen undertake, in the long room at a public tavern, to settle great constitutional questions. This meeting had given its opinion on the subject of the removal of the deposits, concerning which much had already been said on this floor, and a great deal yet remained to be said on both sides. The resolutions introduced by the Senator from Kentucky were complicated in their character, and required great deliberation upon their nature and tendency. Yet, here was a committee of a few individuals, appointed by a public meeting, retiring into a bar room, and, after remaining absent about five minutes, bringing in a decided report on the subject. The consequence was, that two blunders had been committed. One of these had been already exposed; the other was that which appeared in the second resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and which asserts that there was no authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the deposits, and that he has assumed a power which did not belong to him. If this language had been applied to the President, it might have been used with some plausibility. But when it is asserted that the Secretary had no authority, it was as great a mistake as the reference of the breaking up of the Western internal trade to the removal of the deposits.

He must say that there was no distress in the Western part of the country. All the banks were firm, and their notes were all at par. He wished gentlemen to look at the prices of flour, grain, and all other agricultural products; to look at the prices of manufactured articles, and, above all, at the prices of real estate in Pittsburg, since the removal of the deposits. Real estate had reached, since the 1st of August, the highest prices which it had ever obtained since the French and the Indians desolated that part of the country. He felt the deepest mortification when he found such a people as those of the West, attributing their prosperity or adversity to such a cause as the transfer of the deposits from one bank to another. Their prosperity stood on a far different foundation. It depended on their industry, their skill, and their enterprise. Their capital was to be found in their factories, their steam power, their fuel, and their raw material, which was to be found at the door of every factory in the country. This was a capital of which no bank could deprive these people. He would ask of them to rely on their own industry, skill, and enterprise, and their own good character, which would place them above the control of any moneyed institution.

There was another fact to which he desired to make a reference, before he introduced the motion he intended to make, and it was one in which, as Pennsylvanians, the signers of this memorial were deeply interested. He had observed the other day, in the quotations of the prices of the public stocks, the Ohio State given at 112, while the Pennsylvania State was quoted at 101. Why, was there the difference between the prices of these stocks? It was a quotation from a paper in Philadelphia, where the United States Bank stands, where there resided a number of brokers, who had an interest in depreciating the Pennsylvania stock. And why was Pennsylvania, by her own citizens, to be thrown into such a position? Ohio stock 112, while Pennsylvania stock was only 101! These stocks stood on precisely the same footing, bore the like interest, and were in every respect

Public Distress.—Removal of the Deposits.

the same in character. Yet there was this difference in the quotations. How was this difference to be accounted for? Might it not be reasonably ascribed to a combination between the bank and the Philadelphia brokers, for the purpose of depreciating this stock, because Pennsylvania was at this moment debatable ground, and it was considered of great importance to operate on the Pennsylvania legislature? He did not say that it was so, but he asked if it was not reasonable to suppose that it might be so.

He thanked the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] for the interest he had taken in the prosperity of Pennsylvania; that Senator had made some allusions to her situation. Now, he could assure the gentleman from Massachusetts, that Pennsylvania will still go on in the advancement of the great system of internal improvement. She would not stop short in her great works. No combination would have the power to arrest her progress, until she should have accomplished her ultimate object of depriving the empire State of New York of all the carrying trade of the West. To this great point, Pennsylvania was rapidly advancing, and, under the wise administration of her State Government, she would not stop short of its accomplishment. She was engaged in an honorable rivalry with the empire State of New York, for the rich dowry of the Western trade, and she would not stop until she should have obtained the rich treasure.

He concluded with moving that the memorial be read, and printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. The memorial having been read—

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he was not in his place when the honorable gentleman began his remarks on presenting this memorial. He came to his seat only in season to hear the gentleman say, that there was no distress; and to hear, of course, his subsequent remarks. These remarks, Mr. WEBSTER thought, deserved some notice. Here is a memorial averring the existence, at Pittsburg, of a very severe degree of pecuniary distress; it is admitted to be signed by very respectable persons, and its list of signers is certainly a long one. All these persons declare, under their names, and on their veracity, that much distress does exist. The honorable Senator declares that no distress exists. Now, sir, when the patient declares that he feels not only pain but agony, and the doctor says he is perfectly well and that it is not possible he should feel any pain at all, one of two things must be true, either the patient is insane, or the practitioner not skilful. This point ought to be examined. Are the statements of these gentlemen unworthy of credit, or are they true? I propose to say a few words, sir, on this subject; but as I propose to occupy a few moments, this morning, with another subject, and as it is not material whether this memorial be referred this morning, I will propose that it lie on the table and be printed, and will call it up whenever there shall seem to be a fit opportunity.

The motion to lay on the table and print the memorial was then agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of Archibald Small had been ordered to a third reading. He stated that he had been absent when this bill was before the Senate, and that it had been his intention to take the sense of the Senate on the principle which was contained in the bill, which was one that he could not support.

Mr. EWING rose and moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, with a view to proceed to the Special Order, but he withdrew his motion; and

Mr. POINDEXTER, with the understanding that the bill should not be called up, on its third reading, during his absence, withdrew his motion for reconsideration.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits; when

Mr. SPRAGUE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: It is in vain that gentlemen attempt to escape from the issue now presented. It is in vain that they endeavor to make it a question of the renewal of the charter of the bank. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. FORSTER] commenced with that declaration, and proceeded in his own speech conclusively to disprove it, by declaring himself in favor of a renewal of the charter, and arguing long and eloquently in support of the removal of the deposits. It is not a question of the renewal of the charter; it is not a question of the restoration of the deposits; for any one may vote against both, and yet condemn this new stretch of Executive power. It is a broad and fundamental question of the distribution of the powers of this Government among its co-ordinate branches; a question in which, as Mr. Jefferson has profoundly remarked, is involved the existence and preservation of liberty.

What has been done? The act which more immediately gives rise to this discussion is called "the removal of the deposits;" a name, which, to most minds, carries a very inadequate idea of the thing. Permit me briefly to describe it. The Congress of the United States, the supreme legislative power of the nation, created an artificial person for the sole purpose of constituting and continuing it the fiscal agent of Government; they having no power, and pretending to no right, to bring it into existence, or continue its being for any other object. This agency was to consist in its receiving, retaining and distributing the public moneys, and regulating, by its influence and connexion with the Government, the currency of the country. The Executive has removed this agent from office, and appointed another in his stead. The former was created, guided, regulated, controlled, restrained, and governed by known and fixed laws; subject to visitation by committees of Congress; bound to make frequent reports which Congress could reach; and liable to have its existence terminated upon process to be ordered by Congress, if it should transcend the law of its being. The latter is the mere creature of Executive will; appointed by him to do what he commands, to abstain from what he forbids; removable by him, governed by no law but his pleasure; subject to no visitation by Congress; bound by no statute to make any returns or expositions of its doings. This agent, so appointed, is to have in its possession the average amount of six millions of public money, to be used or loaned at pleasure, for its own benefit; is to receive and disburse annually more than twenty millions of the public revenue; to have the use of its notes indefinitely increased, by constituting them the circulating medium of the country, so far as the influence of the Treasury can accomplish that purpose. The treasure and strength thus acquired, and the banking capital upon which it is ingrafted, may be dispensed in purchases and disbursements, in loans and discounts, in facilities, accommodations and indulgences to friends and partisans, to contractors or officers, to central committees or separate agents, for speculation and stock-jobbing; or to swell political funds, direct political action, and consolidate and enlarge political influence.

This fiscal agency is indispensable. It may change forms, but it is incapable of annihilation. It is inherent and co-exists with civilized communities; without it, our Government never has had, and never can have, life, motion, or being. It is represented as a dangerous, a terrific power. Shall it be under the control of Congress; limited, restrained, and surrounded by fixed laws? or shall it be left to the sole, unguided, ungoverned, undefined will of one man? Its union with banking capital has conjured up in the friends of the administration the most terrific images of terror and alarm, even when bound down by fixed legislation, and in the keeping of Congress; have they no fears when it is united with three times as much banking capital, under the sole control, and at the mere arbitrary will of one man? This great and alarming power is now to be added to what, in all free Governments, in all ages, has been the most dangerous and alarming of all powers—a single Executive chief. This great monopoly, as it is called, is to be united with the greatest of all monopolies in human society—a single Executive. The Bank of the United States has been represented by all sorts of hideous metaphors and comparisons. It is a mammoth—a wild beast to be slain, lest it should rend us in pieces, although encaged and chained by the bolts and bars of law; and in its stead the President is to let loose upon us a whole caravan of wild beasts, ready to flesh their teeth in any victim; and of which he is to be the sole keeper. It is unconstitutional for Congress to have one bank, but not for the President to affiliate, adopt, and control a hundred!

This measure, momentous as it is in itself, is of still more portentous import when viewed in its connexion as part of a system, as the last only of a series of acts all running in the same direction, swelling the same current of patronage, and accumulating power in one great and all-absorbing reservoir. It was not the tea tax merely against which our fathers took up arms. Read the Declaration of Independence—it is not even mentioned as one of the causes of the Revolution. It was the form only in which a principle was imbedded; the last of a train of measures for establishing unlimited dominion.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVAS] compelled, by the overwhelming testimony which is borne upon every breeze, to admit that there is wide-spread distress in the community, warned us not to mistake the symptoms for the disease. His advice is wise and scientific; for when a limb is convulsed from internal agony, to tie it down and keep it motionless can yield no relief. What then is the disease? The gentleman thinks it is found in that newly-discovered source of all the ills that flesh is heir to, that "monstrum horrendum ingens, informe," the United States Bank.

Sir, there is a much deeper, more inveterate, and all-pervading disease; one which is felt in every fibre, and distorts every feature of the body politic; which penetrates the walls of this capitol, and, even here, mingles in our debates, and infects our legislation; which, like the insect curses of Egypt, enters even our dwellings, our bed-chambers, and our kneading-troughs, poisoning the very atmosphere with a political miasma—it is the disease of PRESIDENT-MAKING.

And this has a cause—a deep, abiding, growing, aggravating cause.

Why is it that the experience of mankind has pronounced an elective monarchy the worst form of Government on earth? Is it not that a crown is too splendid a prize to be won or lost by peaceful contests of elections? And is not the Presidency becoming so brilliant an object as to dazzle the eyes of aspirants, and its patronage so powerful a stimulant as to inflame, nay, to infuriate the passions of friends and partisans? Does not the successful candidate and all his official dependants, from the first moment of his investiture with the robes of office, look to the succession? Are not the political elements constantly agitated? The lashing waves are not permitted to subside, before another storm lowers in the horizon. And is there not danger that contest will succeed contest, convulsion follow convulsion, until the people, the honest, single-hearted, disinterested people, disgusted and exhausted by the endless repetition of fruitless conflicts, will retire from the arena, and leave the great machine of government in the hands of needy, hungry, and profligate political adventurers? Is there not danger, when the all-pervading disease is becoming more and more inveterate, when the importance and the patronage of the Chief Magistrate is rapidly increasing? From the birth-day of our constitution the march of Executive power has been onward. The course of legislative action has often been arrested; judicial decisions have been questioned and denied; but the enlargement of Executive prerogative has never been stayed. No power which it has once exercised, no claim of power once advanced, has ever been yielded or wrested from its grasp. Its precedents are tracks to the lion's den, from which there are no returning traces. Do you want proof? The examples are before us even in this debate. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVAS] held up the decision of 1789, in favor of a constructive power of removal from office in the President, as conclusive authority, at the moment he was denying any weight to the decision of 1791, in favor of the right of Congress to incorporate a bank. And what renders it not the less remarkable is, that the first, giving a constructive Executive power, was made by the casting vote of the then Vice President, the elder Adams, to whose political opinions the gentleman accords so little deference as to the rights of other co-ordinate branches. He cited Mr. Madison's example when it tended to countenance the prerogative of the President to arrest the legislation of Congress, but denied the same authority when it sustained the right of the national legislature in relation to this very charter, which was approved by that great man himself.

Let us look at things as they exist. Was there ever a period when the United States Government was as strong as now?—when there was so little ability in the States, or other extrinsic bodies, to withstand the united co-operating action of all its departments? Ask the most zealous, devoted friends of State rights, they will tell you, they have told you, that these rights are prostrate at the feet of the General Government, and exist only at its mercy.

Was there ever a time when Congress was so weak? when the judiciary was so weak? when the Executive was so strong—by any comparison so strong as now? Was there ever a time when the balance and just distribution of practical power was so utterly destroyed?

Let us not be deluded by names and theories; but, like men, practical men, engaged in the affairs of a great nation, let us have the courage to look at the actual workings of this great machine of Government, and see results as they are coming upon us. Is it not true, in this republican country, where one man should be nothing, and the community every thing, that it has come to pass that the community is nothing, and one man is every thing? Do we not feel, and know, that the destinies of this nation are, at this moment, in the hands of a single individual? Is it not matter of boast, boasted of here, and that, too, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. R.,] that a single individual has produced, and is carrying on, a revolution in our Government?—ay, sir, a revolution, in which the gentleman exultingly told us that the will and policy of the nation, as to internal improvements, had been resisted and defeated by one man!—in which the great system of American industry, built up and consolidated by the interests and feelings of a vast majority of the people, has been prostrated by the will of one man!—in which the Bank, strong as it was in its own energies and the unlimited confidence of the community, has been struck down by the same iron hand, and is crumbling into dust? and he might have added, in which the wishes and rights of a large majority of the States, and their citizens, as to the disposition of our vast national domain, have also been arrested, baffled, and defeated, by the same uncontrolled power of one man.

And yet the gentleman talks of democracy, and claims to be a republican! Do we not know that the policy, the systems, and the institutions which that single power has struck down, might, had it been his will, have been now standing and flourishing in the greatest vigor? Do we not feel that a single individual at this moment holds the institutions of our country in the hollow of his hand? that should he choose to lay it, in wrath, upon the navy of the United States, he would submerge it beneath the waves, leaving scarce a trace of its existence, save the reflection of its former glory? that even the judiciary would be palsied in his grasp? Who does not remember when some two years since, it was supposed that a judgment of the Supreme Court, in relation to the Cherokees, would conflict with his will, that the whole partisan press, and all the partisan corps, were rallying to a deadly assault upon that august tribunal and its venerable head?

How is it at this moment? Is not this whole nation becoming agonized in every fibre, at the tones of his single voice? He has spoken—and the currency—the life-blood of the country, is curdling in the veins of this whole republic. His breath is spreading blasting and mildew over this fair and happy land, shrouding its bright and beaming surface in darkness, gloom, and dismay.

Let us revert for a moment to the past. Has not the present Chief Magistrate made large encroachments upon the authority of the other co-ordinate branches, and unwarrantably increased and extended his own?

How has he used that tremendous instrument—the veto power, which was transplanted into our constitution from the prerogatives of the British king, but which the spirit of English liberty would not tolerate in modern times; and the monarch, who should dare to exert it there, as freely as does our republican President here, would, as we are well assured, hazard more than his throne?

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RYAN,] in searching for precedents to justify its exercise by the present Chief Magistrate, was driven back more than one hundred and forty years for the last example in British history, to the reign of William III, who, he told us, was brought in by the whigs, and exerted his prerogative for popular rights. The gentleman has not been as felicitous as usual in his historical recollections. True it is, in the revolution of 1668, William was brought in by the friends of liberty. But how did he use the power thus generously conferred? The historian answers in these emphatic words:

“Success, which ever enlarges the noble mind, shrunk William’s to all the littleness of vulgar character. When raised to imperial dignity by the efforts of the whigs, for the generous purpose of enlarging and securing liberty, he abandoned his benefactors, and entered into dishonest intrigues with the Tories, in order to increase the influence and extend the power of the crown.”

The gentleman spoke of a faction in the Lords; he did not explain himself; but if his remark had any significance, permit me to remind him, upon the authority of the same historian, the faction which existed in the Lords was a Tory faction, with which William united himself to enlarge the prerogatives of the crown.

When the veto power was about to be incorporated into our constitution, it encountered strong opposition; it was distasteful to the American public. What was the argument urged to assuage their fears? We have it here in this book, the Federalist, in a number written by Alexander Hamilton, while the constitution was before the people for their adoption.

He told them that “A king of Great Britain, with all his train of sovereign attributes, and with all the influence he draws from a thousand sources, would, at this day, hesitate to put a negative upon the joint resolution of the Houses of Parliament.” And again: “If a magistrate so powerful and so well fortified as a British monarch, would have scruples about the exercise of the power under consideration, how much greater caution may be reasonably expected in a President of the United States, clothed for the short period of four years with the Executive authority of a Government wholly and purely republican?”

It was an a fortiori argument from the long abuse of this prerogative of the British crown. He said further, that the primary object in giving to the President the possibility of using this negative was self-preservation; to enable him to resist encroachments upon the Executive and preserve the just constitutional distribution of power.

The fears of the people were thus allayed, and upon these arguments the veto was given. How has it been used? During the first twenty years it was exercised, I believe, but once or twice: it had subsequently some unnoticed growth in the hands of Mr. Madison; but, by the present Chief Magistrate, in less than five years, it has been exercised more freely and on more important occasions than during the whole forty years of all his predecessors. Memory at once presents some of them; the Maysville road bill, the Washington turnpike bill, the light-house bill, the Louisville and Portland canal bill, the bank bill, the harbor bill, the land bill, and even the bill allowing interest to certain States upon moneys paid by them for the United States during the last war—a measure of justice which, with the approbation of the President, had been previously extended to South Carolina, but which he chose to negative, upon his own views of mere expediency, without pretence of constitutional objection; claiming and exercising the right to control and reject the measures of Congress upon any occasion, and for any cause, as his views of policy might dictate! And this is republicanism!!! Sir, the federal doctrine of that ultra-federalist, Alexander Hamilton, as to this Executive prerogative, is, in comparison with the practice of this self-styled democratic administration, as milk and water to aquafortis. That which was intended to be the “extreme medicine” of the constitution, “has come to be its daily bread.”

But suppose Congress, notwithstanding the potency of Executive influence, should pass the land bill, or the improvement bill, by more than two-thirds of both branches, it would then become a law—so says the constitution—but so does not say Andrew Jackson. He has put forth a new prerogative, by which all laws are subject to his supervision. He is to support the constitution “as he understands it.” Constructions by his predecessors, constructions by Congress, constructions by the Judiciary, have, upon him, no binding obligation; and, if they do not quadrate with his constitutional notions, need not be carried into execution.

And this is not a naked theory. He has practised upon it, not only in the vetoes where the doctrine is imbedded, but in his refusal to carry into effect solemn and sacred treaty stipulations—treaties which had been established as the supreme law by the constitution itself, and been recognised and enforced from the first moment of its adoption; treaties formed by every preceding President, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and both the Adamses, ratified by every Senate, confirmed in appropriations by every House of Representatives, and sanctioned by the continued acquiescence of the whole nation for forty years. He has practised upon it in refusing to execute the Indian intercourse act of 1802, approved by Mr. Jefferson, and enforced by him and all his successors.

Pause—contemplate the magnitude of this assumption. Our Government was designed to have three great co-ordinate branches; the legislative to enact, the judiciary to interpret, the Executive to enforce; and neither to trench upon the province of the other. But the President now sets himself up as supreme judge over both the other departments, to review their decrees, and rejudge their judgments. We may make solemn legislative enactments, and what can we do with them?—enter them on record in the Secretary’s office. The courts may pass their solemn judgments, and what further can they do? record them in the office of their clerk. But both are as lifeless as the dead parchment upon which they are enrolled, unless the Executive shall impart vitality and energy by carrying them into action. But, by this new prerogative, he may leave the whole or any part to eternal silence and oblivion. He has only to say to his marshals, or other inferior officers, Execute no law or process upon pain of instant removal, and it is done. The whole statute book is at his mercy. Sir, a dispensing power like this is denied to a British king by the very first article of the bill of rights of William and Mary; and magna charta, that nearest approach to a written constitution in England, is not and cannot be subjected to royal interpretation. I say this upon the authority of a book now before me. Long and dire experience has there taught them that if a single Executive be permitted to give construction to laws and constitutions, to become the interpreter of his own powers—there will soon be no other powers in the kingdom, and no constitution but his will.

A king of England or France, who should at this day disregard the acts of the legislature or the decrees of the judiciary, would not only shake their thrones to their foundations, but might soon behold in their stead the bloody scaffolds of Louis and of Charles! Shall a republican President have prerogative over both?

There is one new device for the extension of Presidential power, so anomalous and extraordinary, that it is difficult to classify or characterize it. It may, perhaps, be denominated the splitting veto, or partial dispensation; by which, as in the case of the Michigan road bill, in 1831, the President, when an act of Congress is presented, accompanies his approval with an explanatory message, (by way of rider,) limiting and restraining its meaning and import; thus, in effect, approving in part and vetoing in part; whereby a precedent is established, by which, should it have its natural growth, if an appropriation bill were to be accompanied with conditions and limitations, he might accept the agreeable portion which gave the money, and reject obnoxious restrictions upon its use.

Is it not true—disastrously true—that the same hand now grasps the sword and the purse of the nation? now controls the army, the navy, and the treasury? We are told that the President only determines where our treasure shall be kept, and who shall have the custody; he has only power, by his single will, of placing the whole or any part of the public moneys in the hands of any corporation, or any individual, or any number of individuals, at any time or any place, upon any condition that may suit his pleasure; that if a military expedition or other purpose were in contemplation, he might make the Paymaster General, the Commissary General, the Fourth Auditor, or any other officer, agent, or partisan, the depository of the public moneys!

Sir, the man who should abstract the contents of your pocket and put them into his own, would only change the place of deposit.

But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] tells us there is no danger, because the President cannot raise money. Did the gentleman forget that permanent revenue laws already exist, that the streams now flow into the Treasury from a perennial source, to be intercepted only by new acts of legislation, which the veto power stands ready to suppress? But the President cannot raise money—so says the Senator from Virginia, so says the constitution—Congress and Congress only, is to lay imposts and “borrow money.” But within the last year the Chief Magistrate by one of his Departments, for which, as his friends all admit, he is responsible, whose acts are his acts, has borrowed four hundred thousand dollars! And if that sum may be borrowed for the Post Office, without law, why may not four millions be borrowed for the Treasury, or forty millions for the army?

The fathers of the constitution, well knowing that a single Executive had in all ages been dangerous to liberty, intended to erect around him a firm and impassable barrier in the Senate of the United States; and especially by the requisition of their concurrence in appointments to office.

But ingenuity has found means to evade and nullify this inconvenient restraint. The President may temporarily fill vacancies which happen in the recess, by commissions, to expire at the end of the next session.

Two implications have been found sufficient to accomplish the object. The President, by removal, may cause a vacancy to happen in the recess, which he may fill until the end of the next session of the Senate, and then the vacancy, which commences with the recess, is construed to be one happening in it, to be again filled by the President until the end of another session, when the same process may be repeated. Has this been done? I will not dwell upon the notorious case of Indian agents—nominated—rejected—and subsequently continued in the discharge of the same official functions! I will not pause upon the recall and appointment of foreign ministers. I proceed at once to the case of Samuel Gwinn, who was appointed in the recess to a land office in Mississippi; nominated at the next session and rejected; renominated, that the Senate might reconsider their vote, which the Senate declined, and laid the nomination upon the table, from a well known determination not to approve it. The session expired and—he was forthwith reappointed to the same office!! This precedent has but to be followed out, and the power of the Senate over appointments is annihilated. Suppose the present Secretary of the Treasury, (I put the case only by way of illustration,) who has been appointed in the recess, should be nominated and rejected; he will retain his first appointment until the session shall close, and then may be instantly reappointed and continued in office in defiance and contempt of the Senate?

It was once supposed that in the discharge of our high constitutional duties as advisers of the President, we were free agents, having the right to form and express opinions for ourselves. In this behalf we some time since placed upon our own records, as a guide to our own conduct, an opinion in relation to appointments. We had the temerity to say, that, in our judgment, it is inexpedient that persons living in one State should be appointed to offices in another, without manifest necessity; and thereupon the President comes here by his message, and tells us that we have no right to express such an opinion! that it is unconstitutional!! He lectures the Senate upon its rights and duties, declaring that until they shall reverse their judgment he will make no more nominations to certain offices. The resolution was rescinded by the vote of seventeen members, late at night, when twenty-six only were present.

But the action of the Senate is not now in accordance with Presidential will; and for this it is announced in the official organ that it is committing suicide. We see and feel the fearful array that is attempting to accomplish the predicted destruction. The storm of calumny and violence is raging upon us, because, true to the purpose of our being, we have dared to resist Executive encroachment. We may be prostrated; but if we are, the best hopes of the human race will be extinguished. Liberty herself will perish in the fall. Her last shriek will echo from the ruins of the Senate.

But we are told, and it is constantly reiterated in our ears, that in all these assumptions and claims of prerogative, the President is sustained by the people.

It is time that we come to an understanding—a full understanding upon this important matter. The people are the fountain of all power; they are politically omnipotent. They can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. But they cannot have moral incompatibilities. Omnipotent as they are, they cannot have an elective monarchy and a constitutional republic at the same time. Let it then be distinctly understood, that these two tremendous powers, the Executive and the people, cannot meet, and in their coming together, crush the legislature, the judiciary, and the Senate between them, and still leave a constitutional republic. It was such a meeting that crushed the Senate and the liberties of ancient Rome, and placed the blood-stained Cæsar upon the throne. It was such a meeting that extinguished the legislative assembly, and annihilated the hopes of republican France, and elevated Bonaparte to imperial power. We have been admonished, warned, if not threatened here, in this debate, that if we bow not to Executive will, we shall be driven from this Hall by ruffian force, as Cromwell expelled the Rump Parliament! Let us, then—let the people then, understand the catastrophe that is predicted. If it be their will to prostrate the constitution of their country, they can do it—they can do it. But, sir, it is not their deliberate will—no, no, no.

The people love their constitution, their liberties, and themselves. They are always politically honest, for political honesty desires the greatest good of the greatest number; they are the greatest number, and must desire their own greatest good. But they are not infallible. I should be false to all history, false to human nature, false to holy writ, if I could so flatter the people as to tell them that they were exempt from that great besetting sin, a proneness to idolatry. It is of the nature of man to worship the work of his own hands, to bow down to idols which they have set up. Feeble, fallible mortals like themselves are canonized and deified. And oftentimes a military chieftain, having wrought real or fancied deliverance by successful battles—fervent gratitude, unbounded admiration, the best feelings of our nature, rush towards him; the excited imagination invests him with a glorious halo, circling around him all the splendid perfections and dazzling attributes of heroes and patriots,—and then the strongest facts, the clearest evidence, and the most cogent reasoning, which expose his errors or ambition, excite only indignation and resentment towards their authors, as impious and sacrilegious revilers of the idol of their hearts. In the paroxysm of their devotion, they are ready at his shrine to sacrifice their rights, their liberties, their children, and themselves.

Such are the delusions which have placed the iron sceptre in the hands of the Cæsars and Bonapartes of past ages, and overwhelmed or jeopardized all the free Governments of the earth.

So strong is this proclivity of our species, that if there were to be a Government sent directly from Heaven, we may reverently fear that it would endanger its continuance. If there were one to be, did I say? There has been: theocracy of the Jews, whose history presents the most melancholy examples of this deadly sin. And is there not in this, our American Israel, which has been delivered from the house of bondage, guided through the wilderness, and is now in the land of promise—an idol chief to whom our incense and our homage is demanded? Thank Heaven, there is a remnant still unsubdued and undismayed; there are those, even here, who have not bowed, and will not bow the knee to Baal.

Sir, this delusion will vanish; the morning will dawn upon us; the people, the honest, the pure-minded people, will awake—awake as from a dream—and look back upon these scenes as on the troubled visions of the night.

The delusion will be dissipated. But are not the priests of party intent, while its influence may yet prevail, upon settling the succession and securing the continuance of the dynasty? And is it not apparent, that this is to be accomplished by means of an army, not of soldiers with swords and bayonets, but of partisans—organized, officered, and disciplined; with its legions and cohorts; with its captains of hundreds and captains of fifties; its drill-sergeants and file-leaders; where no private judgments, no individuality, is tolerated, but all are to move en masse, to march and countermarch, to wheel and change front at the word of command; where there is but one principle of action; one all-pervading sentiment—devotion to the chief.

This army must be subsisted—must be sustained, either by present pay or hopes of future spoils. The people's treasury, that great trust-fund collected from all, to be dispensed for the benefit of all, is to be seized upon; and all the streams issuing from it in salaries, contracts, jobs, and agencies, are to be diverted to the use of the party. Public offices instituted for the benefit of all, are declared to be legitimate spoils. In appointing the thousands of officers whose names are in this book,* scattered throughout the country, drawing millions annually from the pockets of the people, what is the test and criterion of merit? Not what he has done for the country, but what he has done for me? Not, will he be useful to the public; but will he be useful to us? Not, will he be faithful to the constitution; but will he be faithful to the party?

Since the political victory of 1828, the vultures have been screaming over the battle field, and "even the cries of the widows and the orphan" could not scare them from their prey. A spirit of proscription, for opinion's sake, scarcely paralleled in the annals of free Governments, has swept in terror over the land, prostrating the purest and the best, breaking down the independent, bending the feeble, and leaving the timid, like trembling slaves, to eat their bread in fear. Veteran soldiers of the revolution have been sacrificed for daring to exercise the freedom for which they fought! Officers of the late war, republicans of '98, patriots at all times, have been punished for daring, in a republican country, to breathe the language of freemen.

Where is Melville, the last of that gallant band, who, with the courage of Daniel of old, dared first to beard the British lion? That band who entered the British ships in the harbor of Boston, and cast the obnoxious tea upon the waters? Melville—who served in the army of the revolution, and, through all periods, was a pure patriot and undeviating republican? He held an humble office, conferred upon him by Washington, which in a green old age, he was daily discharging with delight to himself and to the gratification of others; which he cherished, which was dear to his heart as the pledge of his country's gratitude; it was rudely wrested from him; he was thrust from the public service to make place for a partisan successor. Where is Harrison—the republican soldier of Tippecanoe? Cook—the friend and compatriot of Washington? Gerry, the son of that early and revered patriot of the revolution, who once, as the second officer in the Government, filled the chair which you now occupy, and whose dust reposes in the cemetery within our view? When that fervent friend of liberty, at the formation of the constitution, and in the debate of '89, raised his prophetic warnings and solemn protestations against the enlargement of Executive power, and especially this control over public officers—little—little could he have imagined that his own widowed wife and fatherless children were so soon to feel its withering grasp. His death left his family penniless. An office in the customs was bestowed upon the son by President Monroe, with the tacit understanding that the income should be devoted to the support of his mother and sisters. It was performed with scrupulous fidelity until he was no longer permitted to continue that sacred office of filial and fraternal ministration. He was superseded by an accepted partisan.

Where is Fillebrown, also the son of a soldier of the revolution, a fearless and undeviating republican, whose only offence was, that, in 1824 and 1828, being an elector of President and Vice President, he did not give his vote for the present incumbent? The sin of the father was visited upon the son, who held a subordinate office here, upon which his family depended for subsistence, and whose duties he had discharged with devoted ability. He was ignominiously driven from it, branded with the foul charge of peculation; and, that his detection might be trumpeted as one of the achievements of reform, was daily held on high to the scorn and detestation of the public, pierced with ten thousand arrows of calumny. Humble and powerless, he had no refuge but a jury of his country. To that tribunal he appealed, and their verdict not only repelled the foul aspersions upon his name, but declared that the Government actually owed him some hundred dollars at the moment of his removal.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PAXSON] asked why did not the President go to a jury against the bank? Send the President to the tribunals! He went there with Filibrown, and again in the case of Nourse, again to find his charge of peculation repelled, and stamped with reprobation as unfounded and unjust. Go to the tribunals with the recollection of the case of Watkins still uneffaced! Watkins, who, having expiated his offences, great as they were, by suffering the sentence of the law, as a criminal, was subsequently confined in close jail for years merely for debt due to the Government; during which time a youthful son, in holy ministration to the loneliness of the father, in the gloom and vapors of a prison, withered, sunk, and died;—but no beam of hope radiated from Executive mercy! He remained incarcerated until the highest judicial tribunal pronounced the imprisonment illegal. The captive was set free, but ere he had passed yonder gates, before he had reached the expecting arms of his trembling wife, he was again seized, and, by an illegal process from unsated power, reconsigned to the same prison!!—From which he was again delivered by a judicial tribunal. And Randolph, too, still more recently arrested and consigned to prison by an illegal Executive warrant, was liberated by the judiciary, set free by the concurring decisions of a Barbour and a Marshall—Marshall—a name which will be venerated and admired so long as there shall be a votary of liberty and intellect upon earth. And with this new decree still tingling in his ears, ask the President to go to the tribunals against the bank! No—no. He must have a shorter and a surer road to his object.

Pardon me this unexpected digression. I recur to the subject of removals. I ask the Senate to recollect how this power has grown up. Its history is one of the most instructive lessons of the progress of prerogative. It is now where found among the express grants of the constitution; and when that instrument was proposed to the people, they were told, ex cathedra, by the highest authority—the numbers of the Federalist—that it would not be possessed by the President alone; that as appointments could be made only with the approbation of the Senate, the same concurrence would be necessary to effect a removal. The constitution was thereupon adopted. In the Congress first held under it came on the celebrated debate of 1789, in which, by the aid of implication, it was decided by the casting vote of the elder Adams, then Vice President of the United States, that the power belonged to the President alone. This claim was, at one time, feebly attempted to be sustained as belonging necessarily to the Chief Executive; but the doctrine, now so prevalent, that we are to go abroad to foreign writers for definitions of Executive power, and then confer all upon the First Magistrate that is not expressly forbidden him, had not then found favor. It was then known that the Executive power, mentioned in the constitution, was that which is therein defined and conferred. And the only clause from which it was at last contended that such a right of removal could be extracted was that which requires the President “to see the laws faithfully executed;” and for that end, and that alone, was it contended that it could ever be legitimately exercised.

That debate should be read and pondered well by every lover of freedom. The warning voices of Gerry, White, and Sherman, were raised in vain. They declared, to use the language of the American Tacitus, that “in the power over all the Executive officers, proposed to be conferred on the President, the most alarming dangers to liberty were perceived. It was in the nature of monarchical prerogative, and would convert them into the mere tools and creatures of his will. A dependance so servile on one individual, would deter men of high and honorable minds from engaging in the public service; and if, contrary to expectation, such men should be brought into office, they would be reduced to the necessity of sacrificing every principle of independence to the will of the Chief Magistrate, or of exposing themselves to the disgrace of being removed from office.”

On the other side were Ames and Sedgwick, Vining and Madison, by whom, in the language of the same high authority, “the danger that a President could ever be found who would remove good men from office was treated as imaginary.” Yes, sir, the predictions that this prerogative would ever be exerted for party purposes, to gratify individual feelings or personal views, were treated as the chimeras of a gloomy imagination. Mr. Madison, the amiable, unsuspecting Madison, declared “that the wanton removal of meritorious officers (by the President) would subject him to impeachment.” “Such abuse of power exceeds my conception.” * * * “My imagination cannot extend to it on any rational principle;” and Mr. Vining declared that, if the President remove a valuable officer, it would be an act of tyranny.

And has it not come upon us? Are not the dark chimeras of 1789 the dread realities of 1833? Are they not here among us, around us, and upon us, seen and heard and felt in terror and oppression? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOXSTON] told us not to be moved by apprehensions now, because those who were alarmed at Executive prerogative, in the early days of the republic, subsequently acknowledged that their fears had not been verified. But if those great and good men, who now sleep with their fathers, had survived to the present day, could they now make the same admission? Would they not declare that the shadows of their most gloomy predictions and darkest forebodings were closing around us in the process of actual realization?

In 1789, this power of removal was, by constructive implication, conceded to the President. How has it been exercised? For the whole period of forty years which preceded this administration, the removal of civil officers, so far as can be ascertained by the public records, amounted to seventy-three only—less than an average of two per annum. During the twelve years of the administrations of Washington and the first Adams, there were twenty-two removals—all, no doubt, with exclusive reference to the faithful execution of the law.

Mr. Jefferson's administration, so far from furnishing an example under which the present can find refuge, is, in truth, in contrast and condemnation of it. Upon his accession, he found all the public offices, almost without exception, in possession of his political opponents. Some of them, especially marshals and attorneys, had rendered themselves odious to the people, by uncalled-for zeal in enforcing the obnoxious sedition law. Others, as in the case to which the celebrated New Haven letter refers, had been commissioned in the last moments of his predecessor, thus depriving him of the appointment. The present incumbent found nearly all the public offices in the hands of his friends. Some became so doubtless from principle, others from calculating selfishness; secure in their places from the forbearance and uprightness of Mr. Adams it was politic to propitiate his opponent by early adhesions. Such men have continued to be safe. There had been no enforcement of odious laws; and instead of appointments, on the eve of his accession, in anticipation of his rights, the executive action had been for months preceding suspended; and, upon the day of his inauguration, there were more offices vacant, the filling of which had been postponed for the purpose of conferring patronage on him, than the whole number of removals by Mr. Jefferson in his eight years. What was that whole number, as exhibited by the records? Thirty-six only, less than five per annum; some for the causes already specified, others for known incompetency or misconduct. Mr. Madison, in eight years, removed five civil officers; Mr. Monroe, nine; and Mr. Adams—the reviled John Quincy Adams—in four years, made two removals; making in the whole number of removals of civil officers, from the adoption of the constitution to the 9th of March, 1829, but seventy-three. And within one year next following, being the first of this administration, there were at least one hundred and ninety-six, if not more than two hundred expulsions—double, nearly three times as many, as during the whole forty years of all his predecessors! And this, too, exclusive of four hundred and ninety removals of postmasters, to which are to be added hundreds of inspectors, clerks, deputy collectors, deputy marshals, secretaries, and other subordinates, swelling the number, doubtless, from fifteen hundred to two thousand in a single year! Nor did the work of proscription stop there; it went on, ever demanding new victims, and is, even now, unseated and unstayed.

This is the promised reform, and thus has the partisan army been recruited, subsisted, and sustained.

There was yet another promise—retrenchment. Retrenchment was the war cry. The extravagance, nay, the abandoned profligacy of Mr. Adams's administration, could no longer be endured; and the people were invoked to rise in their majesty to put it down, and transfer their treasure to other hands to save themselves from its corruption and enormous expenditures. It was done. And what is the result? Compare the expenditures in the two last years of the former and present administrations, exclusive of payments to the public debt.

By Adams, $ 1827, $13,062,316
 $ 1828, 12,653,096

By Jackson, $ 1832, 16,516,389
 $ 1833, 22,086,064

Making a difference of nearly thirteen millions in the aggregate of the respective terms of two years. In addition to which, it is to be borne in mind, that during the former, the system of internal improvements for the public good, consumed large sums, from which the present administration has exempted itself by the use of the veto. If this be deducted, the expenditure, exclusive of the public debt, during the last year of General Jackson's administration, will have been about double that of the last year of Mr. Adams's—the extravagant, profligate, and prostrated administration of Mr. Adams. And in addition to all this, the post office department, which was left by the able and virtuous McLean in vigorous strength and credit, is now feeble, insolvent and deranged; is largely in arrears to contractors; has borrowed four hundred thousand dollars; and is presumed to owe at least a million.

We are told that money is the dynasty of modern states. Money will obtain partisans, and partisans will obtain money. Has not the progress of both kept even pace? The army must be recruited; the party sustained; new hopes inspired; new stimulants applied. Two great resources—the public lands, and the banking capital—still remain: the former peculiarly convenient for certain western and interior States, the latter for a still greater number of middle, northern, and Atlantic. And the South, the South must be content with the idol which they have set up, or live upon abstractions—the past visions of theoretical reform and retrenchment, or new expositions of proclamations. The land bill would have disposed of the proceeds of our immense and magnificent national domain, by a distribution so just and equitable, that it could never have been disturbed; and thus, like the tariff by the compromise bill, it would have been taken from the capital of speculating politicians; it could no longer have been made an element in political combinations.

The land bill was vetoed as unconstitutional, with an Executive recommendation that the price should be immediately reduced, and the whole eventually given to the States where they lie. It was unconstitutional for Congress to divide them among all, but perfectly constitutional, under Executive lead, to bestow them upon a part! It was vetoed, because, as the message informed us, the lands were a common fund, to be disposed of for the benefit of all the States; and yet the President would devise means of making them gratuitous donations to a few only. The old States, by whose blood and treasure they were acquired, could not even participate in the distribution; but the new, which had no existence at the time of their acquisition, might swallow up the whole with the Executive approbation.

The banking capital.—Before proceeding to more recent events, let us pause upon a few reminiscences. When this administration came into power, it was announced that it would “reward its friends and punish its enemies”—a system of reform—that is, of coercion or expulsion, would be vigorously enforced.

The several Executive Departments were at once organized upon this system. The Post Office alone stood aloof—John McLean was at its head. He would not become the instrument of proscription. He was too strong to be broken down, and therefore, against his wishes, was reluctantly transferred to the elevated station which he now so honorably sustains. A successor was found who had no such scruples, whose fraternization was complete; and the whole Department was at once brought to act efficiently in the harsh and discordant system.

The Bank of the United States presented the next obstacle. The President and a majority of the directors were not removable at the pleasure of the Chief Magistrate; but it was hoped that the influence of the Treasury would be sufficient to mould them to its purposes. The attempt was first made through the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the President of a remote branch, the easternmost, save one, because of his political opinions and associations. Mr. Biddle did not acquiesce. He informed the Secretary that the Bank had never interfered with politics; that it was the friend of all administrations; the political instrument of none. The attempt was baffled. And in the next annual message of the Chief Magistrate, the bank itself was for the first time denounced, and a new one, founded upon the revenues of the Government—which means a Treasury bank, under the control of that Department, was recommended. This new project was unequivocally condemned by the Committee of Ways and Means in an able and elaborate report, and found no favor in either House of Congress. Its adoption by the legislature was therefore hopeless. The object, however, was not abandoned by the Executive, but a new mode was sought for its accomplishment, by the transfer of the depositories—in other words, the removal of the bank from its fiscal agency, and the appointment of others under the control of the Treasury. But the only ground upon which it was even then suggested that such removal could be justified, was the insecurity of the public moneys. The President, therefore, in a message to Congress, assailed the bank as unsafe—unsafe, repeats the Secretary of the Treasury—unsafe, re-echoed a distinguished member in the House, unsafe, thundered another, on the floor of the Senate. But members could not be made to believe what was palpably unfounded; and the resolution of insecurity was rejected in the House by a vote of one hundred and nine to forty-six.

[SENATE.]

The purpose of the Executive remained unchanged.

The action of Congress, which seems before to have been necessary, could then be dispensed with. Nay, the opinion of the House, which had been courted, was instantly contemned. The vote passed on Saturday, and on the Monday following the official organ assailed it with the accusation of being under the influence of the bank, and endeavoring "to control the appropriate action of the Treasury Department."

Congress being thus refractory, the object must be accomplished by the President alone. "I take the responsibility" followed.

Mr. McLane could see no justifiable grounds—he was transferred to another department. His successor was equally unbelieving and more uncompromising; he was struck down, and the Executive power strode over him to the Treasury. It was accomplished! A new fiscal agency was established, by league banks, under the control of the treasury. The system of reform was complete. It was done in contempt of Congress, sixty days only before its annual meeting. The President, with military boldness, throws himself in advance; and his friends now mock us with declarations that the legislature may act upon the subject, when it is known that his tremendous veto stands ready to paralyze every effort for restoration. It was accomplished by the power of removal, conferred, by implication, for the sole purpose of seeing the laws faithfully executed. This was the extent even of the federal doctrine in 1789. What law was to be executed requiring the expulsion of Mr. Duane? None—none! The law left it to his fiscal discretion, and when his judgment was exercised the law was executed. But we are told that Congress cannot, by law, vest a discretion which the President may not control; that he has a right, as the Senator from Georgia says, to go into the Auditor's or Comptroller's apartment, and say, Allow this account and reject that, upon pain of instant dismissal; and, of consequence, may go to the commissioners now sitting under the French treaty, order them to admit one claim or reject another; and, if they hesitate, expel them and appoint subservient tools in their stead! All, all, over whom the removing prerogative can be stretched, are merged in a single Executive will. When the judges of England held their offices at the pleasure of the King, he was not permitted, as is well known, to go to the bench and dictate their decisions. Can a doctrine too arbitrary for the British monarchy take root in the soil, and flourish in the air, of this free republic?

The Senator from Georgia informed us that in an opinion delivered by the Chief Justice of the United States, it was declared that the charter of the bank had been violated. But he could not recollect where it was to be found. No wonder—

"For it requirith optics keen,
"To see what is not to be seen."

and it must be a good memory that recollects a fact that never existed. If the gentleman had reference to the dissentient opinion of the Chief Justice in the case of the Bank vs. Dandridge, he will find no such declaration.

But to return. When that important fiscal discretion was vested in the Secretary, was any other officer in contemplation than one of some permanency, and of financial experience and ability, who had passed the ordeal of the Senate? Was it ever imagined that it was to be exercised by a three days' Secretary, a mere locum tenens, brought in during the recess of the Senate, by setting aside and trampling under his more experienced predecessors? Had they ever beheld the pageant of flitting Secretaries passing before their eyes like the phantasmagoria of a magic lantern? Would Congress, would this body, ever have conferred this power upon any officer not expected to be appointed with the concurrence of the Senate? Has there ever been a Secretary who has passed the Senate that would have given the order for the removal? Has there ever been a time when any one could have been confirmed, if it were known that he would give such an order? Yet the people were told, and verily believed, when they adopted this constitution, the concurrence of the Senate in appointments was to be a safe practical barrier against the will of a single Executive; the accidental vacancies only could be filled in the recess, and that temporarily only, for purposes too imminent to bear delay.

As the order was in form, that of the Secretary, he must give his reasons upon compulsion; and that, too, where reasons were not "as plenty as blackberries." The first financial officer removed the great financial agent of the Government, and appointed another in his stead, and yet his means are not financial! As a fiscal measure it seems to be conceded to be utterly indefensible. It depresses the stock of a bank in which we own $7,000,000, to elevate that of which we own nothing. It removes our money from a bank which paid us one-fifth of the interest received upon it, to those who pay us nothing—from one where it was unquestionably safe, to those of at least doubtful security—from where it was ready at any instant for our use, to those who require undefined reasonable notice—from one bound by law, to those only under Executive contract of doubtful validity. It is, in effect, a run upon our own treasury; and changes a currency more sound and uniform than ever before existed in a country of equal extent, to one unsound, fluctuating, and deranged, producing general distress and dismay.

But it is contended that an arbitrary and unlimited discretion was vested in the Secretary. Precedents have been cited. That of Mr. Crawford has already been commented upon by those who have preceded me. Some others, new and extraordinary, have been presented by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Forsyth.] The first is a resolution offered in the House of Representatives, in 1817, never acted upon, and carrying with it no other authority than the unsupported opinion of the mover, who was—the honorable gentleman himself. What was the resolution? That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to withdraw the deposits; directed, not by the President, but by Congress. How this tends to show unlimited power in the Secretary, to the exclusion of Congress, is not easily perceived. The second, was a resolution offered in the House by Mr. Spencer, of New York, but never acted upon. By this, too, the Secretary was ordered to withdraw the deposits upon certain conditions or contingencies. And this, a mere proposition to give a peremptory order by a superior, is cited to maintain the claim of the subordinate Secretary to unlimited and exclusive power. [Mr. Forsyth explained. He had not adduced these precedents to show that Congress had no power, but that the Secretary had. He thought that Congress also possessed the power of removal, and, so far, differed from the Secretary. He added, that he then held in his hand the opinion of the chief justice, to which he had referred, which he had stated to be a dissentient opinion, and in which he understood the chief justice to say that the charter had been violated.] Mr. S. resumed: That is the gentleman's inference; it is not so expressed, and, as I think, is not justly inferred. And if it were, a dissentient opinion would not be a very good index of the views of the tribunal.

I recur to the resolutions. If they were not cited to cover the doctrine of the Secretary, they are of no significance in this discussion. But, taking the gentleman's explanation, how does an order by Congress to an Executive officer to perform a specified service, prove, or tend to prove, that such officer would have authority without such order? Is not the more reasonable inference the exact contrary? Do we not almost every day command, by law or resolution, the performance of acts which would otherwise be wholly unauthorized and illegal?

SENATE.]

The third was that which the Senator introduced with such peculiar emphasis. It is an extract from Mr. McDuffie's report, in 1830, in which he says that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the sanction of Congress, has the power of removing the deposits for various reasons. With the sanction of Congress! And yet it is now contended that no such sanction is necessary; the Secretary's power is sole and exclusive—absolute and uncontrollable.

I pass briefly to the reasons which the Secretary has assigned, not intending to repeat remarks which may have already been presented by others. That which is put forward as the first, and seems to be most relied upon, is, that the bank charter will expire in March, 1836;—it should have been added, having two years thereafter to wind up its concerns. This, the Secretary declares, would of itself be abundant cause even for an earlier removal. Let us consider of this for a moment. Congress creates a fiscal agent, providing for its continuance until 1836; and that of itself, it is said, constitutes a reason for dismissing it in 1833!! I say, created a fiscal agent. That was the only end and object. There was no power to grant the charter for any other purpose. None was even pretended. It was only as a means necessary and convenient to the Government to carry into effect the express powers of raising and disbursing revenue, and regulating the currency. This agency was its essence, its soul, its animating principle, without which it could have neither life nor being. All its faculties were imparted as subsidiary only to this—as the mere machinery necessary to this sole purpose of its creation. Could Congress then—could the national legislature have provided that the agency should cease in 1833, and yet the bank continue, for all other purposes, for years afterwards? Could they thus continue or establish it, for an indefinite term of years, as a mere commercial bank? The boldest advocates of latitudinarian constructions never advanced such an extravagant claim of power. And yet the Secretary of the Treasury assumes, under a power delegated by Congress, to effect that which Congress itself had no power to accomplish or authorize to be done—to divorce the bank from the Government—to dismiss it from its agency, and yet continue its being for all other purposes—to establish a mere commercial bank.

In support of this first proposition, the Secretary assigns two subordinate reasons by way of argument. First, that a sudden removal would produce great public mischief, and it ought not to be left, therefore, till near the termination of the charter. It is to be recollected that the length of time contemplated by Congress for that operation was two years, that being the period expressly prescribed for closing its business after the expiration of the charter. The Secretary instantly intercepts all future deposits, threatens the immediate withdrawal of the whole, and actually takes from the vaults all, excepting a small fraction, within the short period of four months; and yet tells us that two years, six times as long, would be too short, and assigns that as a reason for his speedy action!

The second subordinate proposition is, that when the charter shall be near its close the bank must be curtailing its discounts, and it would be distressing to call at such a time for the public moneys; and yet, during the months of August, September, and October, the bank was rapidly curtailing its loans, and this was known to the Secretary at the moment he gave his sudden order. He tells us so himself, and that it stimulated him to instant action; that he could not even wait till the meeting of Congress!

The next general reason is, that the "public directors" have not been placed upon the committees, and called into the active management of business so much as they ought. Without conceding the fact, (which has been discussed by others,) what is the remedy?—the substitution of banks in which we have no "public directors."

Next comes the case of the French bill. The Secretary of the Treasury drew on the Government of France for about $900,000. The Bank offered to collect it as an agent. This was declined. The Secretary insisted upon selling the bill. The bank consented, became the purchaser, and paid for it to the Government. Upon its transmission to France it was protested, taken up for the honor of the purchaser, and, upon its return, the bank asked the Government to pay the amount of the bill, and the usual damages in cases of protest; the same which the Government has itself invariably claimed of individuals, and actually received of some who were stockholders in the bank. The damages had become a part of the debt, as much so as the principal; they were the property of the stockholders; the directors had no right to relinquish or give them away; and yet, because they merely and simply asked for payment, it is an offence—a crime—to be visited with this enormous punishment. What if the bank had offered to relinquish this part of the debt, should we not then have heard that it was attempting to purchase the favor of the Secretary? to bribe him by $150,000 of the money of the stockholders? Would it not have been imputed as a crime of much deeper dye? But what is the remedy?—substitute other banks, who need all their resources so much for their own exigencies that they will never be able to accommodate the Government by purchasing so large a bill; or, if they should, may, in perfect consistency with their contracts, and would be bound in duty to make the same claim for damages.

The last general reason assigned is, that the bank has interfered in politics—in politics! That is now the accusation: when its primary offence, its highest crime, in truth, is, that it would not interfere in politics; it could not be made a political instrument; it would not come into the system of reform. Thence its destruction was decreed. Presidential denunciation followed—was reiterated; and, because it has dared, in a free country, to use a free press in self-defence; because, seeing the dagger aimed at its life, it has dared to raise a hand to turn aside the blow, the President exclaims—for, as Louis, of France, said, "I am the State," we have arrived at that period when one man may say—"I am the Government." It is assailing the Government, it is dangerous to the Government, it will overthrow the Government.

The fiscal agent appointed by Congress has interfered in politics: and what is the remedy? Send out the Fourth Auditor to select others to be under the sole control of the officers of the Treasury; whose very existence is political; who live, and move, and have their being in politics! nay, when it is avowed by the Fourth Auditor himself, that political considerations enter into these new selections! Does he not say to his correspondent that "on account of your devotion to the cause I had so much at heart, I was anxious that the — bank should be employed by the Treasury Department?" Has not the President of one of the affiliated banks been already in the arena? And now this removal of the public moneys—a movement, political in its conception and consummation, not merely tinged, but saturated, with politics—is to be justified on the ground that the bank had become political!

The Secretary, near the close of his report, very justly remarks, that it is a fundamental principle, that power ought not to accumulate in the hands of the same person. Do we not see this fundamental principle now practically subverted? Is not the distribution, the balance of the powers of this Government, destroyed? Are they not all rushing to one great vortex, converging to one focus, all—all melting down in the burning centre of a single executive?

Removal of the Deposits.—New York Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

I may be deemed an alarmist. There is cause for alarm. When one man, encroaching upon Congress, the Senate, and the judiciary, arrests and rolls back the course of legislation—interprets laws, treaties, and constitutions—assumes the sole power of appointment—holding at the same time absolute control over the army, the navy, the post-office, an affiliated press, and the whole swarm of Executive officers—and now, superadded to all, this tremendous money power, the fiscal agency ingrafted upon banking capital—can liberty be safe? Safe—when a boa constrictor is closing around her his crawling and crushing folds!

There is cause for alarm. If this appalling accumulation of power may be acquired in the time of profound peace, what may not be accomplished in the exigencies of war—war, which the Executive Chief can at any moment create? He has but to order the army across the lines to take possession of a foreign territory; or the commander of a single ship to insult a foreign flag; or resort to any of the well known expedients of past ages, to provoke hostilities, and it is done. Congress, indeed, may not declare it—but other nations will make war upon us, and no treaty can be formed but by the President; and if he shall grasp further power to meet the emergencies which he himself has created, will you impeach him? Impeach your chief, flagrant bello, when a strong Executive may be essential to self-preservation?

I confess I do feel alarmed. And, if my strength bore any proportion to the depth and sincerity of my convictions, I would raise my voice till it passed every hill, filled every valley, and was echoed back from every cottage on our remotest borders. I would say to the people, the strong men of the land—Awake from your false security—sleep no longer in the lap of your Delilah; you will be shorn of your strength, and bound in fetters, your eyes sealed up from the light of Heaven—and be made to grind in the mill for lords and masters—until, in blindness and in rage, you shall lay hold of the pillars of the fabric that sustains them, and bury yourself and your oppressors in undistinguished ruin. The progress of Executive power and prerogative must be arrested—it must be arrested. And if it be not done now in this generation, by the peaceable means of constitutional resistance, it will be hereafter by the convulsive throes of posterity—convulsions which will baptize our children in their own blood!

THURSDAY, JANUARY 30.

NEW YORK RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted to the Senate resolutions of the State of New York, approving of the course of the Secretary of the Treasury with regard to the removal of the deposits. Mr. W., in presenting the resolutions, addressed the Senate as follows:

I hold in my hand, Mr. President said Mr. W., and am about to ask leave to present to the Senate, certain proceedings of the legislature of my State, in which that body expresses its sentiments in regard to the removal (as it is called) of the public moneys from their deposit in the Bank of the United States, made by order of the Secretary of the Treasury; in regard to the recharter of the Bank of the United States; and in regard to the existing pressure upon the money market in some portions of the country, with its views of the character and causes of that pressure; and in which, also, that legislature expresses its pleasure as to the course which the representatives of the State, upon this floor, shall pursue, when called to act upon these questions.

In presenting, a few days since, the proceedings of limited portions of the people of their respective States, upon the same subjects, honorable Senators took occasion, no doubt properly, to inform the Senate of the number, character, and standing, political as well as personal, of those whose sentiments they laid before us, to tell us as well who they were, as who they are not. I beg the indulgence of the Senate, while, following the example set me, I detail some facts in relation to the body whose proceedings it has become my duty to present, tending to show the extent to which the proceedings themselves claim the respectful attention of Congress.

The whole number of members allowed by the constitution of the State of New York to its legislature, is one hundred and twenty-eight members of Assembly, and thirty-two Senators. The members of Assembly are apportioned to the fifty-five counties of the State according to their respective population, and the whole territory is divided into eight districts for the election of Senators, each district having four, and electing one of the four every year. The proceedings which I am about to present, were passed in the House of Assembly by a vote of one hundred and eighteen for, to nine against; and in the Senate by a vote of twenty-three for, to five against them; thus showing the very unusual occurrence, that of the one hundred and sixty members elected by the people to that legislature, one hundred and fifty-five were present and acting upon these interesting and important questions.

But, sir, if this unexampled strength and unanimity of expression be entitled to weight, and it surely must be, while authentic evidence of public opinion is allowed an influence in our deliberations, that weight is greatly enhanced by the peculiar circumstances attending the expression. All these members of the popular branch of that legislature, and eight of the thirty-two Senators, were elected during the first week in November last, one full month after the change of the deposits, while the vote shows that more than thirteen to one of the members of the Assembly voted for, while but one of the eight Senators, thus elected, voted against the resolutions. Still the strength of this vote, taken as an expression of public opinion, will be much increased by an examination of its territorial distribution.

It is well known here, and throughout the country, that the extreme western district of the State of New York has been unhappily, but most severely, agitated, in consequence of an outrage, several years since committed against the liberty, and probably upon the life, of a citizen. The effects of this outrage have been, not only the engendering of the most bitter of domestic feuds, but the partial establishment of a geographical line of separation in feelings, between that and the other sections of the State. It is, however, a source of high gratification to myself, to be able to state, as I trust it will be of pleasure to all liberal-minded men to learn, that this unnatural warfare of feeling is most rapidly subsiding; that the deep wounds which have been created by it, in the social relations of that otherwise highly-favored section of the State, are healing fast, and that the time is not distant when the evidence of its existence and effects will entirely disappear. In this section of the State, however, not an expression of complaint, as to a pecuniary pressure, has been heard; and from the best advices, I believe that, at this moment, its business relations of every description are in a more prosperous and easy condition than they have ever before been. Yet to the west and northwest must we look for every vote against the resolutions, and to this section alone for eleven out of the fourteen of these votes. The remaining three are, with one exception, Senators not elected at the election of November last, but in previous years, and all are located beyond the reach of the present pressure, in the agricultural, not in the commercial sections. In those portions of the State embracing our great commercial emporium, (and which I think I may, without arrogance or presumption, style the commercial emporium of the United States,) and the extensive cities of Hudson, Albany, Troy, Schenectady,

SENATE.]

New York Resolutions.

and Utica, and an almost endless number of incorporated trading towns and villages, all surrounded by a dense, intelligent, and watchful population, amounting together to at least one million eight hundred thousand souls, there was not found a single member of the popular branch of that legislature absent from his seat, or not with cheerfulness and alacrity recording his name in favor of the resolutions. Of the hundred and twenty-eight members composing this branch of the legislature, it is worthy of remark, that the city of New York alone elects eleven, and that every representative from the city, in either branch of the State legislature, responds to the resolutions which I now lay before the Senate.

Of the members of this legislature, personally, it is not my intention to speak. The situations they hold and their public acts are the legitimate evidence of the capacity and respectability of the individuals. It is as the organ, upon this occasion, of this deliberative body, representing as they do two millions of freemen, nearly the one-sixth part of the entire population of the Union, a population too, as commercial, nay, sir, I may say more commercial, and employing more capital, than any other portion of the country, and collecting and paying into the national Treasury, full one-third of its whole revenues; a people having as deep a stake, pecuniary and otherwise, in the prosperity of this country, and as firmly and ardently devoted to its welfare as any other equal portion of its citizens; it is as the organ of such a body, representing such a people, that I submit to the Senate this part of their public proceedings—that I ask to place their almost unanimous opinions, as to the conduct of the President, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the United States Bank, upon your files, by the side of similar expressions from the States of Ohio and New Jersey, also by the side of different expressions from portions of the people from Boston and New Bedford, in Massachusetts; of Salisbury, in North Carolina; and Newark, in New Jersey; and such other expressions of opinions as are, or as may come before the Senate upon the same subjects; and, at this interesting crisis in the affairs of our common country, I respectfully solicit from the Senate that consideration for these proceedings of the legislature of my State, which a liberal, just, and unprejudiced estimate of the views and feelings of any respectable portion of the citizens of the country may demand, and no more.

Here, sir, I might resume my seat, and I should do so with pleasure, were it not that a part of what I have felt to be an imperative duty upon this occasion remains to be performed.

In presenting the proceedings of a meeting of a portion of the town of Boston, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts availed himself of the occasion to express his own views as to the existence of a public pressure, of its cause, and of the appropriate mode of relief. He went farther, sir, and called upon all, and especially upon those who sustain the administration upon this floor in relation to the change of the deposits, to give their views as to the future as well as the present posture of the pecuniary affairs of the country. As an individual, and as one considering it one of my highest duties to sustain the administration in this measure, I am ready to respond to the Senator with entire frankness; but in thus accepting his call, I must not be understood as, for one moment, entertaining the vain impression that opinions and views pronounced by me here, or elsewhere, will acquire any importance, because they are my opinions and my views. I know well, sir, that my name carries not with it authority any where, but I also know that so far as I may entertain and shall express opinions which are, or which shall be found, in accordance with the enlightened public opinion of this country, so far they will be sustained and no farther.

Following, then, Mr. President, the example which has been set for me, I shall abstain from a discussion of controverted points, so far as that can be done, and enable me to state unreservedly my opinions and to make my views intelligible.

First, then, as to the fact of an existing pressure upon the money market: I believe that the recent extensive and sudden curtailment, by the Bank of the United States, in the facilities for credit, which had before been lavished upon the community, has caused very considerable embarrassment to those, in our commercial cities, who had extended widely their moneyed operations, and who had made themselves dependent upon these facilities; but, at the same time, I believe that these inconveniences have been, in an important degree, either directly or consequentially, extended to other classes of citizens. I therefore believe, further, that the extent of the pressure has been greatly exaggerated, and that the motives for that exaggeration are to be found, primarily, in the belief that the present administration may be brought into disfavor with the people, and may be overthrown through the agency of the panic which is attempted to be gotten up, and secondarily, in the hope that the same panic, if successfully produced, may subserve the interests of the institution by which it has been and is to be raised.

Secondly, as to the immediate cause of the pressure, I concur fully with the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is an error to attribute it to the mere fact of the change of the deposits. The reasons he has assigned for that opinion are sufficient. They might be amplified and enforced; but it is unnecessary upon the present occasion. Past experience, concurring facts, and the nature of the transaction, all combine to demonstrate that such a change would not, necessarily, draw after it such a result. I concur also with the honorable Senator [Mr. WENDELL] in the position that the evil complained of is to be attributed to the change which has taken place in the positions which the Government, the Bank of the United States, and the State banks, have heretofore occupied relatively towards each other, and to the acts which have followed that change. These positions, as at present existing, are pronounced by the honorable Senator to be false. That the attitude which the Bank of the United States has chosen to assume towards the Government and the State banks is a false position I most cheerfully admit; but that there has been any thing in the conduct of either the Government or the State banks to justify, or even excuse, that attitude, I deny, and hope to have an opportunity to attempt to disprove. From the Government directly no loans could be obtained or were expected, and it was well known that the State banks, which have been selected as the fiscal agents of the Government, had extended their loans many millions, and to the utmost limit authorized by the public deposits in their vaults.

It is neither shown nor pretended that the other State banks have curtailed their loans, in consequence of the change of the deposits, except when the curtailments by the Bank of the United States and its branches have compelled them to do so. We have, however, record evidence from itself, that the Bank of the United States has curtailed its loans, since the first day of August last, and up to the first day of December last, to the enormous amount of $9,697,000, and all this curtailment has taken place in the entire absence of any revulsion in trade, of any scarcity in the country, or any other peculiar cause of embarrassment, existing or anticipated. We need not, then, grope in the field of speculation for the cause of the present pressure. It stands before us, recorded in letters and figures which cannot lie, and which leave us without excuse for misunderstanding, or for affecting to misunderstand it.

Thirdly, as to the motives for this conduct on the part

JAN. 30, 1834.]

New York Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

of the Bank, I have already said, I deny that a justifiable one is to be found, either in the conduct of the Government, or of the State banks, towards it; and I repeat the assertion. Whether or not this curtailment of its business has been rendered necessary, on the part of the Bank, in consequence of former mismanagement, I need not inquire, inasmuch as the Bank itself, and all its friends and supporters, here and elsewhere, most strenuously deny that its present condition furnishes any necessity for increased means. I have looked carefully into the instructions originally given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State banks, in relation to the course to be pursued by them towards the Bank of the United States, and I find there nothing to warrant an apprehension that any disposition existed, on the part of the Government, to injure the Bank, or to embarrass it in the prosecution of its lawful business. I have examined, with equal care, the instructions given in regard to the transfer drafts, and the circumstances under which they were to be, and were, in fact used. And these acts of the Government, taken in connexion with the large amount of money still left in the Bank, which, upon a different supposition, would assuredly have been also withdrawn, I hold to furnish undeniable evidence that no disposition was entertained or manifested, on the part of the Government, to wrong this institution. The only design evinced was to exercise a legal right, reserved by the charter, to change the deposits, and to continue an uncompromising, to be sure, but constitutional opposition to the renewal of the charter of the Bank. That, for these constitutional and legal acts, it has pleased the Bank to wreak its vengeance upon the community, I neither allege nor believe. That the State banks have made the slightest hostile movement against it, neither is nor can be pretended. What, then, is the motive for this rapid curtailment? I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. President, that, in the language of the resolutions I hold in my hand, it is to be found, and found only, in an attempt of the Bank, "at a time of general prosperity, to produce pecuniary distress and alarm, and in exercising its power with a view to extort a renewal of its charter from the fears of the people." So much for the pressure, and the causes of it.

I will now consider the remedy for the evil which the Senator proposes. Leaving the discussion of every thing, constitutional, political, and expedient, the Senator, with his usual tact, goes directly to the matter in hand; and with the utmost confidence he tells us that the remedy is not to be found in the restoration of the deposits, but in the re-charter of the present Bank. Whatever else may be said of this avowal, it must, at least, be admitted that it does credit to the candor of the Senator. For myself, I thank him, and the country will thank him also. It is time, Mr. President, high time, that things should be called by their right names in relation to the depending controversy; that the veil with which it has hitherto been attempted to disguise the subject, should be torn off, and that the people should know what is the question which is, in fact, occupying the attention of Congress. This being done by the declaration of the Senate, there is reason to hope that we may hereafter be, if we have not heretofore been, aided by contributions of public sentiment, so far as the Senate may think proper to allow influences of that sort to enter into its deliberations. And, sir, I venture the prediction, that if the expressions now upon our files, or those which shall hereafter be placed there, as evidences of public sentiment, shall be examined, it will appear that the good sense and ingenuity of the Senator, in devising this remedy, has only placed him upon a level with the common opinion of the whole community, as to the real question in dispute: that every paper favoring the views of the opponents of the administration, has and will, expressly or impliedly, recognise the fact, that the question before the public is "Bank or no Bank," and that the real issue has that direction, not the disposition of the Government deposits. A petition for re-charter is mere matter of form, which can at any time be brought forward. A few days, or even a few hours, are sufficient for that object, and we ought not to permit ourselves to doubt that such a petition will be forthcoming, or not, according to the decision of this merely incidental question, now made to assume the place and importance of the real issue.

But, Mr. President, while I highly approve of the open and manly ground taken by the Senator from Massachusetts, I differ with him totò cœlo as to the remedy he proposes. There are no inducements which can prevail upon me to vote for the re-charter of the Bank of the United States. I would oppose this bank upon the ground of its flagrant violations of the high trusts confided to it; but my objections are of a deeper and graver character. I go against this bank, and against any and every bank to be incorporated by Congress, whether to be located at Philadelphia, or New York, or any where else within the twenty-four independent States which compose this Confederacy, upon the broad ground, which admits not of compromise, that Congress has not the power, by the constitution, to incorporate such a bank.

I may be over-sanguine, Mr. President, but I do most firmly believe that, in addition to the invaluable services already rendered to his country by the President of the United States, he is, under Providence, destined still to render her a greater than all, by being mainly instrumental in restoring the constitution of the country to what it was intended to be by those who formed it, and to what it was understood to be by the people who adopted it. In relieving that sacred instrument from those constructive and implied additions under which Congress have claimed the right to place beyond the reach of the people, and without responsibility, a moneyed power, not merely dangerous to public liberty, but of a character so formidable as to set itself in open array against, and to attempt to over-rule, the government of the country, I believe the high destiny is yet in store for that venerable man, of disproving the exalted compliment long since paid him by the great Apostle of Republicanism, "that he had already filled the measure of his country's glory," and that he is yet to accomplish, what neither Thomas Jefferson nor his illustrious successor could accomplish, by adding to the proof, which he has so largely contributed to afford, that his country is invincible by arms, the consolatory fact that there is, at least, one spot upon earth where written constitutions are rigidly regarded. I know, sir, that this work which the President has undertaken, and upon the success of which he has, with his usual moral courage, staked the hard-earned fruits of a glorious life, is full of difficulty. I know well that it will put the fortitude and patriotism of his countrymen to a severe test; but I am happy also to know that he has, in this instance, as heretofore, put himself upon the fortitude and patriotism of a people who have never yet failed him, or any man who was himself faithful to his country in the hour of peril.

Of the course which the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, will take in this great contest, it becomes me, forming so humble a part of its voice in the councils of the nation, and known only by the favors I have received at its hands, to speak with great diffidence. In the resolutions I now lay before the Senate, it has spoken for itself upon most of the points involved. As to the others, I feel that my knowledge of the character of its people, and of the known sentiments of whole masses of its public men, will justify me in the confident expression of an opinion that the State will sustain the Executive to the utmost in this controversy; and that I may say to those who are, and long have been, desirous to restore the constitution, in this regard, to its true reading, "now's the day and now's the hour" for its accomplishment. At all events, I have the right to say, that I will place myself by the side of the President, to the full extent of the views I have given, and that I desire to stand or fall with my constituents, as they shall determine the result.

I have thus responded, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow fully, to so much of his appeal. I will go on, sir, and cover the whole ground. He has asked, If you will neither re-charter the present bank, nor establish a new one, what will you do? As an individual, sir, and speaking for myself only, I say I will sustain the Executive branch of the Government by all the legal means in my power, in the effort now making to substitute the State banks instead of the Bank of the United States, as the fiscal agent of the Government. I believe they are fully competent to the object. I am wholly unmoved by the alarms which have been sounded, either as to their insecurity, or influence, or any other danger to be apprehended from their employment. I hold the steps so far taken in furtherance of this object, well warranted by the constitution and laws of the land, and I believe that the honor and best interests of the country imperiously require that they should be fully sustained by the people, and by their representatives here.

That these views are correct, it is not of course my intention, at this time, to attempt to show. In some stage of the debate upon this great subject, I hope to be able, without trespassing upon the superior claims of others, to have that opportunity.

We have been told, and told emphatically, that things cannot remain as they are; that the powers now vested in and exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, are too broad, and that legislative aid is required. If I have not misunderstood the import of remarks, it has also been told to us that such aid will be withheld. To this, I for the present only answer, that things are now, in this respect, precisely as they were before the incorporation of the present bank; that the same powers which the Secretary of the Treasury then had, he has still; that by the change of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, the Executive department of the Government has been restored to the control over the places for the safe-keeping of the public moneys, which it had by law before these moneys were deposited with that institution; and that all the law formerly existing upon the subject is now in full force and wholly unaltered, the only effect of the provision in the charter of the bank being to suspend their operation, until the Secretary of the Treasury should order and direct that the deposits be made elsewhere than in the vaults of that bank. I further state, as my opinion of the law, that by the act of the Secretary of the Treasury ordering a change of the deposits, and by that act only, the full power of Congress, over the whole subject, has been restored.

If, then, the powers of the Secretary are too broad, as the law now stands, it is the duty of Congress to restrict them, while, if the powers of the Executive branch of the Government are not now fully adequate to the making and executing of all needful orders, rules, and regulations, for the safe-keeping and convenient management of the public moneys, it is equally the duty of Congress to legislate further upon the subject. And whether Congress do or do not legislate in either case, is a matter wholly between its members and their constituents, for which the Secretary of the Treasury is in no way responsible.

But, Mr. President, while I am prepared to give to this effort of the Government to make the State banks our fiscal agent for the safe-keeping and convenient disbursement of the public moneys, a full support and a fair experiment, any effort, come from what quarter it may, to return to a hard money currency, so far as that can be done by the operations of the Federal Government, and consistently with the substantial interests of the country, shall receive from me a cordial and sincere support; and no one would more heartily rejoice than myself, to meet with propositions which would render such an effort, in any degree, practicable.

Still we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts, that things cannot remain as they are; that unless something, which, according to his views of the subject, would afford relief, be done, the pressure, the distress, and the agitation, will continue. I have already stated the source from which and from which alone, in my judgment, the present pressure proceeds. I have stated, also, without reserve, the object which is, in my opinion, intended to be accomplished by it. Of the correctness of my conclusions, the Senate and the country must judge. If they are, as I believe them to be, well founded, it is undoubtedly in the power of the bank to continue the pressure, and consequently the agitation of the public mind, to some extent, so long as it shall think it to be for its interest, and not incompatible with its safety, to do so. It is not for me to speak as with knowledge of its intentions in this respect, and the Senator from Massachusetts disclaims all information upon the point. I can, therefore, only state my own opinion; and it is, that the bank has not entered upon this bold measure without the deepest consideration, and that it will not abandon it, the design not being accomplished, but upon the most stern necessity.

Yet, Mr. President, I trust in God that that necessity will soon, very soon, be made manifest by the attitude which the nation will assume towards this daring and dangerous institution. The glorious American Revolution was but a resistance to moneyed power—yes, sir, to the exercise of a moneyed power, without the consent, and beyond the reach, of the people of this country. To this our fathers opposed a stern and uncompromising resistance. Appeals were made to their fears. Distress in their pecuniary affairs was pictured to them in colors to have deterred any but the pure spirit of patriotism and love of liberty which led them forward. Then the pictures were not imaginary but real; the distresses were not fancy but fact. The country was not then strong and rich and prosperous, but weak and poor and disheartened; and still their march was onward. They armed themselves upon the side of their country, and stood by their Government, and when their hard and perilous services were paid in paper, worth a fortieth or sixtieth part of its nominal value, the representative of the dollar was the dollar to them, for it gave liberty to the people, and freed them from the rule of avarice. And have we, their immediate descendants, so soon lost their noble spirit? Are we to fold our arms and obey the dictates of a moneyed power, not removed from our soil, and wielded by stronger hands, but taking root among us; a power spoken into existence by our breath, and dependent upon that breath for life and being? Are our fears, our avarice, our selfish and base passions to be appealed to, to compel us to re-create this power, when we are told that the circulation of the country is in its hands?—that the institutions established by all the independent States of the Confederacy are subject to its control, and exist only by its clemency?—when we see it setting itself up against the Government and vaunting its power?—throwing from its doors our representatives placed at its board, and pronouncing them unskilful, ungenteel, or incorrigible?—nay, Mr. President, when it lays upon our tables in this chamber, its denunciation to the public, classing the President of the United States with counterfeiters and felons, and declaring that, as kindred subjects, both should receive like treatment at its hands?

I say, sir, are we to be driven by our fears to re-charter such an institution, with such evidences of its power, and of its disposition to use that power, lying before us, authenticated by the bank itself? Are we to do this after the question has been referred to the people of the country, fully argued before them, and their decision pronounced against the bank, and in favor of the President, by a majority such as has never before in this Government marked the result of a contest at the ballot boxes?

Gentlemen talk of revolutions in progress. When this action shall take place in the American Congress, then indeed will a revolution have been accomplished—then will your constitution have been yielded up to fear and favor, and your legislation be the sic volo, sic jubeo, of a bank. But, Mr. President, I do not distress myself with any such forebodings. I know the crisis will be trying, and I know, too, that the spirit and patriotism of the people will be equal to the trial. As I read the indications of public opinion, I see clearly that the true question is understood by the country, and that it is assuming an attitude towards the bank which the occasion calls for. Be assured, sir, whatever nice distinctions may be drawn here as to the show of influence, which expressions of the popular will upon such a subject are entitled to from us, it is possible for that will to assume a constitutional shape which the Senate cannot misunderstand, and, understanding, will not unwisely resist. The country, Mr. President, has approved of the course of the Executive, in his attempts to relieve us from the corrupt and corrupting power and influence of a national bank, and it will sustain him in the experiment now making to substitute the State institutions for such a fiscal agent. I have the fullest confidence in the ultimate and complete success of the trial, but should it not prove satisfactory to the country, it will then be time enough to resort to the conceded powers of Congress, or to ask from the people what, until every other experiment be fairly and fully tried, they will never grant—the power to establish a national bank.

Mr. WEBSTER said he could not consent to let the opportunity pass, without a few observations upon what he had now heard. Sir, said Mr. W., the remarks of the honorable member from New York are full of the most portentous import. They are words, not of cheering or consolation, but of ill-boding signification; and, as they spread far and wide, in their progress from the capital through the country, they will carry with them, if I mistake not, gloom, apprehension, and dismay. I consider the declarations which the honorable member has now made as expressing the settled purpose of the administration on the great question which so much agitates the country.

[Here Mr. WRIGHT rose and said, that he had given his opinion as an individual, and that he had no authority to speak for the administration.]

Mr. WEBSTER continued. I perfectly well understand, sir, said Mr. W., all the gentleman's disclaimers and demurrers. He speaks, to be sure, in his own name only—but, from his political connexions, his station, and his relations, I know full well that he has not, on this occasion, spoken one word which has not been deliberately weighed and considered by others, as well as himself.

He has announced, therefore, to the country, two things, clearly and intelligibly:

First, that the present system (if system it is to be called) is to remain unaltered. The public moneys are to remain as they now are, in the State banks, and the whole public revenue is hereafter to be collected through the agency of such banks. This is the first point. The gentleman has declared his full and fixed intention to support the administration in this course, and therefore it cannot be doubted that this course has been determined on by the administration. No plan is to be laid before Congress—no system is to be adopted by authority of law. The effect of a law would be to place the public deposits beyond the power of daily change, and beyond the absolute control of the Executive. But no such fixed arrangement is to take place. The whole is to be left completely at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, who may change the public moneys from place to place, and from bank to bank, as often as he pleases.

The second thing now clearly made known, and of which, indeed, there have been many previous intimations, is, sir, that a great effort is to be made, or rather an effort already made is to be vigorously renewed and continued, to turn the public complaints against the bank instead of the Government, and to persuade the people that all their sufferings arise, not from the act of the administration in interfering with the public deposits, but from the conduct of the bank since that was done. It is to be asserted here, and will be the topic of declamation every where, that, notwithstanding the removal of the deposits, if the bank had not acted wrong, there would have been no pressure or distress on the country. The object, it is evident, will now be to divert public attention from the conduct of the Secretary, and fix it on that of the bank. This is the second thing which is to be learned from the speech of the member from New York.

The honorable member has said that new honors are to be gained by the President, from the act which he is about to accomplish; that he is to bring back legislation to its original limits, and to establish the great truth that Congress has no power to create a national bank.

I shall not stop to argue whether Congress can charter a bank in this little District, which shall operate every where throughout the Union, and yet cannot establish one in any of the States. The gentleman seemed to leave that point, as if Congress had such a power. But all must see that if Congress cannot establish a bank in one of the States, with branches in the rest, it would be mere evasion to say that it might establish a bank here, with branches in the several States.

Congress, it is alleged, has not the constitutional power to create a bank! Sir, on what does this power rest, in the opinion of those of us who maintain it? Simply on this: that it is a power which is necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying other powers into effect. A fiscal agent—an auxiliary to the Treasury—a machine—something, is necessary for the purposes of the Government; and Congress, under the general authority conferred upon it, can create that fiscal agent—that machine—that something—and call it a bank. This is what I contend for; but this the gentleman denies, and says that it is not competent to Congress to create a fiscal agent for itself, but that it may employ, as such agents, institutions not created by itself, but by others, and which are beyond the control of Congress. It is admitted that the agent is necessary, and that Congress has the power to employ it; but it is insisted, nevertheless, that Congress cannot create it, but must take such as is or may be already created. I do not agree to the soundness of this reasoning. Suppose there were no State banks; in that case, as the gentleman admits the necessity of a bank, how can he hold such discordant opinions as to assert that Congress could not, in that case, create one? The agency of a bank is necessary; and, because it is necessary, we may use it, provided others will make a bank for us; but, if they will not, we cannot make one for ourselves, however necessary. This is the proposition.

For myself, I must confess that I am too obtuse to see the distinction between the power of creating a bank for the use of the Government, and the power of taking into its use banks already created. To make and to use, or to make and to hire, must require the same power, in this case, and be either both constitutional or both equally unconstitutional; except that every consideration of propriety, and expediency, and convenience, requires that Congress should make a bank which will suit its own purposes, answer its own ends, and be subject to its own control, rather than use other banks, which were not created for any such purpose, are not suited to it, and over which Congress can exercise no supervision.

On one or two other points, sir, I wish to say a word. The gentleman differs from me as to the degree of pressure on the country. He admits that in some parts there is some degree of pressure; in large cities he supposes there may be distress; but asserts that every where else the pressure is limited; that every where it is greatly exaggerated; and that it will soon be over. This is mere matter of opinion. It is capable of no precise and absolute proof or disproof. The avenues of knowledge are equally open to all. But I can truly say that I differ from the gentleman on this point most materially and most widely. From the information I have received during the last few weeks, I have every reason to believe that the pressure is very severe, has become very general, and is fast increasing; and I see no chance of its diminution, unless measures of relief shall be adopted by the Government.

But the gentleman has discovered, or thinks he has discovered, motives for the complaints which arise on all sides. It is all but an attempt to bring the administration into disfavor. This alone is the cause that the removal of the deposits is so strongly censured. Sir, the gentleman is mistaken. He does not—at least I think he does not—rightly interpret the signs of the times. The cause of complaint is much deeper and stronger than any mere desire to produce political effect. The gentleman must be aware that, notwithstanding the great vote by which the New York resolutions were carried, and the support given by other proceedings to the removal of the deposits, there are many as ardent friends of the President as are to be found any where, who exceedingly regret and deplore the measure. Sir, on this floor there has been going on, for many weeks, as interesting a debate as has been witnessed for twenty years; and yet I have not heard, among all who have supported the administration, a single Senator say that he approved the removal of the deposits, or was glad it had taken place, until the gentleman from New York spoke. I saw the gentleman from Georgia approach that point, but he shunned direct contact. He complained much of the bank; he insisted, too, on the power of removal; but I did not hear him say he thought it a wise act. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] not now in his seat, also defended the power, and has arraigned the bank; but has he said that he approved the measure of removal? I have not met with twenty individuals, in or out of Congress, who have expressed an approval of it, among the many hundreds whose opinions I have heard—not twenty who have maintained that it was a wise proceeding; but I have heard individuals of ample fortune declare, nevertheless, that, since it was done, they would sacrifice all they possessed rather than not support it, although they wholly disapproved of it. Such is the warmth of party zeal.

Sir, it is a mistake to suppose that the present agitation of the country springs from mere party motives. It is a great mistake. Every body is not a politician. The mind of every man in the country is not occupied with the project of subverting one administration, and setting up another. The gentleman has done great injustice to the people. I know, sir, that great injustice has been done to the memorialists from Boston, whose resolutions I presented some days since, some of whom are very ardent friends of the President, and can have been influenced by no such motives as has been attributed to them.

But, Mr. President, I think I heard yesterday something from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, indicative of an intention to direct the hostility of the country against the bank, and to ascribe to the bank, and the bank alone, the public distress. It was the duty of the Government to have foreseen the consequences of the removal of the deposits; and gentlemen have no right first to attack the bank, charge it with great offences, and thus attempt to shake its credit, and then complain, when the bank undertakes to defend itself, and to avoid the great risk which must threaten it from the hostility of the Government to its property and character. The Government has placed itself in an extraordinary position, both to the bank and to the country, by the removal of the deposits: and also to the currency of the country. The bills of the bank are lawful currency in all payments to Government; yet we see the Executive warring on the credit of this national currency. We have seen the institution assailed, which, by law, was provided to supply the revenue. Is not this a new course? Does the recollection of the gentleman furnish any such instance? What other institution could stand against such hostility? The Bank of England could not stand against it a single hour. The Bank of France would perish at the first breath of such hostility. But the Bank of the United States has sustained its credit under every disadvantage, and has ample means to sustain it to the end. Its credit is in no degree shaken, though its operations are necessarily curtailed. What has the bank done? The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania have alleged that it is not because of the removal of the deposits that there is pressure in the country, but because of the conduct of the bank. The latter gentleman, especially, alleges that the bank began to curtail its discounts before the removal of the deposits, and at a time when it was only expected that they would be removed. Indeed! and did not the bank, by taking this course, prove that it foresaw correctly what was to take place? And, because it adopted a course of preparation, in order to break the blow which was about to fall upon it, this also is to be added to the grave catalogue of its offences. The bank, it seems, has curtailed to the amount of nine millions. Has she, indeed? And is not that exactly the amount of deposits which the Government has withdrawn? The bank, then has curtailed precisely so much as the Government has drawn away from it. No other bank in the world could have gone on with so small a curtailment. While public confidence was diminishing all around the bank, it only curtailed just as much as it lost by the act of the Government. The bank would be justified, even without the withdrawal of the deposits, in curtailing its discounts gradually, and continuing to do so to the end of its charter, considering the hostility manifested to its further continuance. The Government has refused to recharter it. Its term of existence is approaching; one of the duties which it has to perform is to make its collections; and the process of collection, since it must be slow, ought to be commenced in season. It is, therefore, its duty to begin its curtailments, so as that the process may be gradual.

I hope that I have not been misunderstood in my remarks the other morning. The gentleman from New York has represented me as saying that it is not the removal of the deposits which has caused the public distress. What I said was, if the Government had required twice nine millions for its service, the withdrawal of that amount from the bank, without any interruption of the good understanding between the Government and the bank, would not have caused this pressure and distrust. Every thing turns on the circumstances under which the withdrawal is made. If public confidence is not shaken, all is well; but, if it is, all—is difficulty and distress. And this confidence is shaken.

It has been said by the gentleman from New York, that Government has no design against the bank; that it only desires to withdraw the public deposits. Yet, in the very paper submitted to Congress by the Executive Department, the bank is arraigned as unconstitutional in its very origin, and also as having broken its charter, and violated its obligations—and its very existence is said to be dangerous to the country! Is not all this calculated to injure the character of the bank and to shake confidence? The bank has its foreign connexions and is much engaged in the business of foreign exchanges; and what will be thought at Paris and London, when the community there shall see all these charges made by the Government against a bank, in which they have always reposed the highest trust? Does not this injure its reputation? Does it not compel it to take a defensive attitude? The gentleman from New York spoke of the power in the country to put down the bank, and of doing as our fathers did in the time of the revolution; and has called on the people to rise and put down this money power, as our ancestors put down the oppressive rule of Great Britain! All this is well calculated to produce the effect which is intended; and all this, too, helps further to shake confidence—it all injures the bank—it all compels it to curtail more and more.

New York Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

Sir, I venture to predict that the longer gentlemen pursue the experiment which they have devised, of collecting the public revenue by State banks, the more perfectly will they be satisfied that it cannot succeed. The gentleman has suffered himself to be led away by false analogies. He says, that when the present bank expires there will be the same laws as existed when the old bank expired. Now, would it not be the inference of every wise man, that there will also be the same inconveniences as were then felt? It would be useful to remember the state of things which existed when the first bank was created, in 1791; and that a high degree of convenience, which amounted to political necessity, compelled Congress thus early to create a national bank. Its charter expired in 1811, and the war came on the next year. The State banks immediately stopped payment; and, before the war had continued twelve months, there was a proposition for another United States Bank; and this proposal was renewed from year to year, and from session to session. Who supported this proposition? The very individuals who had opposed the former bank, and who had now become convinced of the indispensable necessity of such an institution. It has been verified, by experience, that the bank is as necessary in time of peace as in time of war; and perhaps more necessary, for the purpose of facilitating the commercial operations of the country, and collecting the revenue, and sustaining the currency. It has been alleged, that we are to be left in the same condition as when the old bank expired, and, of course, we are to be subjected to the same inconveniences. Sir, why should we thus suffer all experience to be lost upon us? For the convenience of the Government and of the country there must be some bank, (at least I think so;) and I should wish to hear the views of the administration as to this point.

The notes and bills of the Bank of the United States have heretofore been circulated every where—they meet the wants of every one—they have furnished a safe and most convenient currency. It is impossible for Congress to enact a certain value on the paper of the State banks. They may say that these banks are entitled to credit; but they cannot legislate them into the good opinion and faith of the public. Credit is a thing which must take its own course. It can never happen that the New York notes will be at par value in Louisiana, or that the notes of the Louisiana banks will be at par value in New York. In the notes of the United States Bank we have a currency of equal value every where; and I say that there is not to be found, in the whole world, another institution whose notes spread so far and wide with perfect credit in all places. There is no instance of a bank, whose paper is spread over so vast a surface of country, and is every where of such equal value. How can it be, that a number of State banks, scattered over two thousand miles of country, subject to twenty-four different State legislatures and State tribunals, without the possibility of any general concert of action, can supply the place of one general bank? It cannot be. I see, sir, in the doctrines which have been advanced to-day, only new distress and disaster, new insecurity, and more danger to property than the country has experienced for many years; because it is in vain to attempt to uphold the occupations of industry, unless property is made secure; or of the value of labor, unless its recompense is safe. But an opportunity will occur for resuming this subject hereafter. I forbear from it for the present.

A word or two on one other point. It was said by me, on a former day, that this immediate question of the deposits does not necessarily draw after it the question of rechartering the Bank of the United States. It leaves that question for future adjustment. But the present question involves high political considerations, which I am not now about to discuss. If the question of the removal of the deposits be not now taken into view, gentlemen will be bound to vote on the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, as to the power which has been claimed and exercised. The question, then, is not as to the renewing of the charter of the bank. But I repeat, that, however gentlemen may flatter themselves, if it be not settled that the deposits are to be restored, nothing will be settled; negative resolutions will not tranquilize the country and give it repose. The question is before the country—all agree that it must be settled by that country. I very much regret that topics are mixed up with the question which may prevent it from being submitted to the calm judgment of the people. Yet, I have not lost faith in public sentiment. Events are occurring, daily, which will make the people think for themselves. The industrious, the enterprising, will see the danger which surrounds them, and will awake. If the majority of the people shall then say there is no necessity for a continuance of this sound and universal currency, I will acquiesce in their judgment, because I can do no otherwise than to acquiesce. If the gentleman from New York is right in his reading of the prognostics, and public opinion shall settle down in the way which he desires; and if it be determined here that the public money is to be placed at the disposal of the Executive, with absolute power over the whole subject of its custody and guardianship; and that the general currency is to be left to the control of banks created by twenty-four States; then, I say, that in my judgment, one strong bond of our social and political union is severed, and one great pillar of our prosperity is broken and prostrate.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he believed the annunciation, now made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. Wright] would be heard by the American people with a feeling of dismay and despondency, which would be excited by the intelligence that a famine or a pestilence was coming upon the land. The Senator from New York has frankly come up to the question. He has boldly and fully disclosed the desperate purpose of pursuing what, in his (Mr. C.'s) opinion, was the mad scheme of the administration in relation to the attack on the bank and the currency of the country. In the picture given for public exhibition by the Senator from New York, the community would discover quite enough to prostrate all their fond hopes that their rulers would devise some measure of relief. But, frightful as it would be to a disappointed and suffering people, it contained one figure which does not belong to it, and the abstraction of which must make its aspect still more hideous. The Senator from New York has stated, that "the selected State banks have discounted with liberality." Sir, the Senator has no warrant for holding forth such a palliation to the broken spirits and dejected apprehensions of an oppressed people. If they repose on the prospect thus presented to them, they will find it delusive and deceptive. Let us look to the fact. In this Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, we shall find how vain will be the expectation of such relief.

Mr. C. said, the book formed by this report was too large to have allowed its perusal in the occasional moments which other occupations left him for such a purpose. He had, however, looked at the proceedings of the Union Bank, which had been selected in Baltimore, to conduct the fiscal operation of the Government in his own State.

By reference to the statements furnished from that bank, it appeared that, on the 14th of October last

The discounts were	-	-	$2,479,530 60
The public deposits then being	-	-	240,979 53
On the 4th of November, the discounts were	-	-	2,481,579 96
And the deposits	-	-	307,561 17
On the 2d of December, the discounts were	-	-	2,515,412 45
The deposits,	-	-	538,044 86

It will thus appear that, in the interval between the two first periods, the deposits had increased by the sum of - - - - - $66,586 64

And the discounts were increased but	-	-	2,049 36
At the interval between the second and third periods, the deposits increased	-	-	230,483 39
While the discounts increased only	-	-	33,832 49
And in the interval between the 1st and last periods, the deposits had increased	-	-	297,065 33
And the discounts only	-	-	64,118 15

During these periods, the line of private deposits did not materially vary, and, consequently, could not influence the subject.

If, then, this be the mode in which the league banks distribute the fund which the United States Bank and its branches have been compelled to call in, for the purpose of paying the Government, or rather for the purpose of loaning by the Government to the State banks, how can it be expected that relief is to be afforded? Sir, it is notorious that relief has not been afforded, the pecuniary pressure every where proclaims the contrary. In the nature of the thing it cannot but be so. Look to the operation of the measure as stated in this very report. The intelligent officer at the head of this Union Bank, tells you in effect it must be so. Of his willingness to sustain the Administration in this measure, he has given full proof, by gratuitously presenting himself in the character of its advocate in the public journals of the day, and of his sagacity and acuteness, on these subjects, no man doubts who knows him. Yet, sir, he gives testimony on this subject in the following language, taken from a letter addressed to the Secretary on the 22d October:

"I think it cannot be doubted that, as long as the branch bank continues to curtail its discounts, that a pressure for money will be felt here; and that in the proportion that we extend our discounts to relieve this pressure, that we shall fall in debt to that bank, for which she will draw upon us for coin."

Sir, the bank must "curtail its discounts" for the ensuing two years, if its affairs are to be wound up; and during all that time the State banks, the pet banks, are to be restrained from extending their discounts, for the very good reason that it exposes them to danger and loss.

Mr. C. said, he regretted that the statements did not come down to a later period than December. He hoped his friend, the chairman of the Finance committee, would call for them; and he ventured to predict that they would confirm the fact, now found to exist in the Union Bank, and probably to a larger degree. No, sir, no, sir, there is no escape through that avenue. Penury and ruin, for four years, unmitigated and hopeless, was determined by the Administration to be the bitter portion of the suffering, supplicating community. Whether the cup would then be drained, or whether a still more wretched state of existence awaited us thereafter, he should not now attempt to show.

Mr. President, there is one class of idolatry, in the creed of which it is taught, that honor, and glory, and fame, are secured by self-immolation; and the misguided victim voluntarily prostrates himself before the desolating car of Juggernaut, to satiate the imputed appetite of his wooden god. We have heard it said, in our day, that it was "honor enough" for one man to have served in a distinguished office under the great chief who is now the lord of the ascendant. Whether his devoted worshippers are willing to obey this new behest, and present their fortunes and their hopes, a voluntary sacrifice, to be ruined and crushed by this intended movement of their political Juggernaut, time alone will disclose. The humble individual who addresses you, worships at no such shrine, and certainly will not be numbered amongst the deluded victims of such a heresy: he is ambitious of no such martyrdom, and means to die no such death.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, he did not rise for the purpose of adding any thing to the views which had been so ably and eloquently presented by his colleague: but he felt himself called upon to submit a few remarks in answer to what had fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER.] Mr. T. did not intend to enter upon the discussion of the merits of the questions that were involved in the main debate, which was going on in the Senate. An opportunity might present, when he would feel it his duty to examine, at large, those questions. Neither would he, in this incidental manner, discuss the constitutionality of a national bank, any further than to reply to some remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts on that subject.

The Senator, on this, as on a former occasion, stated, that the restoration of the deposits and a renewal of the charter of the bank, were questions entirely separate and distinct. It is true, said Mr. T., that gentleman had set out with this proposition; but the whole tenor of his argument went to show that the questions were the same, were identical. He has told us that the present pressure in the money market, and the distress which he alleges now pervades the whole community, is not owing to the mere removal of the public deposits—not to the abstraction of so much money from the vaults of the Bank of the United States, but to the impairing of public confidence by means of such withdrawal. If, said Mr. T., public confidence has thus been impaired, can it be restored by a restoration of the deposits? Certainly not, unless it be understood, at the same time, that the bank is to be re-chartered. The Senator has told us, that the financial operations of the Government cannot be carried on, nor the currency of the country sustained, without a national bank—that such an institution is indispensable: and that, in his judgment, a renewal of the charter of the present bank, with suitable modifications, was better than the incorporation of a new bank. If, then, this be the only means of restoring public confidence and maintaining public credit, the restoration of the deposits can be of no avail, unless a re-charter of the bank is to follow. The whole argument goes to establish the identity of the question of the restoration of the deposits, and the re charter of the bank. However much gentlemen may attempt to separate them, to this conclusion must they come at last. It will be so understood by the people of this country; and he could not conceive how any one, who was opposed to the renewal of the charter of the bank, could conscientiously vote for a restoration of the deposits.

The Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. T. said, had charged his colleague with illogical conclusions in announcing his opposition to the Bank of the United States, or to any bank of that description, and, at the same time, maintaining the right of the Government to employ the State banks as its fiscal agents. Where, he [Mr. T.]

would ask, was the inconsistency of that declaration? The Senator had told us that the bank was incorporated for the purpose of being employed as the fiscal agent of the Government; and had gravely inquired if the Government had not the constitutional power to create such a corporation as its fiscal agent? Where did it get the power to employ, for that purpose, such corporations created by the States? The distinction, said Mr. T., arises from the constitutional powers of those who create such incorporations. The General Government is one of delegated powers. The State Governments have reserved to themselves all the powers not delegated. They cannot be deprived of the right to incorporate banks, unless they have parted with that power, and granted it to the General Government. This they have not done. It is one of their reserved rights, and which has been exercised by them from the adoption of the constitution to the present time. If, then, Congress have not the power, under the constitution, to incorporate a national bank, and, of course, cannot employ it as a fiscal agent, does it follow that the Government cannot employ, for that purpose, banks created by the States that do possess the power? Certainly not. Where, said he, does Congress get the power to incorporate a bank? Is it amongst its delegated powers? If so, which power, or what clause of the constitution contains it?

It is in vain to talk of employing a national bank, as a fiscal agent, unless Congress possesses the power to create such agent. And it is equally illogical to say, that the Government cannot employ the State banks, if it cannot create a bank of its own. Suppose the charter of the Bank of the United States had expired, and there were no State banks in existence, who would the Government employ as its fiscal agents? Under the powers now vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by law, or under further legislation of Congress, it could employ individuals as such agents. This was the practice of the Government, in its early history, before the establishment of a national bank, and before State banks had been, to any considerable extent, incorporated. If Government could thus employ individuals, as fiscal agents, could it not employ agents acting in a corporate capacity? The power to employ, has no necessary connexion with the power to create such agent. It is, however, urged that a national bank is necessary to the financial concerns and to the currency of the country: and that, as Congress have, by the constitution, power to pass all laws "necessary and proper" to carry into effect the delegated powers, it has the power to incorporate such a bank. This clause was the subject of much discussion and alarm previous to the ratification of the constitution by the conventions of the people in the several States. Mr. Hamilton, one of the great oracles of the constitution, under the signature of "Publius," urged on the people, with great eloquence and zeal, the adoption of the constitution, and in regard to this particular clause, about which so much had been said, declared that it conferred no more power on Congress than if it had never been inserted in the constitution. That Congress had, by necessary implication, the power to pass all laws "necessary and proper" to carry into effect the powers expressly granted. This was undoubtedly the true construction—and, if its incorporation in the constitution was intended to have any effect, it was for greater caution, and for the purpose of limiting rather than extending its power. By such an interpretation, the alarms of the people were quieted; and still, since the adoption of the constitution, this power has been often appealed to as possessing virtues which it was not understood to possess previous to that time.

During the important debate, which has, for a long time, occupied the attention of the Senate, it seems to have been assumed by Senators, that the question of the constitutional power of Congress to incorporate a national bank was settled. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] with others, had taken that position, and had even expressed their surprise that the Secretary of the Treasury had set himself up, on this occasion, against the power of Congress, and against those who had preceded him in that Department, and had ventured, at this late day, to express an opinion against the constitutionality of the bank. Mr. T. said he approved the views of the Secretary of the Treasury. He did not concede that the opinions of those who had gone before him made that constitutional, which, in his judgment, was not constitutional before. When the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States was first brought before the Supreme judicial tribunal of the country, one ground upon which the opinion of that court rested, was this: namely, that as Congress had power to pass all "necessary and proper" laws to carry into effect its delegated powers, it was the right of Congress to judge of what laws were "necessary and proper." It was left to its discretion, and having granted the charter of this bank, the enactment itself was evidence that Congress deemed it necessary, and therefore constitutional. Thus was there a legislative precedent established, on which was ingrafted a judicial precedent; and these precedents, piled one upon the other, like Ossa upon Pelion, were now to take from those who had always denied the power, the right to judge whether such a power was ever granted or not. Mr. T. said, the remarks he had thus incidentally made, were intended to apply to the question of granting a new bank, or the renewal of the charter of the present bank. He intended to say nothing that should interfere with its corporate rights under its present charter.

The Senator from Massachusetts had said, that, during the long and interesting debate now pending before the Senate, he had not heard a single friend of the administration approve of the removal of the deposits. Mr. T. said, until he had heard this announced, he should have said that every Senator who had spoken this side of the question approved of the measure. It was not a new question. It had taken place some time ago; and, in reference to his own State, he could say the subject had been discussed, and carried down to the polls one month after the deposits were removed. It formed a part of the issue before the people at the last election, the same as the re-charter of the bank formed the issue at the election previous. He really had supposed, and still believed, that those gentlemen who supported the administration in this measure, did approve of the removal of the deposits. But, if there were any individuals in the Senate, or elsewhere, friendly to the Administration, who did not approve of the removal, he trusted they would not approve of their restoration, and for the best of reasons—that no man, in his judgment, could consistently disapprove of the re-charter, who approved of a restoration.

He begged to make a remark or two on the subject of the resolution from the legislature of the State of New York, against the restoration of the deposits. One of the Senators in the legislature of that State, and who is an opponent to the present administration, when this resolution came before them, voted for it, and assigned his reasons: that if the Bank of the United States was to be re-chartered, he should prefer that the deposits remain in that institution; but as the veto had gone forth, and the charter would not probably be renewed, he thought this not too early a period for the removal of the deposits.

The Senator from Massachusetts had said, that the Government ought to have foreseen the consequences of such a measure. That it was the impairing public confidence, which had done the mischief, and not the abstraction of the money. If the Executive had taken a different course—that which had been pointed out by some gentlemen on the other side—had issued a scire facias, and brought the subject of a violation of the charter of the bank before a court and jury, what would have been the effect? Would that not have still more impaired the confidence of the public? would that not have produced still greater alarm and excitement on the exchanges of Paris and London, to which the Senator has alluded, than the measure which the Executive had adopted of quietly withdrawing the public deposits? Such a proceeding, to arraign the bank before the highest judicial tribunal of the country for a forfeiture of its charter, would have been much better calculated to impair confidence in the bank abroad, and, consequently, in the credit of the nation itself. It had been the endeavor of the Executive, throughout the whole affair, that nothing should be done which might have the effect of impairing public confidence. And so far as his action was concerned, nothing had been done which had that tendency. The bank, having pursued the course it had, in interfering in the political concerns of the country, the Executive deemed it his duty to do all he could to arrest the mischief. He had exercised a power which was intended to be exercised in such a case. And he would say, distinctly, that if the distress which was complained of should continue to increase, it would be owing to the bold stand the bank was taking in reference to this subject, in order to force from Congress a renewal of its charter.

The Senator from Massachusetts has also said that we cannot live without a national bank; that when the charter of the present bank expires, if it be not renewed, another bank must be chartered; that we shall have the same scenes re-enacted as in 1811, when the old United States Bank expired, and experience what was felt in 1791, before its charter was granted. The manner in which the Senator arrived at that conclusion might be correct, if, as he stated, a bank, in times of prosperity, was more important than in times less flourishing. But it should be recollected that, at the period when the charter of the old bank was granted, we had just emerged from the war of the Revolution. Our finances were disordered, and the country was poor. In 1816, when the present bank was incorporated, the country had but recently come out of a war with the most powerful nation of Europe. Our finances were again disordered, and our country deranged.

At these two periods, a national bank was established; and to it had been attributed a restoration, not only of a sound currency, but much of the general prosperity which ensued. Mr. T. did not believe in the mighty agency of this institution in producing these results. It might have facilitated them. But, returning peace, after a long and bloody war, with the reaction consequent upon such a state of things, was of itself sufficient to account for the general prosperity of the country which followed. At that period, however, when every thing was depressed, in the hope of affording relief, many even overcame their constitutional scruples in support of the present Bank of the United States. If, said Mr. T. such was the gloomy state of things at that early period, and likewise in 1811, and during the late war, when this question was agitated in Congress, until the passage of the bill in 1816, he was a little surprised that the Senator, then a member of the other House, should not have voted for it.

If he was not mistaken, the gentleman's name was, on that occasion, recorded against it. [Mr. WHEELER. You are mistaken.] Mr. T. said he spoke from his general impressions of the gentleman's vote, and could not pretend to assert the fact, after being thus corrected. But, said Mr. T., the Senator concluded with another remark, that this bank was one of the most essential bonds of the Union, and without it, the Union was in more danger of being broken up than from almost any other cause. He [Mr. T.] said it was curious to see gentlemen holding such opposite opinions on the question of re-chartering the bank, acting together on the question of restoring the deposits, which had been shown to be identical with that of a re-charter. And it was still more curious now to be told, from one section of the country, that the bank was the strongest bond by which the Union was held together; and from another section, that a re-charter of the bank was fraught with imminent danger to its continuance, because it was a violation of the constitution by which the Union was formed.

In conclusion, Mr. T. observed that he was, probably, as little disposed to bow down before a political idol, and offer up the homage of his devotions, as the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] but he would say, that, if there had ever been a political Juggernaut worshipped in this country, it was that mammoth institution—the United States Bank. Its votaries had voluntarily prostrated themselves before it; and whilst they were crushed beneath its ponderous wheels, they had exultingly exclaimed, Let its march be onward, heedless of the cries of its victims.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he was averse to proceeding in this way on a subject of such vital importance. No gentleman had said that he was against referring the subject to the Committee on Finance, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; he [Mr. G.] therefore, would prefer taking up the subject in a more tangible and substantial way at some other time, in order that they might come to a vote on it. He then moved that the subject should lie on the table, and that the Senate proceed to the orders of the day.

The motion was agreed to—Yeas 23, Nays 22.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Special Order was now taken up. The question being on Mr. CLAY's resolutions, in regard to the removal of the deposits; when

Mr. GRUNDY rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: It is a portion of the regular history of every free Government, that those who are out of power, and are anxious to acquire it, charge those in possession of it, with usurpation, oppression, and misrule of every kind. Sometimes these charges are true, at others, they are only imagined; and it not unfrequently happens, that they are neither true, nor imagined to be so by those who make them. Still, a hope is entertained, that the people may be made to believe that abuses have been committed, when the accusers themselves have no confidence whatever in their accusations and denunciations—although, upon such occasions, much that is to be regretted takes place, yet much public benefit results. These discussions are the life of liberty; by them, the people are enlightened, and if abuses have crept into the administration of public affairs, the proper corrective is applied. If, on the other hand, a false clamor has been raised, those who have been unjustly assailed acquire a firmer hold upon the affections and confidence of the people, and the public displeasure is the portion of their accusers.

Believing, as I do, that the Executive department of the Government has assumed the exercise of no power not warranted by the constitution and laws; and also believing that the deposits ought not to be restored to the Bank of the United States, I will briefly state to the Senate the reasons for the opinions I entertain.

Before I do this, I wish to be distinctly understood upon one point. I consider the removal of the deposits, emphatically, the act of the Chief Magistrate. He has caused it to be done; and whatever of praise or censure is due to the transaction, the greater portion is his. And although gentlemen may deride the expression, I think it well suited his station, and the occasion, when he said—“I take the responsibility of this measure upon myself.” And were it even to deprive him of the high station he occupies, and tear every laurel from his brow, I would not throw that responsibility upon others, which properly belongs to him; and I confess, I have felt astonished when I hear gentlemen, from day to day, censuring the Secretary of the Treasury for the part he has acted. What has he done? While occupying another exalted station, which made him officially one of the advisers of the President of the United States, his opinion was required, and he gave it, not only in favor of the power of the Executive department to remove the depositories, but that it was expedient to exercise it. When he was afterwards appointed Secretary of the Treasury, he carried that opinion into execution in good faith. He never sought, he never desired the office he now fills; but when called to it, could he, without dishonor, refuse to aid in carrying into effect the measures which he had himself advised? Had he refused, would not all honorable men have pronounced, that he had faltered in the discharge of a high duty. Such conduct would have been wholly inconsistent with that high character he had earned and acquired in his native State. There his private and public worth, and high attainments, are held in such estimation, that party spirit stands rebuked, and the partition-walls which it erects are broken down, when his name is presented for public favor. In a time of high party excitement, he was nominated to the office of attorney general for the State of Maryland, by a governor of adverse politics, and approved by a council, a majority of which belonged to a different political party. Can gentlemen believe that the denunciations which they utter against this individual, whose character for talents and integrity, since he has been transferred to this place, has been extending itself throughout the nation, will meet with favor from the American people? I think not, and, powerful as is the judgment of the Senate, and powerful as it ought to be, I should doubt whether it would not impart strength, rather than weakness, to the individual against whom it should be thus improperly exercised.

It seems to me, that gentlemen wholly mistake the true structure of this Government, when they insist, that the Secretary of the Treasury acts independently of the President in any of the great measures of his department. The true theory I take to be this: that to prevent a concentration of power in the hands of any one man, or set of men, the powers of the Government are divided into three great departments—legislative, executive, and judicial. They form the constitutional checks upon each other. It is this division of power that secures American liberty. It is not by producing collision, and creating discord or want of harmony in any one of the departments, that there is safety.

In each of these departments, constitutionally speaking, there is but one will, which must have effect whenever it is regularly expressed. Take the judiciary: whenever its head, the Supreme Court, shall decide a question, it is the duty of the inferior federal tribunals to conform to it. And however different may be the opinion of a district or associate justice, it is surrendered, and the opinion of the Supreme Court is carried into effect by the inferior tribunals. In such a case, the inferior judge, according to the argument of gentlemen, might be denounced for his want of independence, in obeying the mandates and dictation of others; and all the opprobrious epithets which have been applied to the Secretary of the Treasury, might, with the same propriety, be applied to him. Yet, all acquiesce in the propriety of this course of conduct; and should an inferior judge act in habitual disregard of the opinions of the Supreme Court, those very Senators who now advance doctrines which, if true, would justify his conduct, were he brought before them upon an impeachment, would be constrained to pronounce him guilty of high misdemeanors.

Take the legislative department: when it passes an act

(I speak of constitutional acts) it contains and expresses the legislative will upon the subject of its contents. Those who voted against it, as well as those who voted for it, are bound to obey it, until it shall be repealed. And so of all the officers of the Government, and citizens, whatever their own opinions may be, in regard to the wisdom and propriety of the act of Congress. Here we have to conform to the legislative will. Without doing this, we have no Government; nothing but anarchy, confusion, and disorder, would ensue from a different doctrine. Still, against injudicious and unjust legislation, there is left the great constitutional remedy—the people can have the laws changed.

Take the executive department. The constitution has provided that a single individual shall constitute its head, and has confided to his care the faithful execution of the laws. The language of the constitution is—"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." He is the agent to whom the constitution has intrusted the high duty of carrying into effect the enactments of the legislative department. If there be a greater necessity for unity of action in any one department of the Government, more than in any other, it is in this. In fact, it was to prevent discord and the confiction of a number of wills that a single Executive was preferred. All the advantages designed by the constitution from this measure will be lost, if subordinate executive officers are permitted to control the head in any matter falling within the constitutional and legal discretion of this department of the Government. If you permit any of the subordinate officers to counteract the wishes of the Chief Magistrate upon his important measures, you destroy his responsibility, which is the greatest security you have for a faithful discharge of his duties. For no one, I presume, will be so unjust as to say, that he shall be held responsible for the conduct of those over whom he has no control. Besides, in this conflict between the President and his subordinate officers, your Government will cease to operate, at least its harmonious action will be lost, and that too, in a department which requires most despatch and energy. That this is the true constitutional view of the subject, is proved by the fact, that the President possesses the power, under the constitution, of removing all officers appointed to aid him in the execution of the laws. I will not, at this period of our history, go into an argument to prove that the President possesses this power; it was settled by a legislative construction of the constitution so early as the year 1798, and it has been practised upon by every President from that period to the present time; and it should be recollected, that the point then decided was, that it was a constitutional right, of which Congress could not deprive him.

To strengthen the positions I have laid down, I will refer to a few of the remarks of Mr. Madison, in that memorable debate which settled the construction of the constitution upon this subject. They clearly show his opinion to have been, that the President not only had the absolute constitutional right of removal, but the right to oversee and control all those officers who are engaged in the execution of the laws. His remarks are:

"The constitution affirms that the Executive power shall be vested in the President. Are there exceptions to this power? Yes, there are. The constitution says, that in appointing to office, the Senate shall be associated with the President, unless in the case of inferior officers, when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the constitution has invested all Executive power in the President, I venture to assert, that the legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority.

"The question now resolves into this—Is the power of displacing, an Executive power? I conceive, if any power

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

whatsoever, is in its nature Executive, it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws. If the constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office, by associating the Senate with him in the business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his Executive power, to make such appointment? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the constitution—the Executive power shall be vested in a President—to unite the Senate with the President in the appointment to office? I conceive not. If it is admitted we should not be authorized to do this, I think it may be disputed whether we ought to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an Executive nature as the other; and the first only is authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the constitution, in these words: “the Executive power shall be vested in a President.”

The high authority of Mr. Madison's opinions upon all constitutional questions, no Senator will doubt. He assisted in framing the constitution; heard and understood the views of all those who were associated with him in its formation, and the extract I have read clearly shows that the President has the right to direct and control all his subordinate officers. This power is indispensable to the Chief Magistrate. He is responsible to the country for the manner in which all the duties of his department are discharged. He is responsible to the people in the same manner that other public agents are; and, for any violation of the trust committed to him, is liable to impeachment. The constitution and laws are as obligatory on him as others, and their observance secured by the same sanctions—to execute, not to violate the laws, is his constitutional duty.

Gentlemen put this case: Suppose the President shall direct an officer engaged in the discharge of Executive duties to do an act which he believes to be in violation of the constitution and laws, is he to do violence to his conscience and his oath? I answer, no. What then? Let him resign. He was selected to aid the President, not to impede him in the execution of the laws. It is true, Congress creates offices, and in some cases prescribes the duties of the officers; but the officers, when appointed, do not belong to the legislative department of the Government. The moment an officer is created, and his duties assigned to him, the nature of these designate his appropriate department under the constitution. If he is to exercise judicial functions, he belongs to that department of the Government; if Executive duties are assigned to him, he is an officer of that department, and subject to the control of the President of the United States.

The great duties of the Secretary of the Treasury are to superintend the collection and disbursement of the public revenue. These are entirely of an Executive nature. He is to aid in carrying into effect the laws which have been passed for raising money, expending, and disbursing it. And such is the true character of all the duties he is to perform. When the law enjoins on him, that he is to report to Congress what he has done on any particular subject, for instance, the removal of the public deposits, it makes him no more a part of the legislative department of the Government, than the judges of this District would be, were you to require of them to report to Congress at each session the number of causes decided by them in the preceding year, and the number still remaining on their dockets. The latter you might require to enable you to determine whether further legislation might not be necessary to secure a more speedy administration of justice. So the former is required to enable you to make any further regulations you may judge proper, in regard to the safe keeping of the public moneys. Gentlemen seem to disregard the true limits of the legislative functions. To this department belongs the high trust of prescribing the rules which are to regulate the conduct of officers and citizens. When this is done by the enactment of laws, our duties and our powers are at an end, except to modify or repeal. Then the functions of the other departments commence. If any thing be enjoined on the judiciary, it proceeds to adjudge upon the matter confided to it. If the duties directed to be performed are of an Executive character, then that department which is required by the constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, commences its action. Congress has nothing to do with the execution of the laws. To make, not to execute them, is its constitutional province.

Having shown that the collection and safe-keeping of the public moneys, in the absence of all legal provisions on the subject, is a portion of Executive duty, I will now devote a few moments to the inquiry, whether Congress has done any thing which forbids the Executive to cause the deposits to be made in the State banks. Prior to the year 1816, it must be admitted that the Secretary of the Treasury had an entire discretion where the deposits should be made—no law having passed giving any direction on the subject. Of course, when he collected the public revenue, he placed it in depositories of his own selection. The State institutions were, in fact, the safest depositories, and they had been confided in. In almost every State some one bank or more had been selected for this purpose. This was the state and condition of the public treasure at the time the Bank of the United States was created. When the friends of the bill incorporating the bank were deliberating on that measure, it was a very proper inquiry for them to make, if the bank shall go into operation, whether it might not be proper that the public moneys should be deposited in it? Congress determined that the deposits should be made in it; but lest something should occur which might render this an ineligible place, they provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time otherwise order and direct—the language is, “that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct.” The power here given to the Secretary of the Treasury is without restriction or limitation. Whenever he shall determine that the case has arisen, he is remitted back to his original power of securing the deposits according to his own judgment. It is assuming that which is not warranted by any rule of sound construction, to say that the Secretary is to be confined in his action to the single case of the deposits being unsafe. The language of the law does not restrict him to such a case. It is an arbitrary interpretation, unauthorized by any thing contained in the law itself, or in the circumstances of the times at which it was passed. If Congress intended so to limit his action, it could and would so have declared; but, so far from doing this, the power is as fully given as Congress can make it. And it is only by the use of that dangerous power of construction which some of the gentlemen on the other side have often deprecated, that this restriction can be imposed upon the power of the Secretary; and it is strange that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] should object to the fulness of this power, because it is contained in few words. That Senator certainly forgets the maxim on which he so successfully practises, which is, that in the expressions of thought, brevity gives strength. It is singular that he should make that objection which his friends declare to be one of the distinguished excellencies of his own style, which compresses multum in parvo. And I now defy that Senator to suggest any phraseology which shall convey the power to the Secretary of the Treasury more amply than the language used in the bank charter. But why argue this question further? The Bank of the United States and its able counsellors have decided it. It has surrendered the public money in payment of the transfer drafts, thereby admitting that the Secretary of the Treasury had the right to cause them to be drawn by the Treasurer, and that the bank would not stand justified in refusing payment. If to this it shall be answered that their compliance was produced by a spirit of courtesy towards the Executive Department of the Government, I ask, why has it refused to surrender the pension fund, which was set apart for the payment of pensions under the act of June 7, 1832? I do not name this for the purpose of calling in question the propriety of that refusal, for I have not had time to examine that subject; but I name it for the purpose of showing that where the bank believes it can rightfully withhold the public moneys, no spirit of courtesy induces it to surrender them. And from the fact of its having surrendered the other public moneys, I infer its conviction of the right of the Executive Government to withdraw them. Let it also be remembered, that in all the correspondence which has taken place between the cashier of the Bank of the United States and the Treasurer, no suggestion is made by the cashier, calling in question the right to remove the deposits; exception is only taken to the mode of communicating the information to the bank, of the fact that the drafts had been drawn.

I have said there was nothing in the history of the times at which the bank was created which would justify the opinion that Congress intended to restrain the Secretary to the single case of the deposits being unsafe. The war with Great Britain had just terminated, and the fact was fresh in the recollection of every public man, that the greatest difficulty in that contest was the want of money. A great portion of the moneyed men of the country had withheld their means from the Government, because they were opposed to the war, and it was a fact well known that many of these, who, from their capital, would most likely acquire an interest in this institution and have the control of it, stood in such a condition in public estimation, that Congress, in 1816, would have been unwilling to place the public money in such a situation that for the next twenty years it might be used indirectly to the prejudice of the country, in the event of another war. The advocates of the war were then flushed with victory, and had the ascendancy in the public councils. It is therefore incredible that they would place the public money beyond the control of the Government, although there might be no danger of eventual loss. All that Congress has said, or intended to say, is, that the deposits should be made in this bank until the Secretary, upon the experiment being made, shall be of opinion that the public interest would be promoted by placing them elsewhere. Whenever that shall be his opinion, this law shall interpose no obstacle; he may resume the power heretofore exercised by him. It is argued, that as the Secretary is to assign his reasons to Congress, therefore, he is not under the control of the President in this particular. This by no means follows. It might as well be said that, were you to require of the Secretary of War to report what has been done or effected in the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi, therefore, in making the removal, he was not under the control of the President of the United States. This no one would pretend. Congress has provided for the removal of the Indians—the Executive Department carries your law into execution. Congress ought to have full information of the proceedings of every department of the Government, with the view to further legislation. Take the case of these deposits: although they have been removed in conformity with existing laws, they can be restored by law, or a new depository can be provided. I therefore conclude, that the provision was a proper one; that Congress should be informed of the removal, and of the reasons which produced it. But this by no means disproves the power of the Executive to make the removal.

Having established, as I think, satisfactorily, that the charter of the Bank of the United States imposes no restriction whatever upon the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the depositories which he may use for the safe-keeping of the public moneys, I ask the attention of the Senate to the course which has been pursued by the Executive Department upon this subject, under every administration, from the commencement of the Government. And I think I can show, most clearly, if the present Chief Magistrate is a usurper of unconstitutional and illegal powers, so was the Father of his Country, and all his successors. In 1789, the office of the Secretary of the Treasury was created, and, at the same session, duties were imposed on imported articles. On the 6th of April, 1790, President Washington having the sword in one hand, according to the views of gentlemen on the other side, seized the purse in the other, and trampled in the dust all the constitutional guarantees of the people's rights, by sanctioning the following circular, issued by General Hamilton, his Secretary of the Treasury, viz.

"Circular to collectors, Georgia, except Savannah.

Treasury Department, April 6th, 1790.

SIR: I have to desire that you will remit all moneys which you have now on hand, or hereafter receive, on account of customs, to John Habersham, Esq., collector for the port of Savannah, taking duplicate receipts for the same, one of which to be transmitted to my office, and the other to be retained by you. This mode of payment you will continue, until otherwise directed by me.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Secretary of the Treasury."

Here Mr. Hamilton makes the desk, or, if the frequent use of the term by public functionaries in high places has rendered it more classical, "the breeches pocket" of Mr. Habersham, an officer removable at the will of the President, the depository of the public money. Where were our patriots then? Who exclaimed in the Senate house, or elsewhere, that this was an act of usurpation? Henry, Jefferson, Madison, Franklin, Ames, Ellsworth, Sherman, the Adamses, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, and many others, were then looking on with intense anxiety, and watching the movements of this great vessel of state as it was launching into, and taking its direction on the ocean of its vast action; yet none could discern that a wrong impulsion was given by this act. Nor did Mr. Hamilton confine this kind of proceeding to the State of Georgia. Similar orders were issued to collectors throughout the United States, only varied according to circumstances.

When Congress created the old United States Bank, in 1791, the Secretary of the Treasury was not required, by its charter, to deposit the public money in it. They knew that the Secretary was in the habit of placing public moneys in such depositories as he judged best. He exercised before and after that period all the powers now claimed or exercised by the present Secretary of the Treasury; yet no one charged him, or the President under whom he acted, with breaking open and plundering the public treasury; and surely when it is remembered how bitterly he was assailed by his political opponents, if he had exercised any power of even a doubtful character—it cannot be believed he would have escaped censure.

Under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, during the existence of the old Bank of the United States, which had been generally used as a depository of the public moneys, Mr. Gallatin, the Secretary of the Treasury, was in the habit of directing portions of the public money then in the Bank of the United States, to be transferred to other banks by the transfer drafts of the Treasurer of the United States. I will read one of his orders to the Treasurer to that effect.

"Treasury Department, October 29, 1801.

SIR: I have to request that you will draw and deposit in the Bank of Columbia, a bill on the office of discount and deposit at Baltimore, for fifty thousand dollars.

I am, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

L. MEREDITH, Treasurer of the United States."

This is one of many similar orders of Mr. Gallatin that may be found in document No 40, in the State Papers of the Senate, of the second session of 17th Congress.

These orders to the Treasurer were all obeyed, and transfer drafts accordingly drawn; yet no one ever imagined that thereby the money was taken out of the Treasury of the United States, although transferred to another place of keeping.

Mr. Gallatin's letter of the 14th of April, 1807, directed to the President of the Manhattan Company, New York, shows the proceeding by which the moneys were transferred from one bank to another, and were still considered in the legal custody and keeping of the Treasurer of the United States. The first paragraph of the letter referred to reads as follows:

"SIR: Having concluded to draw for the present the surplus revenue of Connecticut and Rhode Island to New York, through the medium of the Manhattan Company, the Treasurer of the United States will, from time to time, transmit bills in favor of the cashier of that institution on the several collectors and banks in the two first-mentioned States. For these drafts the company must give credit to the Treasurer as soon as they come into the hands of the cashier; but the drafts of this Department on the cashier will never exceed the sums actually received."

I have read this, and the order of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the Treasurer, not only for the purpose of showing that the Treasurer of the United States is under the absolute control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and is bound at all times to comply with his orders in furnishing transfer drafts by which the public moneys are to be removed from one place to another; but also to show that by a transfer of this kind the money is not withdrawn from the legal custody or keeping of the Treasurer, because, upon the reception of the draft by the cashier of the bank to which the money is to be transferred, the treasurer is credited by the amount, and he is made debtor for the same amount on the books of the bank from which the money is drawn. Still no money is taken out of the Treasury, the Treasurer continuing charged with the sum transferred on the books of the department.

Much of the error into which gentlemen have fallen on this subject, has arisen from a misconception of what is meant by the act of 1789. The phraseology of that act has, perhaps, misled some who have not attended to the nature of the subject, and to the practice of the Government in regard to it. It has been asked, where is the Treasury of the United States? The response to this question is obvious. It is wherever the public money is deposited, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Those only who suppose that the act of 1789 contemplated that the whole of the public money should be kept in the actual possession of the Treasurer, can be affected by the question, or alarmed by the suggestion, that the security of the public money is less than it has heretofore been. Where was the Treasury when Mr. Hamilton's circular to the collectors in Georgia directed them to deposit the public moneys in the hands of Mr. Habersham? Where was it when Mr. Gallatin transferred the public funds from bank to bank at pleasure, as I have shown? The idea that the law of 1789 intended the Treasurer to have the actual keeping of the public money, without the agency of depositories, is negatived by the impracticability of the thing; and by the uniform practice of the Government from the passage of the law to the present day. This practice has settled its true meaning and construction. Congress has provided no place of safe-keeping as the Treasury of the United States. It has obviously relied that the Secretary of the Treasury would find depositories sufficiently safe, as he found them for the last forty years. From this view of the subject, as well as any other that can be properly taken, it appears, conclusively, that the Treasurer of the United States, acting under the orders of the head of his department, has incurred no responsibility. Suppose the proceeding wrong; yet he is not made the judge. He is not to determine the purposes for which a transfer is made. He has obeyed the order of his superior in a matter intrusted by the laws to that superior's direction: and that obedience, it has been shown, has not caused him to remove one cent of the public money from the Treasury of the United States.

In 1811, when the charter of the old bank expired, Congress made no provision, directing the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the deposits of the public moneys; they well knew that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for its safe-keeping; and Mr. Gallatin, under the administration of Mr. Madison, without any directions from Congress, then effected the same operation of removing the public money from the United States Bank to the State banks, which Mr. Taney is now performing, and by transfer drafts drawn by the Treasurer under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The opinions and practice of Mr. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Monroe, are fully disclosed in his report to the Senate of the 25th February, 1823. I will not consume the time of the Senate by reading it. It is manifest from it, that the idea never entered his mind, that he was restricted, in the withdrawing public money from the United States Bank, and placing it in other banks, to the single case of the deposits being unsafe in the Bank of the United States. So far from it, he, for the avowed purpose of enabling the banks of this district to sustain themselves against apprehended danger from runs for specie being made on them, caused deposits of the public moneys to be made in the Union Bank of Alexandria, the Mechanics' Bank, and the Franklin Bank of the same place; in the Union and Central Banks of Georgetown; in the Bank of Washington, and in the Patriotic Bank. A portion of the money thus deposited was eventually lost to the United States; yet no censure on this account was attached to Mr. Crawford, although he was at that time the common object of attack by almost every political party.

Mr. Rush, the Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Adams's administration, has laid his opinions upon this subject before the public; he avows, distinctly, that the Secretary of the Treasury not only possesses the power to remove the deposits, but that this was a proper and fit occasion for its exercise.

I have been thus minute in tracing the history of the Government upon this subject, with the view to show, that gentlemen have fallen into an error by the misapplication of a sound and ever-enduring principle in a republic: which is, that the sword and the purse cannot be confided to the same hands without danger to the public liberty. Neither the sword nor the purse, according to their true meaning, are in the hands of the Executive Department of the Government. When statesmen speak of the sword, reference is had to the power of raising armies, of calling out the physical force of the country. This power is vested in Congress. We hold the sword. Not one soldier can be called into service without the authority of Congress. So of the purse of the nation.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

This signifies the moneyed means of the country held by the individuals composing the community; and that power, which, under the constitution, can draw the money from the pockets of the people, has the purse of the nation at its command. Congress also possesses this power; and no President of the United States has attempted to invade it. As to the possession of the public money which may have been collected under the laws of Congress, it always has been, and always must be, in the keeping of the Executive Department. That Department, alone, can use it in making such disbursements as Congress may have authorized. It builds the navy which you have authorized by law; it raises the army you order; it erects fortifications; and, in short, carries all your laws of expenditure into effect, and makes payment out of the moneys you have raised and placed in its hands. When loans are to be made—you authorize them; the Executive obtains them; and the money thus procured, remains in the possession of that department.

I shall now leave this branch of the subject, believing the following positions to have been sufficiently established:

1st. That the President of the United States possessed the constitutional and legal power to remove the public moneys, and place them in such depositories as he pleased, prior to the incorporation of the Bank of the United States in the year 1816.

2d. That the sixteenth section of the bank charter interposes no obstacle to the exercise of this power, whenever the public interest, in his judgment, may require it.

I now proceed to the examination of the second proposition contained in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. Ought the deposits to be restored to the Bank of the United States, or rather shall the public moneys hereafter collected, be deposited in that institution? We are relieved from the inquiry, whether the time for removal was well chosen; the removal has taken place, and the question now to be decided is, whether we shall undo that which has been done by the Executive Department? As to the time of the removal, I refer to the able argument of the Secretary himself. It certainly has received no satisfactory answer or refutation. I shall confine my remarks, exclusively, to the question of the restoration of the deposits. I admit, frankly, if the bank is to be rechartered, I can see no reason why the deposits should not be replaced. The public certainly can derive no benefit from this operation, either in its commencement or continuance, if in a few months every thing is to be reinstated, and matters are to stand in their former condition; and in my judgment, it would be equally unwise, now that the change has taken place, to restore them, if, almost as soon as that is done, you are to commence acting the late scenes over again. If you were now to direct a return of the deposits, you would shake the credit of the State banks, and derange that course of action in the community which has commenced, conforming itself to the present posture of moneyed affairs. Besides, you would be furnishing the United States Bank with the means of increasing its pressure and annoyance upon the State institutions. To do this, will not only impair the public confidence in your moneyed institutions, but in the legislation of the country. If public confidence has been impaired by a change of the public deposits from the United States Bank to the State banks, will you inspire it by changing them back to the United States Bank this year, and in the course of next year, returning them to the State institutions? It would seem to me, if one change has impaired public confidence to the extent represented, two more changes would entirely annihilate it. I admit that every material change in the moneyed concerns of a community is productive of inconvenience; and, therefore, they should only be made on great occasions, and be repeated as seldom as possible. Some of the gentlemen who argue for a restoration of the deposits must think these changes are pleasant things, or they would not desire such frequent repetitions of them. Let us take the mode of thinking adopted by gentlemen who are for a restoration of the deposits, but against the renewal of the charter, and carry it out in practice. You get the deposits restored, but the 3d of March, 1836, will soon arrive: what is then to be done? You say, you will not renew the charter. Now tell me what you have effected? You have kept the public money and the community travelling backwards and forwards between the banks for two years; and then you must begin again that proceeding, which you say has produced so much inconvenience and distress to the community. It appears to me, that the most rational mode of acting on this subject, is to settle the question of the re-charter first, then we could decide with propriety what disposition to make of the public money; and I am constrained to believe that this is only a precursor to an effort to obtain a renewal of the charter; but for this, the bank would care but little for the possession of the public moneys at this late period of its legal existence. I am opposed to a renewal of the charter, upon principles, some of which I will state, not intending to enter at length into an argument in support of them.

These stockholders have no claim upon the Government for a renewal of the charter—they will have had the full benefit of their contract; it has been profitable to them; they will have enjoyed the exclusive monopoly for twenty years. If then, you were to grant a charter for a bank, I should not hesitate to say, that these corporators have as little claim, if not less, than any set of individuals in the community. They have possessed the exclusive advantage of banking, under the authority of the United States, for a long time, and I can see no reason why others, having the means, should not have the opportunity of participating. Further, the bank has abused its privileges. In the first place, this corporation, in its corporate capacity, and with its corporate means, has embarked in the party politics of the country, under the false pretext of self-defence. Let us examine this for a moment: self-defence implies previous attack or invasion; when reference is had to a corporate body, it means an invasion of its chartered rights. In this case, the President of the United States in his message of 1829, said, that the expediency, as well as the constitutionality of the bank had been well questioned by a great portion of the American people; and, therefore, he presented the subject of re-chartering at an early period for consideration. Did he ask or say that the duration of the charter should be shortened, or that any one of its chartered rights should be taken from it? No, sir, nothing of that kind was attempted on his part. As an American President should do, he presented a grave subject to the consideration of his countrymen. No sooner is this done, than the bank raises its banner and enters the field as a political partisan. Yes, in order to obtain new privileges, not to secure any which the existing laws conferred on it, its mighty means are put at the disposal of its chief; and he is to use them to operate on public opinion in such a way as to put down the man who was bold enough to think and say, that its charter ought not to be renewed. I ask, is an institution to be continued in this country, which openly aspires to make Presidents, and direct and control the destinies of the nation?

My next objection is, its habitual disregard of its charter, in transacting a great portion of its business by its exchange committee, which should be done by its board of directors. The charter provides that seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, &c.; but by the practice of the bank, three directors, chosen by the president of the institution, not by the board, transact the ordinary business of the board, such as discounting notes, &c. The Senator [Mr. CLAY] says,

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[JAN. 30, 1834.]

this is the practice of all large corporate and political bodies—that we do our business through our committee; this is true as to the preparation of business; it is right; and so it should be in a bank. Our business is all prepared by committees—they collect the necessary information, and communicate it to the Senate; but these committees can pass no bill, make no law: the committees of the bank not only discharge the duties of legislative committees, but complete the business by acting finally on it, nor is its action confined to such transactions as necessarily require despatch, and which could not be conveniently postponed to the regular sittings of the board of directors.

Again, the Government directors have been improperly excluded from a participation in the direction of the bank. This is attempted to be justified upon the ground that they have mistaken their true character, and merited this exclusion. It is insisted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that although they derive their appointment from the President and Senate, yet when appointed, they have no other relation or duties to the Government or people than other directors. I entertain an opinion wholly at variance with this, and think the correctness of my opinion can be sustained from a variety of considerations. The Government of the United States hold stock in a number of incorporated companies, and in all, except this, the votes of the Government are given with the other stockholders for the whole number of directors; then, when an election is made, all the directors stand upon the same footing. But in this case the Government has the exclusive appointment of five directors, and the President of the United States (as is expressed in the charter) can alone remove them. In the next place, that other duties than those of the ordinary directors were expected from them, is proved by the fact, that should the Government sell its stock, and cease to have any pecuniary interest in the institution, still, according to the charter, five directors would continue to be appointed by the Government in the same way they now are. This was not a point overlooked in the passage of the law. Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH offered in the Senate the following amendment: "And be it enacted, that if at any time the United States shall cease to hold stock in this bank, the five directors on the part of the United States, and the power herein given to the President by and with the consent of the Senate to appoint directors, shall immediately cease, and that for every million four hundred thousand dollars of said stock, which the United States may part with, there shall be an abridgement of the power of one out of the five directors herein before provided for." This amendment was negatived. What reasons could have produced its rejection, unless it were intended that the Government should at all times have its sentinels in this institution to give information whether any thing was transacting detrimental to the public welfare?

Again, this bank has put its whole capital at the discretion of its president. This manifests such a settled determination to operate on the public mind, with a view to its re-charter, that the American people may feel just alarm for the safety of their political institutions, while a corporation of such powerful means, and such a disposition to employ them, exists in the country. For these reasons, and others which might be named, if time permitted, I shall vote against a re-charter, whenever an application shall be made, and shall, therefore, vote against a restoration of the deposits.

I will now say a few words upon the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country. It is but faintly urged that they are produced by the act of withdrawing the deposits from the Bank of the United States. It is clear to my mind, that it cannot have the slightest tendency in that way, unless, indeed, the United States

Bank shall choose to use it as a pretext for producing such an effort. What is the true effect of this change of deposits? Suppose the United States Bank is deprived of an average deposit of nine millions of dollars. This disables it to accommodate to the amount of business which could be done safely upon that sum. But this amount is placed in other banks in the same cities, and they are thereby enabled to transact business to the extent of this increased ability, above what they were capable of doing before: so that while this change may be said to create a disability in the United States Bank, an increased ability to the same extent is produced in the State banks: therefore, a diminution of bank facilities is not the effect of the removal of the deposits. The removal has not in any degree contributed to produce a pressure in the money market. The degree of that pressure, I have no adequate means of judging of; some causes are apparent, calculated to produce embarrassment in the commercial community. First, the duty bonds of the former year falling due at the same time when cash duties are demanded for fresh importations under the law of the last session, would occasion a great increased demand for money. Second, the curtailments of the Bank of the United States must add to it, for thereby their accommodations are not only diminished, but the necessity is imposed on the State banks to curtail their business, lest they should place themselves in the power and at the mercy of the Bank of the United States. Third, the hesitation manifested by the Bank of the United States, and its refusal at some of its branches to receive from the deposite State banks their respective notes, or notes payable at different branches, which may have been received in payment of the revenue, has, and will, if persisted in, greatly contribute to the pecuniary embarrassment of the country, by diminishing the power of the State banks to grant facilities. But, most of all, is that panic which exists in the public mind, not produced by the removal of the deposits, but by that machinery which the bank has put in operation throughout the whole country, aided and sustained, as it is, by what is said and done in this capitol. Justice imperiously requires, that the idea suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] should receive a satisfactory explanation. He thinks that the President of the United States was unfavorable to the adjustment of the tariff which took place at the last session of Congress. Sir, I claim to know as much on that point as any one. Circumstances existed which gave me a full opportunity of ascertaining the President's wishes on that subject. The Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina [Mr. CLAY and Mr. CALHOUN] will both do me the justice to say, that so soon as the proposition was made, I avowed my determination to support it, and persevered until the object was accomplished. I moved the reference to a select committee, and was placed on it as a member; and, although less efficient than others, none felt more anxiety or labored with more zeal. As that committee was constructed, I felt it my duty to confer with the Chief Magistrate and the Secretary of the Treasury, particularly upon the important details of the bill: from the Secretary of the Treasury I received all the information asked for with great promptness; and I know that the President was solicitous that the bill should pass. Although he had issued the proclamation so much complained of, and had asked Congress to pass what is denominated the "force bill," still no man felt greater anxiety that harmony and good feeling should be restored to the country. Knowing these things as I do, I cannot acquiesce in an impression being made upon the public mind at variance with the true state of the wishes of the President. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] gives the whole credit of that compromise to his colleague and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to the exclusion of the President altogether. As I claim no merit, except what I am sure all will accord to me, that of having done my duty as well as I could, I think I stand in so disinterested a situation as to be able to award the merit where it ought to be placed. Many of the friends of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] give all the credit to him—very well, let them think so; it was a praiseworthy act; and it is comfortable and pleasant to them to believe that their friend has effected so much good for the country. Most of the friends of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] award all the praise to him, and the doings of his State; and they believe it to be just and right to do so. His colleague is willing that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] should participate, provided, however, the President shall have no share in the matter. But the friends of the President say, he effected all this good, and they think so, as sincerely as do the friends of either of the Senators. Now, sir, I will give you my own opinion. It is, that it required all three of them to do it; and after they had mustered and drilled all their friends, and had exerted themselves to the utmost of their power, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] and his friends were very near breaking up the whole concern; and, that too, not upon the ground that they were opposed to the adjustment of the difficulties which then existed, but they were in favor of specific duties, as affording a more certain and adequate protection to domestic manufactures, while the bill proposed ultimately an ad valorem duty on all imported articles.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

It is said that the President of the United States had no right to apply to the Government directors for the information he required of them. If they were appointed by law, as I have shown, to watch over and take care of the public interest, it was his duty to apply, and theirs to give the information. And as the accounts of certain individuals had been exposed to public view, by a committee of the other House, at the last session of Congress, I can see no error in these directors making as full a statement as they have done. The exclusion of Government directors is justified on the ground, that they are acting under the directions of the President of the United States, who has resolved on the destruction of the bank. According to this idea, the legal rights and privileges of a director are to depend upon the opinions which may be entertained by the Chief Magistrate. If he be favorable to the bank, the Government directors may have a full share in its management, and may know all its transactions; but if he be opposed to it, they are to have no agency whatever. I had supposed that the rights of the directors were given by law and usage, and that no opinion or intention of the Chief Magistrate could impair them. It is charged, that the President of the United States has deprived the bank of trial by jury. Not at all; the charter, so far as the deposits are concerned, gives no trial by jury, but has appointed another form for the decision of that matter.

I heartily concur with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] in all his eulogies and panegyrics upon the trial by jury, and the writ of habeas corpus; but certainly there is no case for their application at present under consideration. It is said, that the Secretary of the Treasury has legislated and made contracts without the authority of law. He has not legislated; but in the fulfillment of his duty, and to carry the laws into effect, he has made arrangements with the State banks for the safe keeping of the public money, precisely in the same way that Hamilton, Gallatin, Crawford, and all other Secretaries, have done.

One word in answer to a remark made by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER.] He thinks the political power of this institution is not to be feared. Sir, a knowledge of human nature I should think would teach us all a different lesson. How can that man be independent of its influence whose bread, and that of his family, depend upon its will?

The Senator from Maine, who has immediately preceded me in this debate, [Mr. SERRAVALLO,] must excuse me for not attempting a reply to all he has said. Had I not already consumed so much of the Senate's time, it would afford me pleasure to do so; a few remarks of his, however, shall receive some attention. He said that President-making was the great business pursued here. From the abundance of the heart, the mouth will speak; that gentleman may feel the influence of the President-making spirit, and a double portion of it too, for he seems resolved to unmake as well as to make Presidents. For myself, I have enlisted under no aspirant's banner. I have been sent here to assist in making laws and supporting the constitution of the country, and I am content to leave the making of the Presidents to the people, to whom it constitutionally belongs. My constituents expect that I will aid the present Chief Magistrate in all his measures, of which my judgment approves, and they shall not be disappointed; but they have not enjoined it on me, as any part of my duty, to interfere in the succession. That gentleman also said, that the General Government never possessed more power than at present. Who is endeavoring to diminish it? I answer, the President and his friends. That great American system, which includes in it an unlimited power of taxation and internal improvements, for a distribution of the surplus revenue, is not his favorite plan. He seems to think that the President can do any thing and every thing he pleases; for instance, put down the Supreme Court, or destroy the Navy, and be sustained by the popular voice. Sir, if this be so, all our long-cherished opinions and hopes, that the people were capable of self-government, are at an end. I consider this a severe reflection upon the intelligence of the American people. It is true, the President possesses great popularity; he has acquired this by his long and faithful public services. I am acquainted with the estimation in which he is held by those who know him best. They know him to be a soldier, a patriot, and an honest man; and they have confidence in his talents; and those gentlemen who are contending against him will find at the close of every conflict, that their opinion of his mental powers has increased; but, should the case ever occur when he shall attempt any great usurpation of power, it would be found, that in his own State, in his own country, and in his own town, a stern and firm resistance would be made; and I should be unwilling to believe, that in any part of enlightened New England, where education is universal, that similar opposition might not be expected. The gentleman says, that the President has used the veto power unreasonably and beyond all former example. He has used it no further than the constitution authorized, and public sentiment has sanctioned its use, so far as we have the means of judging.

I had hoped that in this debate, subjects unconnected with the matter under consideration would not have been introduced, and that the Post Office Department would have formed a distinct subject for examination, when all the information that could be obtained would be fairly placed before the Senate. Standing in the relation I do to that department, after having witnessed the various assaults that have been made upon it, and now reiterated by the Senator from Maine, I should deem myself altogether inexcusable, were I not at this time to give to the Senate the views I entertain upon that subject. The report of the Postmaster General to the President, communicated by him to Congress at the opening of the present session, stated the fact, that on the 1st of July, 1833, the department was indebted one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars more than the whole amount of all the balances due to it from postmasters, and those who had been postmasters up to that date; it, moreover, stated, that its current expenses were nearly eighty-six thousand dollars a year more than its current revenues, allowing the increase of postages to be in as great a ratio as they had been at any former period. This would bring the department at the close of the year 1833, indebted beyond the amount of all the balances due to it, two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. The Postmaster General has communicated to the Senate the names of the banks to which he is indebted, and the amount due to each; from this it appears that he has borrowed from banks the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and has overdrawn in banks in which the deposits of his department are made, to the amount of about fifty thousand dollars more, making his whole debt four hundred thousand dollars. Seeing, that at the close of the year 1833, the debts of the department would amount to two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars, it should not be a matter of surprise, that this debt should be due, and that the amount of loans and over-drafts should exceed the amount of two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. It is rather a matter of surprise, that so small a loan as four hundred thousand dollars, which is but one hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars beyond the balance of debt, should be found sufficient to keep this great machinery in operation. The balances due to the Post Office Department are not like those due to an individual in winding up his business, which may be ascertained, collected, and the accounts closed; they are more like those of a merchant continually buying and selling; his accounts are always running—he is continually collecting; yet new balances to be collected are continually arising.

The revenue of the department arises from postages collected by more than ten thousand postmasters scattered over the whole Union, averaging from sixty to seventy dollars in three months from each; these balances must be collected, brought together in large sums, and transferred from one section of the country to another, before they can be paid to the persons entitled to them. In some parts of the country not one-half of the amount is collected in postages that is required to be paid for transporting the mail through them, and collections must be made from other parts, and transferred to the proper places before they can be made available for the payment of these expenses. It will also happen, that among more than ten thousand collecting agents, some will always be found in default; money will often be withheld, and not unfrequently till recovered by legal process. If every cent of money arising from postages was always paid over to the department the day it becomes due, and if it could also be transferred on that day in the exact proportion necessary to meet the demands of each contractor in the place where he expects to receive it, then it appears, from the reports of the department, the Postmaster General would have had occasion to borrow no more than the sum of two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. But taking into consideration the situation and circumstances under which the revenue of the department arises, it must appear to every one, that, in the payment of seven hundred thousand dollars every three months, there must have been more than ordinary care in having so managed the affairs of the department as to have anticipated its revenues to no greater amount than one hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars. The objections urged by gentlemen on the other side, are, that the Postmaster General has incurred expenses in transporting the mail beyond the revenue of his department, and has borrowed money to meet those expenses without authority. The first of these objections, the Postmaster General has explained in his annual report, which shows, that the method of keeping the accounts of the transportation of the mail was illusory. He was anxious to afford to the country all the mail facilities in his power, and the country has enjoyed the benefit of every cent that has been expended. He has procured the service of the transportation lower than what was formerly paid. Had he not been misled, as stated in his report, both in the amount of his means, and in the current expenses of the department, he would not have transcended its revenues. He, however, found his department in debt before he was aware of the fact, and as soon as the deficiency was discovered, he adopted a system of retrenchment, which, in a reasonable time, will remedy the evil. I have already partly answered the second objection which has been made; the debt was incurred before the Postmaster General was aware of it, and he has taken effectual measures for its liquidation. If then there is an apology for the department being in debt, it certainly is more equitable to owe the money to banks, than to withhold it from individuals who have earned it, and who, without receiving it, would not have had the means of transporting the mail agreeably to their respective contracts. In fact, if the money had not been borrowed, and paid to the contractors, there would have been great danger that the transportation of the mail would have ceased in many instances. The loan from the banks was made upon the credit of the department alone, and not of the Treasury; only two of the banks are among those selected by the Treasury for its deposits, and with one of them, and that the one to which more than half of the whole debt is due, the loan was partially negotiated before the removal of the deposits was known to have been contemplated, and the whole transactions have been entirely unconnected with any treasury arrangements. The first loan appears to have been obtained before the discovery of any want of means to meet the whole current expenses of the department, and seems only to have been intended to anticipate a small part of the funds, then apparently due to the department. It is not a debt of the Treasury, nor of a character to require any appropriation from it.

In the whole management of this department, the Postmaster General seems to have had but one object in view—the accommodation of the public. In this he has succeeded in an eminent degree; and although there has been an error committed in conducting the fiscal concerns of the department, which has led to too extensive public accommodations, the head of this department should stand exempted from censure. Whatever of error there is, has arisen from a desire, on his part, to render his department serviceable and beneficial to the people, and to the great additional expense thrown upon the department by the large increase of post routes, exceeding twenty thousand miles, imposed by the last Congress. This exposition I have deemed it my duty to make, in order that the public may have as correct a view of this subject as I am capable of giving, from an examination of all the documents which have been furnished to the Senate from that department, and thereby prevent injustice from being done to a faithful public officer.

The Senator from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] after the lapse of years, has again brought forward the case of Gwinn's appointment to the office of Register of a Land Office in the State of Mississippi, as a matter of accusation against this administration. I did not expect, after the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] whose feelings at one period were much excited on that subject, had ceased his complaints, to hear it brought forward by the honorable gentleman from Maine. The facts of that case were these: Mr. Gwinn was commissioned in the recess of Congress; when Congress met, he was nominated to the Senate, and rejected; and in compliance with the written request of one of the Senators from Mississippi, [Mr. ELLIS,] he was again nominated to the Senate, and upon that nomination the Senate made no decision; it was laid upon the table on the last night of the session, and not rejected, and the President, as he had a right to do, again issued to him a temporary commission.

The Senator from Maine, in order to illustrate the present condition of things in the United States, has told us that the people are prone to idolatry, and has referred us to a remarkable instance of it in the Jewish history. Had he been more minute, we should not only have been reminded of the history, but enabled to make the application to our own times. The history tells us that when Moses had remained in the mount longer than was expected, the people became clamorous, and demanded of Aaron to make gods to worship, and go before them: he required them to bring their gold, their bracelets, and their earrings, and those of their wives and daughters; they did so, and poured them down before him, and made a great pile or bank of them. Of these Aaron made a molten calf, and they worshipped it, and they sat down to eat and to drink, and they rose up to play, as many a thoughtless man now does, who has the money in his pocket for a note recently discounted in bank; but when Moses came down from the mount, he was exceedingly offended, and he put his veto upon the whole proceeding—he burned the calf and ground it into dust, and scattered it upon the waters. Now, sir, who are worshipping the golden image which they themselves have made? The Levites will not be condemned: they followed, and now follow the counsels of Moses.

It is asserted, that there is an army of office-holders, well drilled and officered, now engaged in carrying on a Presidential campaign, to bring in a successor to the present Chief Magistrate. I want evidence of the fact; when that is furnished, I will unite with the Senator from Maine in denouncing it. I concur entirely with Mr. Jefferson, in his sentiments as to what should be the conduct of federal officers in relation to the politics of the country. That enlightened statesman was of opinion, that it was "highly culpable in federal officers to interfere in the business of electioneering." When writing upon this subject, he says: "Freedom of election being essential to the mutual independence of Governments, and with the different branches of the same government, so vitally cherished by most of our constitutions, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union, to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right." He further says to the officers under him, that "he expects they will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the constitution and their duties to it."

In support of the opinion I entertain, I will refer to another high authority. The present Chief Magistrate, in his inaugural address, when speaking of executive duties which demanded particular attention, refers directly to the "correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections." Strengthened as I am by these expressions of opinion, I feel the less hesitation in saying, that every officer of the Federal Government is entitled to a free and uninterrupted right of suffrage, and should not be disturbed in the exercise of it; but, when they become partisans in elections, and attempt to control the elective franchise in others, they should be dismissed from public employment; and I should be gratified to see this principle acted out to its fullest extent, whether the officers thus engaged act with or against the party to which I belong. When I see an office-holder interfering in elections, the first idea that strikes me, is, that he is thinking of his office and his bread; and, therefore, an unfit adviser of those whose only object is the public good.

In conclusion, I will remark, that gentlemen may separate, divide, and disguise these questions as they may: the effort now making for the restoration of the deposits, is, as I have already said, but a precursor to an application by the bank for a re-charter. I verily believe the bank must go down, or we will have in our country a great moneyed power that will rule the government; not the executive only, but every department. The true question now to be decided, is, whether the people of the United States are to be governed by the constituted authorities influenced by the public will, or by an unfeeling corporation placed entirely beyond their control. Nor can I fear the threatened disasters of which gentlemen speak; I cannot believe that the wealth, prosperity, and glory of this great nation depend upon its money-changers; they may produce inconvenience and distress for a season; but these evils must pass by, and we should submit to them patiently for a time, if there be no other way to redeem ourselves from insidious corruption and splendid slavery.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 31.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

After the transaction of some preliminary business, Mr. POINDEXTER rose and observed, that, from the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WADE,] which accompanied the presentation by that gentleman of the resolutions passed by the legislature of that State, it was evident that there was to be no change in the action of Congress, at the present session, in relation to the distressed condition of the country, and the deranged state of its currency. The honorable gentleman had told the Senate, as by authority, that no bank of the United States is to be incorporated, with any modifications whatever; that the deposits of the public money are to remain in banks under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and owing no responsibility to Congress whatever; that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his disposition of the public funds, is to be controlled only by the Executive will; that the present state of things is to continue until public opinion shall apply the remedy to the existing evils of the country; and that the State banks alone are to be relied on to procure the circulation of a sound currency.

These views, coming from the source they did, were to be considered as the views of the Executive, and were to be enforced by the tremendous veto power of the Executive, which was given by those who framed the constitution for other purposes. Mr. P. did not, at this time, intend to embark in an argument on the question which grew out of the resolutions presented by the gentleman from New York, and his remarks accompanying them, which drew forth the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts; when that question again came up, he should take occasion to present his views fully on the subject; but, what he meant to say was, that we are debating here in vain; that power for the last four years had been stealing from the many to the few; and that Congress was reduced to a mere legislative machine, for the preparation of business, to be consummated or not, by the power that assumes the right to rule the destinies of the country.

The cries of the country, Mr. P. continued, are not to be heard—its distresses are not to be looked at; and we are to be turned back to the revolutionary war, and called upon to suffer for Christ's sake, all that is to be inflicted upon us. We are to be turned back to the revolutionary war, and told that the contest now, as it was then, is for money. Did gentlemen forget the Declaration of Independence? Was there any thing about a contest for money in that instrument? Was there any thing about a contest for money in the declarations of the people of Boston, when they commenced the revolution? No, sir, the arguments used then, were against the dangerous exercise of arbitrary power; and it is against that dangerous exercise of power that I shall ever continue to raise my arm.

Mr. President, (Mr. P. continued,) I have been drawn into these remarks in consequence of the importance of the subject involved, and they were intended to preface the introduction of the resolutions which I hold in my hand. My opinion is, that the whole subject should be sent to the Committee on Finance, with power given to them to send for persons and papers, that we may bring all the facts connected with it fully and fairly before the people; for if any thing can bring the people of this country back from Jacksonism to common sense, it is by giving them facts; which, when brought before them, he ventured to assert, would incontestably prove, that the distresses now pervading the country are the consequences of political schemes to bring all power into the hands of "the party."

Mr. P. then submitted the following resolutions, which were read, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the resolutions of the legislature of New York, presented to the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance, to which has been referred sundry other petitions, memorials, and resolutions on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and placing them in certain State banks, by the orders of the President of the United States.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the currency of the United States, and the effects of said removal of the deposits on the same.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the facts and circumstances, which are alleged to have rendered said removal of the deposits necessary and proper, at the time the order was given for that purpose; and, also, into the legal and constitutional power of the President of the United States, to direct and control the Secretary of the Treasury in the performance of special duties, confided to the discretion of that officer by law; as connected with the power of appointment, and removal of the heads of the several departments of the Government.

Resolved, That the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the present distress and embarrassments of the mercantile community, and the pressure experienced throughout the country, by the sudden depression in the prices of agricultural products, and every branch of industry, and also into the causes which have produced these results, and the means, if any, by which they may be averted.

Resolved, That the said committee be authorized, in the inquiries aforesaid, to send for such persons and papers as they may deem necessary to the investigation of the matters referred to them by the preceding resolutions.

NEW YORK RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to take up the proceedings and resolutions of the legislature of the State of New York, in relation to the Bank of the United States, and the removal of the public deposits, submitted yesterday, by Mr. WARREN; which motion having been carried,

Mr. WEBSTER said: It is not to be denied, sir, that the financial affairs of the country have come, at last, to such a state, that every man can see plainly the question which is presented for the decision of Congress. We have, unquestionably, before us, now, the views of the Executive, as to the nature and extent of the evils alleged to exist; and its notions, also, as to the proper remedy for such evils. That remedy is short. It is, simply, the system of administration already adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which is nothing but this—that whenever he shall think proper to remove the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, and place them wherever else he pleases, this act shall stand as the settled policy and system of the country; and this system shall rest upon the authority of the Executive alone. This is now to be our future policy, as I understand the grave significant import of the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from New York, and as I perceive they are generally understood, and as they are evidently understood by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] who has alluded to them on presenting his resolutions this morning. I wish, sir, to take this, the earliest opportunity, of stating my opinions upon this subject; and that opinion is, that the remedy proposed by the administration for the evils under which the country is at this time suffering, cannot bring relief, will not give satisfaction, and cannot be acquiesced in. I think the country, on the other hand, will show much dissatisfaction; and that from no motive of hostility to the Government, from no disposition to make the currency of the country turn upon political events or to make political events turn upon the question of the currency; but simply because, in my judgment, the system is radically defective—totally insufficient—carrying with it little confidence of the public, and none at all more than it acquires merely by the influence of the name which recommends it.

I do not intend now, Mr. President, to go into a regular and formal argument to prove the constitutional power of Congress to establish a national bank. That question has been argued a hundred times, and always settled the same way. The whole history of the country, for almost forty years, proves that such a power has been believed to exist. All previous Congresses, or nearly all, have admitted or sanctioned it; the judicial tribunals, Federal and State, have sanctioned it. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared the constitutionality of the present bank, after the most solemn argument, without a dissenting voice on the bench.

Every successive President has, tacitly or expressly, admitted the power. The present President has done this; he has informed Congress that he could furnish the plan of a bank which should conform to the Constitution. In objecting to the re-charter of the present Bank, he objected for particular reasons; and he has said that a bank of the United States would be useful and convenient for the people.

All this authority, I think, ought to settle the question. Both the members from New York, however, are still unsatisfied; they both deny the power of Congress to establish a bank. Now, sir, I shall not argue the question at this time; but I will repeat what I said yesterday. It does appear to me, that the late measures of the administration prove, incontestably, and by a very short course of reasoning, the constitutionality of a bank. What I said yesterday, and what I say to-day, is, that since the Secretary, and all who agree with the Secretary, admit the necessity of the agency of some bank to carry on the affairs of Government, I was at a loss to see where they could find power to use a State bank, and yet find no power to create a bank of the United States. The gentleman's perception may be sharp enough to see a distinction between these two cases, but it is too minute for my grasp. It is not said, in terms, in the constitution, that Congress may create a bank; nor is it said, in terms, that Congress may use a bank created by a State. How then, does it get authority to do either? No otherwise, certainly, than that it possesses power to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying its enumerated powers into effect. If a law were now before us for confirming the arrangement of the Secretary, and adopting twenty State banks into the service of the United States, as fiscal agents of the Government, where would the honorable gentleman find authority for passing such a law? No where but in that clause of the constitution to which I have referred; that is to say, the clause which authorizes Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying its granted powers into effect. If such a law were before us, and the honorable member proposed to vote for it, he would be obliged to prove that the agency of a bank is a thing both necessary and proper for carrying on the Government. If he could not make this out, the law would be unconstitutional. We see the Secretary admits the necessity of this bank agency; the gentleman himself admits it, nay, contends for it. A bank agency is his main reliance. All the hopes expressed by himself or his colleague, of being able to get on with the present state of things, rest on the expected efficiency of a bank agency.

A bank, then, or some bank, being admitted to be both necessary and proper for carrying on the Government, and the Secretary proposing, on that very ground, and no other, to employ the State banks, how does he make out a distinction between passing a law for using a necessary agent, already created, and a law for creating a similar agent, to be used, when created, for the same purpose? If there be any distinction, as it seems to me, it is rather in favor of creating a bank by the authority of Congress, with such powers, and no others, as the service expected from it requires, answerable to Congress, and always under the control of Congress, than of employing as our agents banks created by other Governments, for other purposes, and over which this Government has no control.

But, sir, whichever power is exercised, both spring from the same source; and the power to establish a bank, on the ground that its agency is necessary and proper for the ends and uses of Government, is at least as plainly constitutional as the power to adopt banks for the same uses and objects, which are already made by other Governments. Indeed, the legal act is, in both cases, the same. When Congress makes a bank, it creates an agency; when it adopts a State bank, it creates an agency. If there be power for one, therefore, there is power for the other. No power to create a corporation is expressly given to Congress; nor is Congress any where forbidden to create a corporation. The creation of a corporation is an act of law, and, when it passes, the only question is, whether it be a necessary and proper law for carrying on the Government advantageously. And the case will be precisely the same when we shall be asked to pass a law for confirming the Secretary's arrangement with State banks. Each is constitutional, if Congress may fairly regard it as a necessary measure.

The honorable member, sir, quoted me as having said that I regarded the bank as one of the greatest bonds of the union of the States. That is not exactly what I said. What I did say was, that the constitutional power vested in Congress over the legal currency of the country, was one of its very highest powers, and that the exercise of this high power was one of the strongest bonds of the union of the States. And this I say still. Sir, the gentleman did not go to the constitution. He did not tell us how he understands it, or how he proposes to execute the great trust which it devolves on Congress, in respect to the circulating medium. I can only say, sir, how I understand it.

The constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." And it also declares that "no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." Congress, then, and Congress only, can coin money, and regulate the value thereof. Now, sir, I take it to be a truth, which has grown into an admitted maxim with all the best writers, and the best informed public men, that those whose duty it is to protect the community against the evils of a debased coin, are bound also to protect it against the still greater evils of excessive issues of paper.

If the public require protection, says Mr. Ricardo, against bad money, which might be imposed on them by an undue mixture of alloy, how much more necessary is such protection, when paper money forms almost the whole of the circulating medium of the country?

It is not to be doubted, sir, that the constitution intended that Congress should exercise a regulating power—a power both necessary and salutary, over that which should constitute the actual money of the country, whether that money were coin, or the representative of coin. So it has always been considered; so Mr. Madison considered it, as may be seen in his message, December, 1816. He there says:

"Upon this general view of the subject, it is obvious that there is only wanting to the fiscal prosperity of the Government the restoration of a uniform medium of exchange. The resources and the faith of the nation, displayed in the system which Congress has established, insure respect and confidence both at home and abroad. The local accumulations of the revenue have already enabled the treasury to meet the public engagements in the local currency of most of the States; and it is expected that the same cause will produce the same effect throughout the Union. But for the interests of the community at large, as well as for the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit, and use, wherever it may circulate. The constitution has intrusted Congress exclusively with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description; and the measures which were taken during the last session, in execution of the power, give every promise of success. The Bank of the United States has been organized under auspices the most favorable, and cannot fail to be an important auxiliary to those measures."

The State banks put forth paper as representing coin. As such representative, it obtains circulation; it becomes the money of the country; but its amount depends on the will of four hundred different State banks, each acting on its own discretion; and in the absence of every thing preventive or corrective, on the part of the United States, what security is there against excessive issues, and, consequently, against depreciation? The public feels that there is no security against these evils; it has learned this from experience; and this very feeling, this distrust of the paper of State banks, is the very evil which they themselves have to encounter; and it is a very serious evil. They know that confidence in them is far greater when there exists a power elsewhere to prevent excess and depreciation. Such a power, therefore, is friendly to their best interests. It gives confidence and credit to them, one and all. Hence, a vast majority of the State banks, nearly all, perhaps, except those who expect to be objects of particular favor, desire the continuance of a national bank, as an institution highly useful to themselves.

The mode in which the operations of a national institution afford security against excessive issues by local banks is not violent, coercive, or injurious. On the contrary, it is gentle, salutary, and friendly. The result is brought about by the natural and easy operation of things. The money of the Bank of the United States, having a more wide-spread credit and character, is constantly wanted for purposes of remittance. It is purchased, therefore, for this purpose, and paid for in the bills of local banks; and it may be purchased, of course, at par, or near it, if these local bills are offered in the neighborhood of their own banks, and these banks are in good credit. These local bills then return to the bank that issued them. The result is that while the local bills will or may supply, in great part, the local circulation, (not being capable, for want of more extended credit, of being remitted to great distances,) their amount is thus limited to the purposes of local circulation; and any considerable excess, beyond this, finds in due season a salutary corrective. This is one of the known benefits of the bank. Every man of business understands it, and the whole country has realized the security which this course of things has produced.

But, sir, as to the question of the deposits, the honorable gentleman thinks he sees, at last, the curtain raised;

SENATE.]

New York Resolutions.

he sees the object of the whole debate. He insists that the question of the restoration of the deposits, and the question of rechartering the bank, are the same question. It strikes me, sir, as being strange, that the gentleman did not draw an exactly opposite inference from his own premises. He says he sees the Northern friends of the bank, and the Southern opposers of the bank, agreeing for the restoration of the deposits. This is true; and does not this prove that the question is a separate one? On the one question, the North and the South are together; on the other, they separate: either their apprehensions are obtuse, or else this very statement shows the questions to be distinct.

Sir, since the gentleman has referred to the North and the South, I will venture to ask him if he sees nothing important in the aspect which the South presents? On this question of the deposits, does he not behold almost an entire unanimity in the South? How many, from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico, defend the removal? For myself, I declare that I have not heard a member of Congress from beyond the Potomac say, either in or out of his seat, that he approved the measure. Can the gentleman see nothing in this but proof that the deposit question and the question of recharter are the same? Sir, gentlemen must judge for themselves; but it appears plain enough to me, that the President has lost more friends at the South by this interference with the public deposits than by any or all other measures.

I must be allowed now, sir, to advert to a remark, in the speech of the honorable member from New York on the left of the Chair, [Mr. WAIGHT,] as I find it in a morning paper. It is this:

"Be assured, sir, whatever nice distinctions may be drawn here as to the show of influence which expressions of the popular will upon such a subject are entitled to from us, it is possible for that will to assume a constitutional shape, which the Senate cannot misunderstand, and, understanding, will not unwisely resist."

[Mr. WAIGHT said, it should have been share of influence.]

Mr. WEBSTER continued. That does not alter the sense. Mr. President, I wish to keep the avenues of public opinion, from the whole country to the Capitol, all open, broad, and wide. I desire always to know the state of that opinion on great and important subjects. From me, that opinion always has received, and always will receive, the most respectful attention and consideration. And whether it be expressed by State legislatures, or by public meetings, or be collected from individual expressions, in whatever form it comes, it is always welcome. But, sir, the legislation for the United States must be conducted here. The law of Congress must be the will of Congress, and the proceedings of Congress its own proceedings. I hope nothing intimidating was intended by this expression. [Mr. WAIGHT intimated it was not.] Then, sir, I forbear further remark.

Sir, there is one other subject on which I wish to raise my voice. There is a topic which I perceive is to become the general war-cry of party, on which I take the liberty to warn the country against delusion. Sir, the cry is to be raised, that this is a question between the poor and the rich. I know, sir, it has been proclaimed, that one thing was—certain that there was always a hatred from the poor to the rich; and that this hatred would support the late measures, and the putting down of the bank. Sir, I will not be silent at the threatening of such a detestable fraud on public opinion. If but one man, or ten men, in the nation will hear my voice, I will still warn them against this attempted imposition.

Mr. President, this is an eventful moment. On the great questions which occupy us, we all look for some decisive movement of public opinion. As I wish that movement to be free, intelligent, and unbiassed, the true manifestation of the public will, I desire to prepare the country for another assault, which I perceive is about to be made on popular prejudice, another attempt to obscure all distinct views of the public good, to overwhelm all patriotism, and all enlightened self-interests, by loud cries against false danger, and by exciting the passions of one class against the other. I am not mistaken in the omen; I see the magazine whence the weapons of this warfare are to be drawn. I already hear the din of the hammering of arms, preparatory to the combat. They may be such arms, perhaps, as reason, and justice, and honest patriotism cannot resist. Every effort at resistance, it is possible, may be feeble and powerless; but for one I shall make an effort—an effort to be begun now, and to be carried on and continued, with untiring zeal, till the end of the contest comes.

Sir, I see in those vehicles which carry to the people sentiments from high places, plain declarations that the present controversy is but a strife between one part of the community and another. I hear it boasted as the unflinching security, the solid ground, never to be shaken, on which recent measures rest, that the poor naturally hate the rich. I know, that, under the shade of the roofs of the Capitol, within the last twenty-four hours, among men sent here to devise means for the public safety and the public good, it has been vaunted forth, as a matter of boast and triumph, that one cause existed, powerful enough to support every thing, and to defend every thing, and that was—the natural hatred of the poor to the rich.

Sir, I pronounce the author of such sentiments to be guilty of attempting a detestable fraud on the community; a double fraud; a fraud which is to cheat men out of their property, and out of the earnings of their labor, by first cheating them out of their understandings.

"The natural hatred of the poor to the rich!" Sir, it shall not be till the last moment of my existence; it shall be only when I am drawn to the verge of oblivion; when I shall cease to have respect or affection for any thing on earth; that I will believe the people of the United States capable of being effectually deluded, cajoled, and driven about in herds, by such abominable frauds as this. If they shall sink to that point; if they so far cease to be men, thinking men, intelligent men, as to yield to such pretences and such clamor, they will be slaves already—slaves to their own passions—slaves to the fraud and knavery of pretended friends. They will deserve to be blotted out of all the records of freedom; they ought not to dishonor the cause of self-government, by attempting any longer to exercise it; they ought to keep their unworthy hands entirely off from the cause of republican liberty, if they are capable of being the victims of artifices so shallow—of tricks so stale, so threadbare, so often practised, so much worn out, on serfs and slaves.

"The natural hatred of the poor against the rich!"

"The danger of a moneyed aristocracy!" "A power as great and dangerous as that resisted by the Revolution!"

"A call to a new Declaration of Independence!"

Sir, I admonish the people against the objects of outcries like these. I admonish every industrious laborer in the country to be on his guard against such delusion. I tell him the attempt is to play off his passions against his interests, and to prevail on him, in the name of liberty, to destroy all the fruits of liberty; in the name of patriotism, to injure and afflict his country; and, in the name of his own independence, to destroy that very independence, and make him a beggar and a slave. Has he a dollar? He is advised to do that which will destroy half its value. Has he hands to labor? Let him rather fold them and sit still, than be pushed on, by fraud and artifice, to support measures which will render his labor useless and hopeless.

Sir, the very man, of all others, who has the deepest interest in a sound currency, and who suffers most by mischievous legislation in money matters, is the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil. A depreciated currency, changes of prices, paper money, falling between morning and noon, and falling still lower between noon and night—these things constitute the very harvest-time of speculators, and of the whole race of those who are at once idle and crafty; and of that other race, too, the Catilines of all times, marked, so as to be known forever by one stroke of the historian's pen, men greedy of other men's property, and prodigal of their own. Capitalists, too, may outlive such times. They may either prey on the earnings of labor, by their cent per cent., or they may hoard. But the laboring man—what can he hoard? Preying on nobody, he becomes the prey of all. His property is in his hands. His reliance, his fund, his productive freehold, his all, is his labor. Whether he work on his own small capital, or on another's, his living is still earned by his industry; and when the money of the country becomes depreciated and debased, whether it be adulterated coin or paper without credit, that industry is robbed of its reward. He then labors for a country whose laws cheat him out of his bread. I would say to every owner of every quarter section of land in the West—I would say to every man in the East, who follows his own plough, and to every mechanic, artisan, and laborer, in every city in the country; I would say to every man, every where, who wishes, by honest means, to gain an honest living, "Beware of wolves in sheep's clothing. Whoever attempts, under whatever popular cry, to shake the stability of the public currency, bring on distress in money matters, and drive the country into paper money, stabs your interest and your happiness to the heart."

The herd of hungry wolves, who live on other men's earnings, will rejoice in such a state of things. A system which absorbs into their pockets the fruits of other men's industry, is the very system for them. A Government that produces or countenances uncertainty, fluctuations, violent risings and fallings in prices, and, finally, paper money, is a Government exactly after their own heart. Hence, these men are always for change. They will never let well enough alone. A condition of public affairs, in which property is safe, industry certain of its reward, and every man secure in his own hard-earned gains, is no paradise for them. Give them just the reverse of this state of things: bring on change, and change after change; let it not be known to-day what will be the value of property to-morrow; let no man be able to say whether the money in his pockets at night will be money or worthless rags in the morning; and depress labor till double work shall earn but half a living—give them this state of things, and you give them the consummation of their earthly bliss.

Sir, the great interest of this great country, the producing cause of all its prosperity, is labor! labor! labor! We are a laboring community. A vast majority of us all live by industry and actual occupation, in some of their forms.

The constitution was made to protect this industry, to give it both encouragement and security; but, above all, security. To that very end, with that precise object in view, power was given to Congress over the currency, and over the money system of the country. In forty years' experience, we have found nothing at all adequate to the beneficial execution of this trust but a well-conducted national bank. That has been tried, returned to, tried again, and always found successful. If it be not the proper thing for us, let it be soberly argued against; let something better be proposed; let the country examine the matter coolly, and decide for itself. But whoever shall attempt to carry a question of this kind by clamor, and violence, and prejudice; whoever would rouse the people by appeals, false and fraudulent appeals, to their love of independence, to resist the establishment of a useful institution, because it is a bank, and deals in money; and whoever artfully urges these appeals whenever he thinks there is more of honest feeling than of enlightened judgment, means nothing but deception. And whoever has the wickedness to conceive, and the hardihood to avow, a purpose to break down what has been found, in forty years' experience, essential to the protection of all interests, by arraying one class against another, and by acting on such a principle as that the poor always hate the rich, shows himself the reckless enemy of all. An enemy to his whole country, to all classes, and to every man in it, he deserves to be marked especially as the poor man's curse!

Mr. President, I feel that it becomes me to bring to the present crisis all of intellect, all of diligence, all of devotion to the public good, that I possess. I act, sir, in opposition to nobody. I desire rather to follow the administration, in a proper remedy for the present distress, than to lead. I have felt so from the beginning, and I have felt so until the declaration of yesterday made it certain that there is no further measure to be proposed. The expectation is, that the country will get on under the present state of things. Being myself entirely of a different opinion, and looking for no effectual relief until some other measure is adopted, I shall, nevertheless, be most happy to be disappointed. But if I shall not be mistaken, if the pressure shall continue, and if the indications of general public sentiment shall point in that direction, I shall feel it my duty, let the consequences be what they may, to propose a law for altering and continuing the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT then rose and said that it was not his intention to do an act of injustice to the gentleman who was entitled to the floor; but merely to say that a few of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts required a reply from him. He then stated that he had not intended to make any observations in reference to the charter of the United States Bank, nor should he continue the argument on that subject. He would say one word more. His colleague was not now in his place, being so unwell as to be obliged to keep his room. On another occasion, he should desire to make some reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, so far as they were personal to himself. He would now move to lay the subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The CHAIR then announced the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the removal of the deposits.

Mr. GRUNDY then resumed and concluded his remarks, as given heretofore entire.

And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

Mr. SHEPLEY presented the resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Portland, praying for a restoration of the deposits to the United States Bank. He stated that the memorialists were very respectable citizens, although differing from him as to the points embraced in the resolutions. He further said, that the resolutions did not assume to convey the opinions of the city of Portland.

Mr. SHEPLEY also presented the resolutions of the legislature of Maine against the restoration of the deposits, and in favor of their removal; and also against the re-charter of the United States Bank; and instructing their Senators to vote accordingly.

Mr. SHEPLEY said that he wished to make a few observations in relation to the resolutions which he had the honor to present. He would observe, that the State of Maine possessed a seacoast of more than 300 miles in extent—had rivers of considerable magnitude extending far into the interior of the country, and was also in possession of a large territory covered with timber, which was converting into building materials and transported to market. There were also numerous and valuable quarries of marble in the State. He [Mr. S.] would observe, that she was deeply interested in a sound currency, as might be supposed, from her extensive traffic. So great was the trade that was carried on by Maine, in the articles to which he had alluded, as well as in domestic manufactures, with the British provinces, that it extended to more than 500 miles of their borders, and to the various cities of the Union, and was very valuable. Much of the success of a very enterprising and industrious people was dependent upon the successful protection of their interests, and certainly they must be considered as understanding them.

These resolutions had been passed in the House of Representatives of the State, by a vote of 119 to 53, and, in the Senate, by 52 to 2.

From these facts, it would be perceived that a large majority of the State of Maine do not regard the conduct of the President in the light that his colleague [Mr. SPRAGUE] does. They do not consider him, by the exercise of what had been called the veto power, as accumulating power in himself, or in this Government. On the contrary, they regarded what is charged to be an assumption and accumulation of power, as a proposition of the power attempted to be assumed. They had seen the President, in the exercise of the veto power, breaking down the assumption of power which had been commenced in regard to the internal concerns of the State; and they had also seen the exercise of the same power, not in accumulating more power, but in prostrating the power of the bank, which was calculated to control all their money transactions, and to bring them and their great and growing interests under its influence. They therefore wished to be delivered from such a power.

The topics which had been discussed by his honorable colleague, had all been under discussion in the legislature of Maine, and among the people, and they had most strongly indicated their opinions in the resolutions which he was now desired to present to the Senate. He would say that he entirely concurred in all the opinions therein expressed.

He concluded with moving that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he had received copies of the resolutions just read to the Senate. It was not his purpose to have made any remarks on the presentation of the documents now laid before the Senate. He did not suppose it would be a matter of interest, or gratifying to the feelings of the Senate, to see what was so well known, that a diversity of opinion existed between his colleague and himself on the high matters which had been the subject of so interesting a discussion. Least of all did he anticipate that any remarks made by him, on a former occasion, would have been adverted to by his colleague, making that diversity of opinion between them the subject of open and palpable notoriety before the people. The people, he acknowledged, were the source of all power, and to their decision he felt himself bound to bow; and he should obey their will, in all things, if it was in accordance with the oath that he had taken to support the constitution, and his own sense of propriety. But, sir, said he, it is said that these resolutions speak the sentiments of a majority of the people of Maine. Sir, I pause for the evidence to support that assertion. I see among the names signed at Portland, many of the most highly respectable and distinguished citizens; signed, too, without distinction of party, and among them the names of men who, five years ago, gave their votes in favor of the present Chief Magistrate. James C. Church-hill's name was found amongst them, with names of merchants, practical mechanics, and, in fact, men of business in every line of life.

Sir, said he, I hear these men speak, and they tell us that the late measure of the Executive is the cause of that all-pervading distress which is grinding them to the dust. They tell us that some relief must be afforded, or that their hopes are blasted; and they tell us this without distinction of party. The resolutions presented by his colleague came from a source he was bound to respect; but he must say, that they emanated from a political party, and were adopted by a party vote. He had yet, however, to learn from the people of his State, whether they met with their entire approbation, or whether they looked upon them as he did, as destructive of the best interests of the country. Sir, [said Mr. S.] when I learn that it is the will of the people of my State to support the Chief Magistrate of the United States, right or wrong, it will then be my time to pursue that course which duty points out, and this, sir, is well known to them. Sir, said he, I do not, as I said before, intend to enter into any argument on this question. I am not responsible to this Senate, nor to any individual Senator. I am willing, as it is well known, to meet any responsibility demanded by my situation, and shall cheerfully acquiesce in the decision of the people on my conduct, past or to come.

Mr. S. regretted exceedingly the necessity of making these few remarks; but he trusted that the Senate would excuse him when they saw that that necessity was so apparent. No profession he had ever made, no principle he had ever entertained, had ever been departed from; and he was well satisfied that the people gave him credit for the avowal. No allegation to the contrary had ever been made, or ever would be. His political conduct had always been governed by principles purely republican, imbibed from the cradle, and which will abide with him to the grave: principles of republicanism inculcated by paternal admonition, and so strongly implanted, that they could never be departed from; and by which, together with a sense of conscious rectitude, he had always been sustained. On these he rested, with a consciousness that, sooner or later, justice would be done him.

Mr. SHEPLEY repeated that the memorial of the citizens of Portland did not pretend to be the opinion of the city. In the resolutions of the legislature all the representatives of Portland concurred. He further stated that an anti-Jackson member of the Senate had expressed his belief that the President had assumed too much power, but that it would be inexpedient to restore the deposits.

The motion to refer and print was then agreed to.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from citizens of Pittsburg, praying for a return of the deposits. He stated that he had presented this memorial at the request of the gentleman who represented Pittsburg in the other House, and had been requested by him to state that this memorial, as well as one which had been presented a few days before by his colleague, [Mr. WILKINS,] had been signed indiscriminately by all parties. He stated that he had also been requested to submit a letter on the subject to any gentleman who desired to see it. The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINS, after stating that he was at issue with his relative and townsman in the other House, as to the fact of the memorial being signed without distinction of parties, admitted that there were signers of the memorial who had been called Jackson men, but who had been seceders from the party after the bank veto. He then presented some memorials from Pittsburg, praying Congress not to interfere in the subject of the deposits; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee on Finance and to be printed.

Instructions to Finance Committee.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that the names of the memorialists should, in all these cases, be printed; which was agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO FINANCE COMMITTEE.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions proposing certain instructions to the Committee on Finance, offered by him on Friday.

Mr. POINDEXTER then said, that, as he was not desirous to interfere with the regular debate before the Senate, and as the hour had nearly arrived for the resumption of that debate, he was willing to forego the remarks which he had intended to make on the occasion. If it should accord with the sense of the Senate to take the vote forthwith, although he had been anxious to explain his views, he would willingly wait for some other opportunity, and consult only now the accommodation of the Senator who was about to speak on the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed his reluctance to obtrude himself on the Senate, and he would therefore, at present, content himself with asking the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he had designed to attribute to any remarks which had fallen from him, [Mr. WRIGHT,] the construction that there was an effort to excite the natural hatred of the poor against the rich. If not, he should now make no further reply; but if he had so intended, he should feel himself called upon to say a few words in reply.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had imputed no such language or design to any member of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he had adopted that opinion from the report of the Senator's remarks in the public papers. He would then confine himself to another remark. He had stated that the amount of the curtailments of the United States Bank, between the 1st of August and the 1st of December, was $9,600,000. The reply was, that the curtailments had proceeded, pari passu, with the withdrawal of the deposits. He then referred to some arithmetical details, to show that this was not precisely the case throughout.

Mr. WEBSTER desired to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Mississippi, and also to the Senator from Kentucky, as to the propriety of referring the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance. If that were done, the Committee could at once take up that report, and make their report upon it without delay, although they might not be able to report on those other points concerning which examinations were intended to be taken. He did not think that this reference would interfere with the pending discussion on the resolutions, which might go on. If this course were opposed, he would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi to modify his resolutions, so as to refer, with the other matters, the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POINDEXTER considered this as a question of order, whether, during a debate on an official document, that document could be referred to a Committee, without interrupting the discussion before the Senate. If such a course were in order, he should make no objection, and would be willing to make the modification suggested. But he was unwilling to interpose any check to the discussion which was going on. He was not sufficiently conversant with the rules of order, to determine whether the report could be before the committee, and under discussion by the Senate, at the same time.

Mr. CLAY said that he had no objection to the reference of the communication of the Secretary, provided it was the general understanding of the Senate that the discussion should go on. He was desirous that the debate should not be interrupted, because the question in-involved what he considered to be far higher considerations than those of mere money, far transcending in importance the question of bank or no bank. He wished to reserve to himself, before the conclusion of the debate, the opportunity of being heard on this point. If there was a general understanding, therefore, that the debate should go on, he would make no objection to the motion.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed his opinion, that the second resolution of the Senator from Kentucky referred solely to the reasons of the Secretary, and could not be debated unless the original report should be before the Senate. He should, if he was right in this view, object to the reference of the paper, as he should probably desire to be heard at some period of the discussion on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT gave his decision that the debate could not go on, in the absence of the report of the Secretary.

Mr. CLAY wished to make a suggestion, for the purpose of obviating the difficulty which existed. There was nothing before the Senate but the report of the Secretary; and, as the same subject was adverted to in the message of the President, every purpose might be answered by referring that part of the message to the Committee on Finance. [Several voices—"It has been referred."] Then the subject was already before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEBSTER said the difficulty was, that the message of the President did not contain the Secretary's reasons. The members of the Committee on Finance might feel some hesitation to enter into the debate on the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, when they would afterwards be required to throw their opinions into the form of a report. He thought there would be little to be gained by a reference of the subject, unless that reference should be speedily made. The Committee on Finance, it was true, had not been inattentive to the subject, and would be prepared to make a report in the course of a day after the reference should be made. They had desired to make a report, but they were constrained to wait until they had some ground committed to them on which to found their report.

Mr. POINDEXTER requested the second resolution might be read, and stated that it did not necessarily follow that the original report should be before the Senate while the debate was in progress. The report had been printed, and was on every Senator's file, and in possession of every member. It was, therefore, fully competent for the Senate to continue this discussion without the original document before them. There was no such indissoluble connexion between the debate and the report of the Secretary, and any Senator who desired a reference, could turn to his file. If he were right, his own preference would be to send the report to the Committee on Finance, as the committee would make a report in the course of a day or two, and then all the subject would be on the table of the Senate. He should regret exceedingly to interrupt the pending discussion, although he did not see any good which was likely to be effected by influencing the administration. The only benefit which could result, would be that which might be effected by appealing to the patriotism and intelligence of the people, against the usurpation by the Executive of the powers of all the departments. He was willing to modify his resolutions if the discussion could proceed.

Mr. WEBSTER then continued, that, to relieve the Senate from the difficulty, he would, after the discussion to-day, move to refer the letter of the Secretary to the Committee on Finance, and would pledge himself to bring in the report of the committee to-morrow evening.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, sustained the decision of the chair, that the reference of the report of the Secretary must carry with it the discussion. He thought the letter should have been sent, in the first instance, to the Committee on Finance. He was at a loss to discern what object would be gained by adopting the resolutions of the gentleman from Mississippi. They did not vary the course which the subject had taken, or extend the views which were to be presented to the committee. Nor could it be necessary to coerce the committee by any instructions. He thought there was an assumption in one of the resolutions, that all the distress in the country had resulted from the removal of the depositories, which ought not to be included in the resolutions without deliberation and discussion.

Mr. POINDEXTER read the resolution in order to show that there was no such assumption contained in the resolutions.

Mr. CHAMBERS expressed a wish that the resolutions should not be pressed at this time, but should be permitted to lie on the table until to-morrow.

Mr. WILKINS made an objection to the arrangement proposed, by which the report was to be referred, because he thought the effect might be to cut off the debate, after the gentleman from New Jersey had finished, and thus preclude him [Mr. WILKINS] from having an opportunity of delivering his sentiments.

Mr. WEBSTER repeated what he had before said, in order to set the gentleman from Pennsylvania right as to his intention, and said that he would waive his motion to refer the report until after the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have spoken; and as he did not know who was to follow in the line of succession, he could not then be accused of partiality.

Mr. FORSYTH said that the resolutions would stop the debate altogether. They required the committee to examine into all the subjects which are now under discussion, and must necessarily sweep the whole subject from before the Senate. It was also impossible for the Committee on Finance to take up the subjects in the resolutions, without having the report before them. He thought it would be better to let the resolutions lie until the Senate should have disposed of the report.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked whether the mover of the resolutions intended, by the language employed, that the committee should be authorized to call before them the late Secretary of the Treasury, to explain the circumstances connected with his removal. He wished this matter understood, to the intent that if the Senate should doubt, he might submit a distinct resolution. The country felt a deep interest in the political history of the matter. It was intimately connected with the removal of the depositories. The individual alluded to had, on more than one occasion, declined making such a disclosure. He had repeated this unwillingness to put the facts before the public, in a correspondence with a distinguished citizen of Virginia, acting as the organ of his fellow-citizens, published within a day or two. There was, therefore, no prospect of a development of these matters by any other mode except by a resolution of one of the Houses of Congress; it related to a highly important political occurrence, and the country had a just expectation that its history should not be kept secret.

Mr. POINDEXTER explained that his resolutions gave the power to the committee to send for the late Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Duane,) and also for the other members of the cabinet who had given their written opinions against the act of the Executive and had yet been permitted to retain their places at the council board. But, while it gave all this power to the committee, they had the direction to use it as they might think most proper. He did not see what objections could be urged against his resolutions. There seemed to be some skittishness, some fear, lest the investigation should not lead to the results that were wished. He thought these fears were unfounded. He concluded with asking that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACK demanded a division of the question.

After a few words from Mr. BIBB, which were delivered in a very low tone, but in which he expressed his wish that the subject should lie over until to-morrow,

Mr. CLAY moved to lay the resolutions on the table, in order to take up the Special Order.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolutions were then laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to Congress on the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States, involves a grave question of all political power, interesting to freemen, and eventful in all its relations—to the Secretary, the Executive, and the country. I had entertained the hope, sir, that it might receive a calm, free, and full discussion. The occasion seemed to be propitious to such hopes. The Executive had entered upon his second and probably final term of office. He had been again exalted to that elevated station by an amount of suffrage almost without example. There could exist no motive, in any just mind, to obstruct his measures or embarrass his administration of the Government, without cogent and pressing reasons? What should, therefore, hinder the dispassionate and unrestrained investigation of the great principles of fundamental law, which as well found as assign distinct portions of power to the several and co-ordinate departments of the Government? And yet, Mr. President, no sooner is a voice raised in Congress to question the late act of the President removing the depositories, than the loud clamors of the press assail and denounce all interference and controversy. I have complaint to make that is deep and strong against this procedure. Sir, it is among the prominent proofs of the tendency towards inordinate power in the Executive, that a measure of national policy cannot be opposed or doubted, but it is at once construed into hostility to the President. The man is put in front of the measure; and if you resist his measures, you are regarded as inimical to himself. This intervention of personal popularity, to sustain or carry through the plans of public policy, is adverse to the very genius of our institutions. The great principles of our Government refer to its three Departments, more as political existences, to be chiefly known and felt in the benefits and blessings that may flow to the people through their agency. We would all consider it a marvellous attempt that should endeavor to uphold the judiciary, or the Congress, by the popularity of the members composing these bodies. Sir, we review their doings; we look into the reasons of judgment, and into the causes for legislation, and approve, or otherwise, as the matters decided or enacted commend themselves to right reason and sound policy. But how is it with the Executive in practice? what have we seen in this very measure now under consideration? Why, sir, a cabinet paper, read by the Executive to his council, so confidential, in his view, that a copy is refused to the Senate, is yet directly, and long before the meeting of Congress, spread before the people! Wherefore this singular proceeding? I had been taught to believe that the constitution intended to check this propensity by interposing the co-ordinate and legislative branches of the Government.

We are met, at the threshold of this discussion, by an objection that, if it prevail, it will effectually shut the door upon all investigation by the Senate into the powers of the Executive, and encroach upon much of its legislation. The difficulty is raised on the peculiar constitution and powers of this body. The Senate holding the functions of a judicial tribunal in the trial of impeachments, it is objected to the resolutions under consideration that they charge the Executive with high crimes and misdemeanors, and that it is inconsistent with the decorum of our political relations to impute such charge. Now, sir, for answer to all this, I maintain, in the first place, that the Senate could not, in the faithful discharge of its public duty, yield to such a plea against its interference; because, having in its possession legislative, executive, and judicial powers, it is bound to exercise them, as they respectively come before it; and if any seeming collision should even occur, why, sir, we are not therefore to shrink from the discharge of our duty, but advance in it, as we may, with the partial inconveniences of occasional clashing. But, in the next place, sir, I cannot agree that the resolutions, rightly considered, contain any imputation of crime or misdemeanor. They affirm, of the course pursued by the President towards the Secretary of the Treasury and the deposits, that it is an infringement of the constitution, and therefore dangerous to the liberties of the people; and this may be predicated of every departure from the fundamental law of the Union. But does this charge, or even imply crime in the Executive? Far from it. How, in fact, does this question stand in relation to all the departments of the Government and country? Why, sir, the powers delegated and the powers reserved in our constitution, are, and have been, from the beginning, matters for constant, animated, and I will add honest discussion and collision. If to differ on these great points implied crime, the atmosphere of both Houses of Congress would be very dangerous; for, throughout our whole history, these have been themes of thrilling interest and debate. The intercourse of the Executive with Congress will take off the edge, at least, of this grave charge. He frequently returned bills with this only objection, that they violated the constitution. Sir, the bill sent to him on the very subject of this bank was sent back, among other reasons, because some of its provisions were inconsistent with constitutional law. And did the President, therefore, impute to Congress the wicked and corrupt design of violating the constitution, which alone amounts to crime and guilt? I trust and believe not. I really considered this objection, when it was first urged, as an equivocal kind of defence. I did not believe the Executive would hold it in much favor; for, to do him justice, I will say that he is not apt to shrink from the responsibility of his measures. He comes manfully along by the side of his public acts, and, had not his official organ made a serious point of it, I should have concluded that this way of magnifying indifferent matters, this aggravating of misapprehension into crime, for the purpose of shutting out all scrutiny into the conduct of officers, was not acceptable to the President himself.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

These resolutions presuppose, that, however we may differ with the President on the nature and extent of his powers, in him, as well as ourselves, it is an honest diversity of opinion; that the constitution, consisting of fundamental rules alone, must contain little more than general principles, on the construction of which we must expect various and conflicting interpretations.

Having removed these preliminary difficulties, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to a brief consideration of the late executive order, which has been the cause of such deep and wide-spread alarm and distrust. Gentlemen have endeavored to find an apology for this measure in their opposition to the bank as a national institution; they have denounced it as a dangerous and daring agent; and have even invoked the spirit of the revolution to strangle the monster. We have been told that this achievement is yet wanting to complete the President's career—to fill the measure of his fame with all the rays of glory that it can hold. Sir, I mean the remark in no disrespect, but such extravagant terms struck me as quite ludicrous. The bank a dangerous agent, sir! Where is the proof? Is it in sixteen years of prosperous commerce and business? Does the thriving industry of the country, animated by certain wages and sound pay, show it to have been disastrous? Under its healthful influence, the poor man, when he earned a dollar, had a dollar; and is this ground of accusation? or were the streams of your prosperity too full? If any dangers have attended the operations of the bank, they have been those which result from successful enterprise, and its rich rewards.

It is amusing to recall the struggles of the revolution to our aid, when it is matter of history, that, while its eventful scenes were yet near and fresh, when the triumphs of freedom were complete, and its foundations well laid in our political system, among the first cares of the exalted men who had borne the heat of those conflicts, was the regulation of currency by means of a national bank. Strange, indeed, if so mischievous to free institutions, that the jealous and watchful spirit of our forefathers not only did not discover it, but actually created the monster, and gave it power and privilege. Let me refer the Senate to the report of Mr. Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, made to Congress in 1791, on the subject of the finances, and a national bank. I will read only a few extracts from this most able paper; they are the conclusions of a mind without a superior in the political history of our country; a mind, sir, as lofty and pure in its patriotism, as it was sagacious, discriminating, and sound. Hear his emphatic testimony to the usefulness of banks:

"It is a fact, well understood, that public banks have found admission and patronage among the principal and most enlightened commercial nations. They have successively obtained in Italy, Germany, Holland, England, and France, as well as in the United States. And it is a circumstance which cannot but have considerable weight in a candid estimate of their tendency, that, after an experience of centuries, there exists not a question about their utility in the countries in which they have been so long established. Theorists and men of business unite in the acknowledgment of it.

"Trade and industry, wherever they have been tried, have been indebted to them for important aid; and Government has been repeatedly under the greatest obligations to them in dangerous and distressing emergencies. That of the United States, as well in some of the most critical conjunctures of the late war as since the peace, has received assistance from those established among us, with which it could not have dispensed."

Are these things so? and who can doubt or deny them? and with what justice can we drive on this unnatural warfare against an institution that, left to pursue its fiscal agencies, has always been productive of benefits! A bank was created by the Congress of 1791; and although the renewal of its charter was at its first application refused, yet good sense and the public welfare soon prevailed, and banking powers and privileges were again granted in 1816. So that we can now summon the experience of nearly forty years to dispel all these fears, and silence every prejudice. Let us not be misled by odious names; these are miserable arguments. To ring the changes of "monopoly," "monster," "hydra," &c. may gratify passion, but will not sanction usurpation, nor alleviate distress.

Mr. President, let it be granted that the bank is dangerous, when perverted—we must still employ it. Such is the case with every useful auxiliary. The same energies which are so beneficent when faithfully exerted, become terribly potent for evil when misdirected. It would be unwise, for such possible misuse, to deprive ourselves of these effective means of promoting the national welfare.

Sir, I will now come to the order removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States. This tremendous measure has convulsed the most tranquil season of prosperity which the country has ever enjoyed. Tranquil, not only because all were peacefully and successfully prosecuting their labors, but also because of the universal satisfaction of this great community with the financial administration of the bank. Not a remonstrance or murmur was heard from any district; currency was uniform; the facilities of commercial exchange were most convenient; agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, were fully employed. Yes, in all of them, there was a current of prosperity that almost excited alarm from its fulness and rapidity. At such a time, Mr. President, the blow is struck at the vitals of public confidence; when the pressure of trade and extended credit required the steady and sternest regularity in all our fiscal operations; at such a crisis, rashly to assail and derange the whole currency of the country, was not only a high-handed reach of arbitrary power, but a cruel trifling with the rights, feelings, and fortunes of the people, utterly indefensible.

And when we proceed to question such alarming pretensions of executive power, we are met by threats and outcries; the bitter calumnies of excited presses are let loose to write us down. Sir, I rejoice to know, and to feel, that such intimidations will not reach this council chamber, where freemen still assemble, and dare to breast the storm of party rage, and stand by their country and its best interests. It is humiliating to our national character, that no sooner did illustrious statesmen raise their voice against this act of the President in the other hall, than they were denounced with the calumnious insinuations of being "bank attorneys," rising in Congress "to earn their fees." Men, of whom any country might boast, are thus insulted; and for what? Because they do not bow, in silent and obsequious subjection, to the mandate of arbitrary power; because they dare rise in the spirit of their fathers, and dispute, inch by inch, executive encroachments. This, sir, and not money, roused up the revolution of '76. The exercise of ungranted power was the very marrow of that great controversy; and so it is here, and now. Moreover, sir, I believe there is great misapprehension in the supposed dangers of the money power. When has it been arrayed in hostility to the Government? No instance in all history can be found where it has been able even to sustain itself against the political power of a country. The jealousy of its influence is so deeply rooted, and so strong, that nothing can so readily be excited as prejudice towards wealth; nothing can be with so little reason cried down. Why, look to the very case before us. Here is a useful auxiliary, heretofore enjoying the confidence of Congress—of the State banks—of most of the heads of departments; it has become obnoxious to the executive, and, by his single mandate, he has so struck at its credit, that nothing but singular forecast and consummate prudence could have saved it from ruin. Sir, it is the weakest of all the attributes of power. It is only when seized into the hands of political power that it becomes dangerous to liberty.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, founds his authority on the charter of the bank, and insists that, by its terms, his power over the deposits, so far as the interests of the stockholders are concerned, is "absolute and unconditional;" and that, therefore, his order directing the public money to be deposited elsewhere, can, in no event, be regarded as a violation of the contract with the stockholders. As this is a most important branch of his argument, it is entitled to serious consideration; and I am under great delusion, if the construction given by him to the charter be not shown to be utterly without support or plausibility. He has, with great ingenuity, endeavored to subject the interests of the stockholders to his unqualified discretion, that he might the more readily construe the whole control of the deposits into a mere matter of finance by an executive department of the Government; and, having placed it there, he deemed the conclusion inevitable, that the President might, through the Secretary, do as he pleased with the public moneys.

But the charter, under no view of it, invests the Secretary with such discretion. The charter, as he admits, is a contract between the Government and the stockholders of the bank. The United States, as one party to the agreement, grant banking privileges to this company. The company agree to pay for them one million and a half of dollars. But further services are required of the bank, of essential importance to the public. It is to transfer the public funds from place to place within the United States and territories thereof, without any commission, or allowance, or difference of exchange. And the sixteenth section, which immediately follows, yields to the bank a remuneration for these facilities. These are the terms of it: "The deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction." Let it be noted that the power here given to the Secretary is a limitation upon a benefit granted to the bank. The United States were unwilling to put this benefit beyond all control, inasmuch as the bank might fail to fulfil its stipulations, or become an unsafe depository. As the Secretary of the Treasury is presumed to possess superior financial talents and experience, he is selected by the parties as a fit judge to decide when the condition of the bank should demand so special an interference as by this order is supposed. But this is only one side of the subject. The bank agrees to his decision, provided that Congress should become the ultimate tribunal to review his conduct; and, for this end, the remaining clause requires of the Secretary immediately to lay before Congress the reasons that induced his order. Now, the first reflection that forcibly strikes the mind on this whole section is, that, as it concerns the finances, a financial officer, and a financial institution, the reasons intended were financial reasons—the motives which might sway a sentinel set to watch over the Treasury. And the next reflection, of still stronger force, is, that, if the occasion on which the Secretary may issue an order removing the deposits, is to be justified by reasons that are required to be immediately laid before Congress, why, his discretion is in no sense absolute, but is qualified by the strongest possible implication. See how cautiously his power is checked. He is not to report to Congress the mere fact of removal, but the reasons, and this immediately on his order, if Congress be in session, and, if not, immediately after its session. Wherefore this repetition of such prompt requirement, if it was not regarded as an extraordinary case, only to arise on pressing emergency, and of which Congress, the guardians of the money, should be at the earliest moment informed? What becomes of his absolute and unconditional discretion? He never had it. It is controlled most essentially. How can we speak of discretion, where we must furnish reasons to a superior, and that without delay?

It is discretion under the strongest restraint; and the stockholders are protected in their privileges by this effective clause. Can it be then even plausibly maintained, that, so far as the stockholders are concerned, the Secretary may act without reasons, just when and as he may think fit? Surely not.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

But, again: They are the reasons of the Secretary, and of no other functionary. This is the contract as made by the Government, and officially assented to by the Executive. It binds both parties and all departments. The Secretary is the only judge the bank has agreed to. It is a personal trust, to be regulated and reviewed in its exercise by Congress. Now, under such plain powers, can the President interfere? Can he, by his fiat, break over the Secretary and the Congress too? When the Secretary adjudges deliberately that no reasons exist for a removal of the moneys, (and, of course, there can be none to report to Congress,) can the Executive turn upon this officer, with an arbitrary command to remove the money, without reason, or be driven from the station where the Congress had placed him? Sir, does the bond read thus? Can it be tortured into such meaning? No, sir. Neither the Congress nor the bank could have supposed that such interpretation was possible. The section refers to no person or party, by the slightest intimation, except the Secretary of the Treasury, the bank, and Congress. Gentlemen on the other side of this question have attempted to sustain the Executive by insisting on his power of removal over the officers of the Government. I know, sir, that when the departments were established by law, there arose an argument on this point, and great diversity of sentiment. Some admitted and others denied the existence of such power in the President; and General Hamilton, in one of his numbers in the Federalist, distinctly states that the Executive cannot remove an officer, except in the manner that he appoints him—with the advice and consent of the Senate. Such is a strong inference from the clause in the constitution which authorizes the President to fill a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate. For, if he may, by his general executive powers, create a vacancy, and then fill it, without the Senate, why was the above clause inserted in the constitution of the United States? And the legislative construction of the removing power is by implication altogether. The question was not then, nor has it since been, directly decided and settled; so that it remains, at the most, a doubtful matter.

And, thus regarded, the bank charter passed by Congress, in conjunction with the Executive, provides for the keeping and care of the public moneys; and, by positive requirements and the plainest inference, it detaches the subject from the range of executive authority, and puts it under the immediate supervision of Congress; and it does this with the full understanding and consent of the President.

This construction is fully confirmed by a further consideration. In the 23d section of the charter there are other duties besides those of a financial nature to be performed. There may arise political reasons for calling the bank to an account—as the want of confidence in its stability, or its violation of the provisions of the charter. These matters properly range themselves under Executive authority, as well as legislative. And here, if a committee of Congress report to that body, or the President has reason to believe that its charter has been violated, the Congress or the President may order a scire facias to issue against the bank, calling upon it to show cause wherefore its charter shall not be forfeited. This section devolves high duties on the Executive by name. When this law means to invest him with any power in the matter, it says so; and the argument is almost irresistible, that, when it is silent, no power arises to the President. The different functionaries are properly confined to their appropriate spheres of action. The Secretary has no control over the scire facias, nor has the President of the United States over the deposits.

Why should this, by such special clauses, refer to the President, and define his duties and powers in relation to the bank, if, as is contended, he has general control, by virtue of his office, over the money of the Government and every officer? It is manifest, sir, that Congress meant to put the finances of the country beyond the scope of Executive discretion, and for wise and strong reason. And this charter, while it is the contract of the immediate parties, is the law of the land to regulate the currency, and the keeping and care of the public moneys. And yet what have we witnessed? In a case where the Secretary of the Treasury reported that the deposits were safe, and that he found no cause to disturb them, the President, in his power, threatens him with expulsion unless he find reasons to remove them. The President forces himself between Congress and its officer, and actually drives him from office because he had the manly firmness to follow the dictates of his own judgment and conscience; because he dare, with the noble spirit of inflexible integrity, look power in the face, and tell it plain and wholesome truth, that, as he knew of no reasons that he could lay before Congress for such an order, should he make it, he very justly concluded that he had no right to make it. Not only this, but the Executive persists in his interference until he is provided with a Secretary who will put his name to the rescript, and violently abstract eight or nine millions of dollars from the accredited depository of our moneys. Sir, there is no parallel for such arbitrary encroachment. The rights of Congress and of the Secretary, and the chartered privileges of the stockholders of the bank, are alike invaded, and under circumstances that should have persuaded the President at least to a pause.

At the session of Congress immediately preceding, the President had induced an investigation into the condition of the bank. A part of its directors had been summoned to Washington and examined; and, after a full hearing, the committee reported in favor of the institution and against the removal of the deposits. And after this satisfactory inquiry, before another Congress could assemble, within only two months of its session, as if conscious and afraid of its course, the Executive, on his own motion and responsibility, suddenly, and by great violence, issues the order for removal of the moneys. The proceedings of the last session on this subject deserve a little further notice, as they reveal to us much of the causes for alarm. The President, in his message at the commencement of the Congress, refers to the bank in the following terms: "Such measures as are within the reach of the Secretary of the Treasury have been taken to enable him to judge whether the public deposits in that institution may be regarded as entirely safe; but, as his limited power may prove inadequate to this object, I recommend the subject to the attention of Congress, under the firm belief that it is worthy of their serious investigation," &c. The Senate perceive that, so lately as December, 1832, the Executive was only concerned for the safety of the moneys, and that he then rightly conceived that he must bring the subject to the consideration of Congress, as under its legitimate jurisdiction. The conception had not then reached him that he might interfere in utter disregard of the other branches of the Government. But this was not the only ground for delay and advisement. When the Executive opened his views to his constitutional advisers, he found three of his four Secretaries opposed to the measures he proposed; and one of these three, the Secretary of the Treasury, best acquainted with the merits of the subject. Was not all this sufficient to stay his hand for a few short weeks? No, sir. The President, instead of suspending, rashly drives the measure, and exhibits to the American people the singular spectacle of Executive will, in defiance thwarting all the co-ordinate powers of the constitution. Here you perceive, sir, the startling cause of this wide-spread alarm. Men see that laws are become dead letter, and that discretion rules the country. They will tolerate discretion, and even be lavish of their confidence in it, while it ranges in the sphere of the poll-boxes, and is felt in the bestowment of Executive favors; but, when their business and money are concerned, they desire some more substantial dependance.

The use of the writ of scire facias, and the prescribed occasions on which the President and Congress are authorized to employ it, afford strong and almost conclusive guides in seeking for the powers of the Executive. Sir, when may this writ issue against the bank? I take the words from the law—when there is “reason to believe that the charter has been violated.” And what is, what can be, a violation of the charter, but an infraction of the provisions of the charter? Can we look to any thing else besides it? Gentlemen have called to their aid the Executive duty of seeing “that the laws are faithfully executed.” Well, sir, here are the laws, consisting of seventeen fundamental articles, that are to regulate and control the conduct of this bank; and should they be neglected or broken, the President is to exercise his conservative authority, and attend to their faithful execution, by ordering a scire facias to forfeit the violated charter. This, sir, is plain, defined, and safe power and duty, as Congress most wisely intended it should be. The people understand all this; they feel secure while the path of known law is pursued. But this constructive reach after general discretion over the money of the Government, to remove it when he pleases, and to leave it where he pleases, and as long, is a dangerous pretension, justly alarming to the spirit of freemen.

What put the moneys into the State banks? The same arbitrary power which can remove them to-morrow; and no marvel that the confidence of the whole community is shaken. Sir, it is a blow at the majesty of the laws, aimed by the hand appointed to maintain and defend them; and the President will learn by the event that his bidding may destroy credit, but cannot repair it. And we have been gravely informed that no alleviation is to be expected, and that the people must endure with fortitude and patience. Sir, the Executive seems to be trying the strength of his popularity. I advise him to beware. The vain confidence of power is not always the surest indication of its stability. There are depths of suffering beyond the patience even of his political friends.

Mr. President, in review of this transaction, I am constrained to inquire by what untoward influences has it been accomplished? When that elevated circle of honorable council dissuaded, who rashly urged on? Who visits the State banks? Who figures in the correspondence, and promises public favors? Who kindly explains wherefore it was that one of the banks could not receive a share of the bounty as it went round? Who exults in the expected downfall of the bank, and describes it as “a reptile beneath the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he could crush at will, which existed only by his forbearance, and towards which great forbearance was required to save it from destruction?” We know whence all this sprung. And, sir, I could, with deep concern and desire, invoke the honorable friends of the Executive to rise in their strength, and, with an energy and earnestness not to be denied, insist upon the expulsion of a debasing and pestiferous influence, and recall the administration of our Government to better counsels. It would be a magnanimous interposition; and a grateful people would honor the men that should engage in it.

It is vain to boast of a free popular Government, if we may be subjected to any dominion besides the laws. This has been our boast, sir, that, under Heaven, we knew no other master. Popular, sir? Look at the bank question. Where have stood the representatives of the people; the Senate of the United States; the State banks; the chambers of commerce; the Secretaries of the Treasury and nearly all the other Secretaries?—all in favor of this useful financial agent—and yet the will of one individual can break through all these barriers, and carry his own single purpose. What is there popular in such a measure? As well might we say that Caesar or Napoleon were introducing popular rule when they took the Crown and seized on the liberties of the people. For, in both the cases, the plaudits of vast majorities rung to the very skies at the deed, and the few feeble voices of a resisting Senate were drowned in the clamor.

I propose to glance at a few of the prominent reasons presented in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Sir, my instructions require of me to sustain by my vote and influence “the course of the Secretary.” And after an anxious examination of his reasons, I can find nothing but a strict, legal argument, by an ingenious lawyer, on the wrong side of the question. The conclusions are erroneously drawn, from mistaken premises. I dissent from the whole plea, the beginning, middle, and end, of the matter. And it may be my misfortune that the longer he argues the more stubborn becomes my unbelief, and the more invincible my opposition to the measure.

The Secretary tells us that it was a question of time only, and he has selected the worst of all time. Never since the settlement of the country could a more unpropitious period in business have been chosen. Senators have urged, in attempting to account for the distress, that there had been an over-trading in commerce. Grant it, sir, and that very circumstance called loudly upon the Government to cherish all our means, to husband every facility; in a word, to do all in its power to nourish and sustain the credit of the country; and yet, at such a crisis, without waiting for the deliberations of Congress in a measure so fraught with probable mischief, to forestall its action and embarrass its legislation, a step is rashly taken that all considerations must have persuaded him would be followed by strong results. Again, as to the time: here were two years and a half of the charter yet unexpired for active business, and two more years for bringing its affairs to a close. Why then such haste? Is it ever wise, in great state affairs, to run so rapidly to conclusions? Time, sir! there was time enough for the bank gradually and safely to call in its circulation, curtail its discounts, and finally conclude its operations, without loss to itself or the country—without a shock to credit or interruption to trade; and yet the Secretary is prompted, most marvellously, by the time, to break in upon the regular current of most prosperous business. The Secretary thinks there may be just doubts of the ability of the bank to be prompt in its payments to the Government, by reason of its circulation returning towards the termination of the charter. This is certainly an extraordinary proposition to proceed from a financial officer. A moment's reflection ought to have suggested, that when the curtailment of discounts and contraction of circulation commenced, the bank, as a mere place of deposit, would become safer every hour. Sir, it is discount and circulation that endanger deposits. It is when these are expanded that concern should be felt, and not when they are constantly and gradually contracting. I have no doubt that the deposits would never be safer than on the last day of the bank's existence. Why should they not, sir? Would not the walls and the vaults be as impregnable? and, in all the range of calumny, no one has been so hardy as to impute personal dishonesty to the president or directors. If the Secretary had urged this as a reason for selling out the stock of the United States in the bank, it would have been plausible; for it is very probable that this cause might affect the profits of the business, and, of course, the rate of dividends and value of the stock.

But the Secretary proceeds, and in the next place complains that the bank was curtailing its discounts; and, therefore, he would, most unwisely, remove its means of discount, and absolutely compel it to curtail more rapidly and injuriously. Hear the strange conclusions of the Secretary. He says, if the bank had adhered to the oppressive system of policy which it pursued during the preceding months, a wide-spread scene of bankruptcy and ruin must have followed. This is a plea to justify the removal, be it remembered. And yet, when it was conjectured, on the Secretary's own case, whether the bank would adhere, when this wide-spread ruin was all imaginary, and there was not the slightest indication of it in September last, he voluntarily strikes at the resources of the bank, and, by this rash act, produces the wide-spread ruin and bankruptcy that he so much feared. Sir, as to the justice of the complaint against the bank for curtailing its business, what is the case? Why, it was known as early as August that the President was meditating this deed. His official organ sent out the notes preparatory; and because the bank heeded the warning, and expected the coming storm; or, rather, because it did not consent to receive its visitation without the common prudence of taking in a single sail; because it did not choose to fall "at the feet" of the Secretary as a smitten "reptile"—it is held up as a monster, trifling with the rights and feelings of its dealers. How has it curtailed, sir? Only as its means were reduced or threatened. Why, the argument seems really to suppose that there is a magic in the very name of this bank; that money will flow from its counters at the bidding of the President. And yet, no wise direction could justify themselves in extending their business beyond their actual strength. A bank can with no greater prudence or fairness promise to pay money, when it has not the money, or good reasons to expect it, than an individual. It would be downright unlawful speculation in either.

The Secretary endeavors to sustain the order removing the public moneys by a consideration which, to prevent all mistake, I will give in his own words: "The State banks can, I have no doubt, furnish a general circulating medium quite as uniform in value as that which has been afforded by the Bank of the United States—probably more so. For it is well known that, in some of the cities, the branches of the bank have been in the habit, whenever they thought proper, of refusing to honor the notes of their own bank, payable at other branches, when they were not offered in discharge of a debt due to the United States." This I hold to be one of the boldest financial propositions ever put forth: that the State banks can furnish, probably, a more uniform circulating medium than the United States Bank has afforded. He has no doubt of it. Sir, other Secretaries of the Treasury have been constrained not only to doubt, but to be deeply convinced that this notion of the present officer cannot be even plausibly maintained. The whole experience of fifty years contradicts it. The charter of the old Bank of the United States expired in 1811. Congress did not renew it. The experiment of State bank operations was fully and fairly made; and what followed? In a very short time, the suspension of specie payments. In 1815, the then Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on the finances, brought the matter before Congress, and invoked its aid, that a remedy for the existing evils might be provided. Hear the emphatic language:

"The suspension of payments in specie, by many of the most considerable banks of the United States, and of those most important in the money-operations of the Treasury, has produced and will continue to cause difficulties and embarrassments in those operations. The circulating medium of the country, which has consisted principally of bank notes, is placed upon a new and uncertain footing; and those difficulties and embarrassments will extend, in a greater or less degree, into the pecuniary operations of the citizens in general. The powers of Congress, so far as they extend, will be required to be exerted in providing a remedy for these evils, and placing, if practicable, the currency of the country on a more uniform, certain, and stable footing."

The following year the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Dallas, presented to Congress the results of experience and his own profound reflections on the merits of State bank and national bank agencies. As it was a communication made in the midst of an experiment now to be repeated at such damage; as it is the voice of history, bringing us its wholesome admonitions, I beg leave to give a literal extract from his report:

"The authority of the States, individually, or the agency of the State institutions, cannot afford a remedy commensurate with the evil, and a recurrence to the national authority is indispensable for the restoration of a national currency." And again:

"The establishment of a national bank is regarded as the best, and perhaps the only adequate resource, to relieve the country and the Government from the present embarrassments; authorized to issue notes, which will be received in all payments to the United States, the circulation of its issues will be co-extensive with the Union; and there will exist a constant demand, bearing a just proportion to the annual amount of the duties and taxes to be collected, independent of the general circulation, for commercial and social purposes. A national bank will, therefore, possess the means and the opportunity of supplying a circulating medium, of equal use and value in every State, and in every district of every State."

Mr. President, we are indeed in the midst of a revolution, when the lessons of experience and wisdom are to be unlearned, and the prosperity of this country subjected to the sad consequences of rash experiment.

But the Secretary furnishes a reason for his preference of the State banks in very cautious and measured phrases. He says, that "in some of the cities the branches of the bank have been in the habit, when they thought proper, of refusing to honor the notes of their own bank, payable at other branches, when they were not offered in discharge of a debt due to the United States."

In the first place it is to be observed, that he admits distinctly that whenever the United States were concerned, these distant notes were honored—so far it is well. What, then, is the difficulty? Why, the branches, in some of the cities, reserve the right, when they think proper, of refusing to pay notes payable at other branches. Mark the language. He does not affirm that this is uniformly or generally so—but when they think proper. Now, sir, how can they or any banks do otherwise? It is beyond the power of any agency to produce a perfect uniformity between places the most distant—to make a note payable at New Orleans of precisely the same value at Portland. The United States Bank has brought it as near as could be expected in any reason; and because they have done what all moneyed institutions must do, retain, in their own discretion, the payment of distant notes, and this to protect them against drafts by mere speculators, who might be tempted to drive such a business to their profit and the loss of the bank, the Secretary is persuaded to an undoubted opinion of the superiority of the State banks to establish a uniform currency.

Sir, it is matter of astonishment that any mind can, for a moment, believe in this State bank experiment in preference to a Bank of the United States. Why, sir, its national name alone imparts a credit to it, of vast importance, at home and abroad. This gives it a character and stability that facilitates its operations and introduces it favorably on every exchange. Moreover, the national bank has the supervision of all its branches, to the minutest item—all their accounts, deposits, dealers, the foot of every ledger and the control of all their administration. It can, by its universal superintendence, know at once where pressure is to be provided for, and supplies will be needed; and thus strength to spare at one point can be promptly afforded when required at another.

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[FEB. 3, 1834.]

But look at these State agencies, with no common bonds, each independent of the other, with no power of control, no right of inspection, and all of them irresponsible to the United States—a fraternity held together by not a single principle of union, except that they are all in favor with the administration and hold portions of the public moneys. Sir, it cannot be that such a collection of agents should meet the wants of the country and the just expectations of its business, in the manner that one bank, created by Congress and responsible to Congress, has accomplished these beneficial purposes, and can again.

The last charge preferred against the bank, which shall be noticed, is, "that it has been, and still is, seeking to obtain political power, and has used its money for the purpose of influencing the election of the public servants." I have failed altogether to perceive the force of this charge as an inducement to the action of the Secretary. Here have been expended twenty or thirty thousand dollars, in the publication of speeches and reports on the bank question—expended with the knowledge and wish of the private stockholders; and the Secretary removes eight millions of dollars of public money from an institution that still had ten millions of specie, thirty-five millions of capital, and in the full tide of business—and this to cripple its ability to print pamphlets! Sir, it is perfectly ludicrous—as a reason for the removal, I mean. And besides, why may it not print temperate and manly discussions on such an interesting subject of political science? Why may it not enlighten public opinion on its own claims and merits? Its charter was a subsisting one. The Executive thought proper in 1829, seven years before its expiration, to throw out doubts of the most injurious tendency; in the following year a distinguished Senator, on the side of the administration, laid on our table a distinct proposition, that it ought not to be rechartered; and this was followed by an elaborate argument in opposition to the bank, impeaching its usefulness and faithfulness. These matters were all published widely. In many material respects they were deemed by the officers of the bank to have misapprehended its conduct and principles. What could they do else, than endeavor respectfully to set these matters right? They were liable to judicial scrutiny, and surely, sir, we are not at that point of humiliation, when the right of self-defence is considered audacious—when to repel injurious aspersions is denounced as deserving the frowns of power! Sir, the president and directors of the bank had not only this right, but they might and ought, as faithful trustees, seek a renewal of their chartered privileges. Political electioneering, sir! We are all political electioneers. Who is exempt from the charge of desiring a continuance of political favor and confidence? The Executive, I believe, sir, must come in for a share; and because these aspirations lead to discussions that are free and animated, they are not, therefore, to be suppressed. Far from it. This excitement of public debate—this collision of mind with mind—this entire freedom of the press, is the healthful action of our institutions. Let every American citizen ponder deeply the sentiment, that such public and fearless discussion on public measures and men can never become offensive except to arbitrary power. While our laws, and not men, rule us, this sacred privilege, guaranteed by the constitution, will be cherished and firmly maintained.

But, gentlemen have insisted that the bank had no right to form an issue on the question of a recharter; that this concerned no parties but the Government and the country. If we just separate from the word "bank" all the odious imaginations that prejudice and policy have gathered around it, and, returning to common sense, realize that the bank is no other than a large and respectable body of our fellow-citizens spread over the United States, and equally entitled with any other portion to the protection of subsisting rights and the renewal of public privileges, this objection will assume the very type and spirit of the purest tyranny. What is its language to these American citizens? "On the question of recharter or not you must be silent. If we, the Government, permit you to subsist, then you may adjust your members to perform the functions of life; but, should we ordain you to cease, why, in such case, you must quietly lie down, without a word of petition or remonstrance." Sir, freemen cannot brook such terms; and, rely upon it, be the subject a bank or whatever else, they will resist and repel such oppression. And yet the freedom and purity of the press are among the motives of the Executive for this breach upon the vested rights of the bank. I had supposed that, where the press was free, the humblest as well as the highest might use its power; and was it an offence for the bank to resort to its aid in a matter where both Houses of Congress had, by deliberate legislation, ordained that it had been a faithful servant, and was justly entitled to a renewal of public confidence? Sir, it seems to be a material point on which side of the question this freedom of the press ranges. If it touch the outer skirt of Executive prerogative, it is denounced; if you write against power, you shall feel its vengeance; write for it, and you shall bask in the very sunshine of its smiles. Purity of the press! Turn over the recent files of the official organ, and on its pages respectful memorials to Congress are vilified, and the remonstrances of complaining freemen are held up to scorn, as being many of them fictitious names, put down in fraud or plundered from the tombstones of the grave-yard: sir, we have not heard of any measures to correct such calumniations and restore the purity of the press. Let us not recall the sedition law of departed federalism. Sir, if that was a whip, this is a scorpion. That prohibited the publication of falsehoods, and this will not tolerate the circulation of truth. That mistook the temper of the people, and the law was generally unpopular, not because the public felt any complacency in slanders, but because it was a branch of legislation of very doubtful authority, and might lead to lasting infringements on the freedom of speech. Then, you perceive, sir, the people were jealous of a power that could only be effectually exerted by the concurrent action of the Congress and the Executive, and through the judicial tribunals of the country. And what have we now, sir? The Executive alone, or a bank charter—a mere creation of a financial corporation by refined implications, against the will of Congress, and without the intervention of judge or jury—under the wide-reaching and plausible guises of purity of public morals and liberty of the press, grasping at a discretion above the laws, unknown to the constitution, and dangerous to our liberties.

This document has been placed to the account of the Secretary's early federal notions. Sir, it is no product of that school. It is an alien excrescence; and my best hope for the Secretary, politically, is, that the principles of policy, drawn from the constitution, may yet regain their influence over his mind, and break the delusion under which it now labors. Sir, I cherish a filial veneration for the federal party; as I entered upon active life, it was departing. In the review of its history, I am persuaded that it did, in some material respects, mistake the genius of our institutions and the spirit of our people; but, sir, as I read the developments of time, every day of our political history has vindicated the purity of its motives, and illustrated the soundness of its principles. In the language of Mr. Jefferson, and according to the soundest philosophy of politics, the great mass of the American people have always been, and now are, "all federalists, and all republicans." It is the federalism of the constitution that I honor—the system of fundamental law, as expounded by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, and administered by Washington, and most of his successors. I never drank at any other fountain, and wish to follow no other guide. And however, in seasons of tranquillity, when the sun shines brightly, and the waters are calm, we may venture to contemn or neglect these good old principles; when the tempest begins to muster; when the highways are broken up, and the billows of convulsion break over us and around us, then, sir, when every face is sad, and every heart is heavy, we almost instinctively seek refuge and guidance in our federal constitution; we will then follow no other leader; it is the only shield that affords security. It is, indeed, sir, a copious and perennial fountain; copious, to supply all the social and political wants of this great confederacy, and of vital energy fully adequate to impart its rich benefits still wider, as the lines of our Union shall expand and encompass many more noble States. Yes, sir, far as the intrepid enterprise of our people shall urge the tide of emigration towards the setting sun, until all over the valleys and hills of the West, freemen shall rejoice in their blessings, and not an unoccupied acre remain on which to raise a cabin or strike a furrow.

Mr. President, if, in the benignant counsels of a merciful Providence, it shall please him to perpetuate our liberties, I believe that it will be through the agency of these principles. And should that melancholy crisis come to us, as I fear it may, as it has come to all past republics, when the people of this Union shall reject the control of fixed principles, and seek to break away from the government of laws, then, indeed, sir, will the hopes of our enemies, and all the fears of our friends, meet in the catastrophe of constitutional liberty, and our "sun shall go down while it is yet day."

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

The following message from the President of the United States was received by Mr. Donelson, his private Secretary.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I deem it my duty to communicate to Congress the recent conduct of the Bank of the United States, in refusing to deliver the books, papers, and funds, in its possession, relating to the execution of the act of Congress of June 7th, 1832, entitled, An act supplementary to the "Act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution." The correspondence reported by the Secretary of War, and herewith transmitted, will show the grounds assumed by the bank to justify its refusal to make the transfer directed by the War Department. It does not profess to claim the privilege of this agency as a right secured to it by contract, nor as a benefit conferred by the Government, but as a burden from which it is willing to be relieved. It places its refusal upon the extraordinary ground that the corporation has a right to sit in judgment upon the legality of the acts of the constituted authorities, in a matter in which the stockholders are admitted to have no interest, and it impedes and defeats, as far as its power will permit, the execution of a measure of the administration, because the opinion of the corporation, upon the construction of an act of Congress, differs from that of the proper officers of the United States.

The claim of this corporation, thus to usurp the functions of the judicial power, and to prescribe to the Executive Department the manner in which it shall execute the trust confided to it by law, is without example in the history of our country. If the acts of the public servants, who are responsible to the people for the manner in which they execute their duty, may thus be checked and controlled by an irresponsible money corporation, then, indeed, the whole frame of our Government is changed, and we have established a power, in the Bank of the United States, above what we derive from the people.

It will be seen, from the accompanying statement, marked A, that, according to the latest accounts received at the War Department, the Bank of the United States and its branches have in their possession near half a million of the public money, received by them under the law of 1832, which they have not yet accounted for, and which they refuse to pay over to the proper agents, for the use of those persons for whose benefit it was withdrawn from the Treasury. It is to be regretted that this attempt on the part of the bank to guide and direct the Executive upon the construction and execution of an act of Congress should have been put forward and insisted on in a case where the immediate sufferers from their conduct will be the surviving veterans of the revolutionary war; for this evil falls exclusively upon the gallant defenders of their country, and delays and embarrasses the payment of the debt which the gratitude of the nation has awarded to them, and which, in many instances, is necessary for their subsistence and comfort in their declining years.

The character of the claim set up by the bank, and the interest of the parties to be immediately affected by it, make it my duty to submit the whole subject to the consideration of Congress: and I leave it to their wisdom to adopt such measures as the honor of the Government and the just claims of the individuals injured by the proceedings, may be deemed to require.

Having called for the opinion of the Attorney General upon this occasion, with a view to a thorough investigation of the question which has thus been presented for my consideration, I enclose a copy of a report of that officer, and add my entire concurrence in the views he has taken.

February 4, 1834.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message having been read—

Mr. CLAY rose, and said, that we had heard, early in the last month, that whilst the conduct of the Executive, in relation to the seizure of the public money, was under discussion, and before any decision of Congress on the subject, the Executive, not choosing to wait for any expression of the legislative will, was proceeding in the execution of his design of September last; and that an attempt had been, or would be, made, to take away from the United States Bank the agency which had been confided by law to that institution, in relation to the payment of the revolutionary pensions. He would not say that he was surprised at this. He was surprised at nothing which had been, or might be, attempted, by those who had obtained the practical possession of the Executive power of the Government. He had, he said, looked into the question concerning the payment of the pensions, and it was his opinion that this agency had been confided to the Bank of the United States by law; that the Executive had no right to take away this agency from the institution, and that the doing so could only be regarded as a continuance of that career of assumption and usurpation which had been commenced during the last year against the bank.

He was glad that the bank had now resisted. We had heard nothing of this subject until yesterday, when my friend from Mississippi [Mr. POINDREHNE] made a motion to call for a copy of this correspondence. The resolution, proposing this call, was to have been again called up to-day, and this may account for the communication being now made to the Senate. This agency, Mr. C. repeated, had been confided to the bank by law; and this fact was acknowledged by the Executive, when the Secretary of War retraced the steps which had been taken to remove it at Albany. Thus it appears that the agency had been confided to the bank, and that the Executive had recognised the fact that it was so confided. And now, what has been done? A message has been sent to the Senate by the Executive, in pursuance of his plans for the annihilation of the bank, denouncing the institution because it had not violated an obligation which was imposed upon it by an act of Congress!

Mr. C. said he had considered it to be his duty to make these remarks. He hoped that the message would be referred to a committee which would enter into an examination, for the purpose of discovering whether there had been any violation of duty on the part of the bank. If it should appear that there had been any such violation of duty on the part of that institution, no one would be more ready than himself to apply a proper and prompt correction of the evil. But, if the committee should find that the Executive, and not the bank, had violated its obligations and its duty, he hoped that there would still be found a determination in the Senate to apply a corrective.

He moved that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRUNDY said he had not very closely examined the question, but he rather thought that the bank was not the legal agent for paying the pensions under the law of 1832; upon which the opinion expressed in the message of the President, just read, had been predicated. Mr. G. went on to express his disapprobation of the Senate's giving any expression of its opinion, one way or other, on the subject, at this time. The President had laid the whole matter before both Houses of Congress; and until an action by their committee was had in relation to it, it seemed to him premature to express any opinion upon it. He concurred with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that the message ought to be committed to the Judiciary Committee; and, in addition to the motion of that gentleman, he moved that the papers be printed.

Mr. CLAY stated that it was not his intention, at this time, to enter into any arguments on this question. He had explicitly avowed this before; therefore it was not necessary for him to insist upon it. In reference to the opinion of the Attorney General, accompanying the message, (which had been alluded to by Mr. GRUNDY,) Mr. C. said he had long ceased to respect the acts or opinions of the different departments of the Government, being well aware that the Executive was, as he had called himself, a unit, and would instantaneously dismiss any officer who did not at once obey his behests. Sir, said he, when we know, from experience, that dismission from office is the consequence of a difference of opinion between any head of a department and the Executive, I acknowledge that I have lost all confidence in opinions from these sources. I, for one, can no longer respect the opinions of an Attorney General, or any other Executive officer, when such doctrines were avowed as had been maintained on this floor—doctrines belonging not to this Government, nor even to this age—doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, &c. Mr. C. passed a high eulogium on the personal character of the present Attorney General. Had he remained at Albany, he would have paid as much respect to any opinion of his on a question of law, delivered from his private office, as any man. But, brought within the pestilential atmosphere of Washington, he must be excused if he could not accord full credit to his public opinions. Mr. C. hoped that the reference would take place; and was satisfied that the report resulting from it would show that the usurpation, of which the President complained, had been here, and not in Philadelphia, and that the bank, after full inquiry, be acquitted from this, as well as all other serious charges that had been brought against it.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he thought he was in possession of a fact which would enable the Senate to decide on this subject. He would state that the gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken in what he said in relation to the powers given to the War Department on this subject. He (Mr. W.) would merely say, the power claimed by that Department as to the pension law was different; by that it had no reference whatever either to the law of 1828, which is commonly denominated the "pension law," or the law of 1832. The officer at present at the head of the War Department, is the same officer who corrected the decision of his predecessor in that respect, having thought it was wrong that any payments should be made in virtue of the provisions of the last act by the Bank of the United States, but that the payments should be made elsewhere than by the bank. He (Mr. W.) was sure that the gentleman from Kentucky would not go so far as to say that the officer would thus reverse his own opinion so palpably. He thought the Senator had not thoroughly examined the subject, or he would have found a very marked difference between what he supposed to be the facts in relation to this subject, and the real state of the case. When the gentleman should have examined the matter, he was of opinion that he would be satisfied.

Mr. W. said that his feelings compelled him to make a few remarks in reference to what had been said by the gentleman from Kentucky in relation to the Attorney General, whom he had stated as having been affected by the pestilential atmosphere in which he was at present moving. He (Mr. W.) would say, that the Attorney General was not to be affected by any such influence, for he was a man of integrity, truth, and candor, and would not give an opinion which he did not, in his conscience, believe to be right.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK MEMORIAL.

Mr. WRIGHT rose to present the memorial of a large number of merchants and other citizens of the city of New York, on the subject of the condition of the financial operations of the country, and expressive of their opinions of the necessity of a national bank. He held it to be an act of justice to admit that he had received this memorial from a most respectable committee of gentlemen of the city of New York, who had been sent hither for the purpose of presenting it. He was informed by this committee that the memorial bears the signatures of 6,000 persons, a great portion of them merchants and traders in the city of New York, and the expression of whose opinion was entitled to very great weight in this body. He knew some of the members of the committee personally, and all of them were well known to him by reputation; and it gave him great pleasure to bear his testimony to their high respectability. He considered that an expression of opinion, coming from such a body, was entitled to great weight. He then moved that the memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The memorial having been read—

Mr. WEBSTER then rose and said that the great number of the signers of this memorial, and the just testimony which had been borne to the character and respectability of those who had affixed their names to it, might be received as full testimony of the great degree of public distress which prevails at this moment. In the course of twenty years' experience in Congress, he had seen no such memorial. He had his doubts if, in the whole history of our Government, any memorial had ever been presented, in which such pains had been taken to give a respectful and an emphatic expression of the deep, wide-spread, and earnest conviction of public suffering, as were exhibited in this memorial. It reminded him more of some instances which had occurred in a Government in Europe, which was, in some degree, a popular one, but less so than our own, having its representatives real and nominal, but not springing so directly from the people as under our institutions; he meant in the British House of Commons, where, under a less auspicious cious organization than happily existed now, a great mass of petitions, with a prodigious number of signatures, was presented. Gentlemen knew how the tables of the House of Commons were loaded with these petitions at the commencement of the American war. There was presented a memorial from one of the northern counties, by a whig member, against the American contest, and when the messenger brought one end of it to the Clerk's table, the other end was not to be seen. A member remarked that there was the head of the petition, but where was the tail? It was answered, that the tail had not yet left Yorkshire.

The proofs of public distress which were now exhibited, were of too earnest a character to be scoffed at, and too plain to be mistaken. The suffering pressed so hard upon the people, that they scarcely could find terms adequate to its expression; they could hardly dare to trust their lips to utter the results of their convictions. This was the present state of things. A great degree of public distress existed, and the cause of that distress was now to be investigated. It had been contended, on one side, that the cause was to be found in the removal of the deposits, and the breaking up of the United States Bank. On the other hand, it was asserted that it was all attributable to the conduct of the bank itself, which, notwithstanding the attempts made to put it down, and the obloquy with which it was assailed, being in possession of the means of relieving the existing distress, ought to have applied its funds for the purpose of affording such relief. He deemed it of great importance that, in the existing circumstances of the country, the bank should do what it could, and should convince the people that it extended all the relief in its power to yield. It was its duty to exert its power to the verge of its own safety, for the purpose of assisting the property and industry of the country to sustain itself under this unprecedented weight of distress. He trusted that the bank would do so; it ought to do it; it was its duty to do it.

But it was necessary that it should keep in view the circumstances of its own situation, that its charter had only two years to run, and that any thing like an instantaneous collection of its debts would be impossible, without pressing the industry of the country to ruin. Its only course therefore was that which was dictated by strict prudence, and that it ought, under that dictation, to give effect, to the full extent of its power, to the earnest solicitude which he believed that it felt to relieve the country. But, on the other hand, the rule of prudence required that it should have constant regard to its own safety, and to the necessity which existed for winding up its affairs within the time prescribed by law. The Government had taken its stand, and declared its purpose to be the collection and distribution of its revenue by means of the State banks alone; it had held out the idea that this scheme would be successful, and had pledged itself to carry it through; still he trusted that the bank would discharge its duty; afford evidence that there was no fault in its conduct; and prove that, while a charter remained to it, it would relieve the public distress, as far as it could do so with safety; and beyond the line of safety it would not be justified in advancing a step.

He knew not what would be the extent to which the public distress would increase, or where it was to terminate; but he thought he could foresee the end of those public men who closed their ears against the cries of distress which were coming in from all parts of the country. The fact of the existence of distress was now evident. He implored gentlemen round him, whose tables were loaded with petitions from the people, to recollect that, in the history of the last twenty years, there had not been found in this country an equal amount of distress. While this distress was so strongly felt along the Atlantic, from Maine to New Orleans, it must be the result, from settled causes, that the tide will flow inward, and run up all the little streams, in the valley of the Mississippi, until it extended itself into every section of the Union.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he thought that too wide an extension had been given to the facts admitted on the subject of the existing distress. He stated that he differed with the signers of this petition both as to the cause of the distress and the remedy to be applied.

The motion was then agreed to, and the petition was referred.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the Special Order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposits.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN continued and concluded his remarks, as already given entire.

Mr. WILKINS moved that the Senate adjourn, but withdrew his motion.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to refer the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the second resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, to the Committee on Finance.

In proposing this motion, Mr. WEBSTER said that the intention was to give the committee an opportunity to make a report on the financial part of the subject, and promised that the report should be brought in to-morrow as soon as the Senate were in session.

Some discussion took place on the point of order, whether this reference would not take the subject from before the Senate, and thus arrest the pending discussion; in which Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. CLAY, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. SPRAGUE, took the negative of the question, and Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. KING took the affirmative view.

The motion was then agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved to postpone the further consideration of the first resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved that the Senate take up the resolutions which he had laid before the Senate on Friday; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER then, by general consent, withdrew his call for the yeas and nays.

At the suggestion of the CHAIR, who objected to the first resolution, and a part of the third, on the ground that they were similar to resolutions already offered and referred,

Mr. POINDEXTER modified his resolutions by striking out the first, and the latter part of the third resolution.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the Senate adjourn, which was negatived—Yeas 13.

The third resolution was resisted as too indefinite in its language, and, on the call of Mr. MORRIS, the yeas and nays were ordered on its adoption.

On motion of CALHOUN, the third resolution was then laid on the table—Yeas 23, Noes 14.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the remaining resolutions were then laid on the table—Yeas 21, Noes 18.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he rose for the purpose of moving a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, on the adoption of the second of the resolutions he had the honor to submit, in relation to the fiscal affairs of the country, for the purpose of eliciting facts deemed by him of importance in the investigation now going on in the Senate. As it seemed to be the intention of the Senate not to permit the inquiries he sought to institute to have their full scope, he thought it would be better to reconsider the vote on the second resolution, and suffer it to lie on the table with the others. For one, and he might be old-fashioned in his ideas, he wished, when an issue was to be decided, to have all the facts connected with it brought fully to light; and he believed that if the Committee on Finance were clothed with the powers contemplated by the resolution, facts would be brought out absolutely necessary to enable the Senate to come to a correct decision. His honorable colleague had said that he did not wish the committee to be sent on a voyage of discovery; and since the failure of Capt. Ross's expedition to the North Pole, the idea of voyages of discovery seemed to be unpopular with him. He, for his part, had no wish to send the committee on a voyage of discovery; but he certainly did wish to get at important facts, without which a correct decision could not be made. If it was the will of the Senate to try this question on a demurrer, his course was clear. For the present, however, he moved the reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of the second resolution, in order to follow it with a motion to lay it on the table to sleep with its fellows.

Mr. WAGGAMAN called for the reading of the resolution; which was done: and the Senate decided to reconsider the vote without a division.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was carried.

REPORT ON THE REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the removal of the deposites, and the second of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky, made a report, the reading of which being called for,

Mr. WEBSTER read the report, which occupied about an hour and a quarter, and concluded with recommending the adoption of the second resolution introduced by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the report of the Committee be printed, and that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolution which had been before the committee, with the other resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, be made the special order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that 6,000 additional copies of the report be printed.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he did not well understand the object of printing more than the usual number of copies of the report. It had been suggested by an honorable Senator the other day, that the printing of an additional number of copies of any document, gave to it a sort of official sanction, which he was by no means willing to accord to the document then under consideration. If this view was correct, and the report was to be the foundation of the action of the Senate, he objected to printing an additional number of copies of the document, because he did not think it contained sound political arguments, and he did not think it stated fairly the views of the Secretary of the Treasury. Certainly great credit was due to the Committee on Finance for the zeal, ability, and industry with which the report had been brought out. He thought the reference was made yesterday at four o'clock; and the Committee could hardly have had time to agree on and write out so long a report in the short space of time intervening since then. It was possible that the subject might have been discussed and well understood in the committee before, and that the Chairman had time to embody the sentiments of the various members of the committee previous to the reference. If such was the case, it reminded him of what had once happened in one of the Courts of Justice of the State of Georgia. A grave question of constitutional law was presented before that Court, was argued for days with great ability, and when the argument was concluded, the Judge drew from his coat pocket a written opinion, which he read, and ordered to be recorded as the opinion of the Court. It appeared, therefore, that unless the Senator from Massachusetts carried the opinion of the committee in his coat pocket, he could not have presented his report with the unexampled despatch that had been witnessed. To this, however, it was not his purpose to raise any objection—his objection was to the report itself, in which he did not think the true question was fairly met. He wished the report to be printed, (the usual number of copies,) and when that was done, he would take occasion to set the subject in a proper light, and bring the true issue fairly before the public. It seemed to him that it would not be fair to go on with the discussion, until the report of the committee, so vastly important—a committee peculiarly constituted, and from its nature giving such weight to its opinions, should be printed, and in the hands of every Senator. How could his friend from Pennsylvania, for instance, do justice to his argument, without an opportunity of giving to that report a thorough investigation in his closet!

Mr. TYLER rose and said, that the gentleman from Georgia need not to have gone quite so far for a precedent. He might have proceeded no farther than to the Executive himself. The Committee on Finance had held their cabinet meeting, and had compared their views on the subject, as one which was likely to come before the Senate very speedily, and they had conveyed their views to their Chairman, who had done them ample justice in the report. The Secretary of the Treasury, like our Chairman, had taken care to collect all the opinions of the President; he had taken to himself all the benefits of the communication made to the Cabinet Council; and, in as short a period of time as has been occupied by the Committee on Finance, he had come to his decision, that the deposites are to be removed from the vaults of the Bank of the United States. I say, therefore, that my honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] need not to have taken so distant a voyage of discovery for the purpose of producing a case similar to that which has been presented to us this morning; when it was pat at hand, set forth by the Secretary of the Treasury. Let the report pass for what it is worth; let it be met fairly; let the arguments be met face to face, and toe to toe. The true question on which we are at issue is set before the American people in this paper—the true question, whether the Secretary has acted rightfully or wrongfully—whether he has been backed and sustained in his authority by the dictation and direction of the President. There is no avoiding the question; we must come up to the real question in dispute. The question presented for the consideration of the Senate and the American people, is a question of law or no law; and gentlemen, being unable to meet that issue, have attempted, very adroitly, on sundry occasions, to make a new issue of "bank or no bank."

I protest, said Mr. T., against trying the issue in this new way. The only question in which we are now engaged, is simply an inquiry whether the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury are sufficient to justify his act. In regard to the condition in which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] is placed by these proceedings, I have only to say that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the Committee on Finance; he was with us last night, and has been with us since the commencement of the session, and has heard the views not only of the chairman but of every member of the committee. I have no doubt that he noted every argument, and stands prepared to answer them. As to the subject of printing the report, he supposed that, as an additional number of the report of the Secretary had been ordered to be printed, it might be as well to print a sufficient number of this report, to be spread before the public with it.

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CHAMBERS said he did not perceive any occasion for the reproach that had been cast on the Committee on Finance. When the reference was made, he was one who believed, at the time, that the report, when presented, would show a tolerably fair view of the sentiments held by a majority of the committee, and the result had not disappointed his expectations, and if it were expected that the report would present, from the conceded opinions of the members of which the committee was composed, some apparent evidence of what the probable action of the Senate would be when the final question was taken, the inference would be deduced that the most appropriate reference had been made. He did not believe, let the final question be taken when it would, that the vote of the Senate would present much dissimilarity with the views taken by the committee. So much as to the report. As to the motion before the Senate, the gentleman from Georgia had objected to the printing of an additional number of copies of the report, because he did not think that the views of the Secretary of the Treasury were fairly stated in it, and that its conclusions were not logically drawn. He thought that the Senator from Georgia was in the Senate when the printing of 6,000 copies of the President's veto to the bank bill was ordered, and made no objection to the motion. The gentleman did not think a law re-chartering the Bank of the United States unconstitutional, and yet he did not object to disseminating a document which inculcated a contrary opinion. It was extraordinary, Mr. C. said, that no two friends of the administration agreed as to the details of the important subject which had been so long under discussion, yet they all concurred in arriving at the same result; they all agreed in sustaining the Secretary, though they would probably not have advised the measures he has taken.

Mr. CHAMBERS concluded by observing, that as the views of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President had been spread over the country, by the printing of an unusual number of copies of the documents in which they were embodied, it was but fair that a like currency should be given to the views of the Committee on Finance, in the able paper just read. With regard to the haste with which the report had been presented, as charged by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. C. saw no valid objection to this. It had been well observed that the subject had long been under discussion in the committee, both on reference of the President's message, and on various memorials, and that the Chairman was fully possessed of the views of every member of it, and had therefore no difficulty in embodying them in the report.

Mr. WILKINS said that, as to himself personally, he was entirely in the hands of the Senate, and felt only desirous that the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky should be restored to the condition in which it was yesterday, so that the discussion might proceed. [Mr. WEBSTER: "That is already done."] As to the report, he was in a minority in the committee. He had, it was true, been for some time in possession of the opinion of the majority; but he had not had a knowledge of the facts and arguments on which that opinion was founded, and on which the reasons of the Secretary had been condemned. He had been aware that four of the five members of the committee were of opinion that the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury were insufficient, and that the removal of the deposits had caused the present distress. He was yesterday summoned to attend the committee, and had, last evening, heard the report read; and he felt bound to say, that he had seen no indication of any desire on the part of the rest of the committee to conceal the course they were about to take. It was not practicable for him to take up this report, and answer it to-day. If the special order should be restored, the discussion might go on upon the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. He was willing to abide by such course as the Senate may decide on.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed his intention to vote in favor of printing the same number of extra copies of this report as were printed of the report of the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury. This report was designed as an answer to those reasons: for that, as he understood it, was its precise import, and the object for which it was referred to the committee. When the Secretary's report came in, it was ordered that 5,000 extra copies should be printed, and he would not vote for a larger number of this report. The report of the Secretary he had considered as an able paper, and he also viewed this report as a very able document.

Mr. PORTER expressed his opinion in favor of the largest number. If it was so weak a paper as some gentlemen seemed to think, it could do no harm abroad, whatever the number which might be printed; but, if it was strong, and able, and sound, as he believed it to be, it ought to have a pretty extensive circulation.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he had been induced to oppose the motion to print the extra number, because the Senate had, on a former day, refused a motion to print an extra number of the second report of the Secretary of the Treasury. That motion was still on the table; and the ground on which it was laid there was, that it ought not to be thus extensively circulated until it had received the sanction of the Senate. For the same reason, he should oppose the present motion. If it was necessary to print 5,000 copies of this report, in order to do justice to the bank, it was equally necessary to print 5,000 copies of the report of the Secretary, in order to do justice to that officer. Were the Senate to give light only on one side? Had not the bank the power to circulate as many copies of this report as it might think proper to send out? If this strong paper should go forth, would not the bank spread hundreds of thousands of it before the people, in order to enlighten them on the subject; while the officer of the Government was not permitted to use the public funds for the purpose of circulating this report, although it might be necessary to sustain him in the position which he had taken? He stated that he was shocked, inexpressibly shocked, to see to what a condition we were reduced, when a committee of the Senate had found it necessary to come forward to take upon itself the task of vindicating the violated rights of the legislative branch against the usurpations of the Executive. How happy ought the country to feel under such a state of things. He objected to the present motion, as unjust to the Secretary of the Treasury. Here had the Senate been for weeks discussing resolutions, introduced here under the stamp of the authority of the Senator from Kentucky, and this discussion had been carried on with an ability which was unexampled. The subject had then been taken out of the hands of the Senate, and sent to the Committee on Finance; and for what purpose was it sent thither? Did any one doubt what would be the opinion of the Committee on Finance? Would such a movement have been made, had it not been intended thereby to give strength to the course of the opposition? He was not in the Senate when the reference was yesterday made, but he had supposed that it was made for the purpose of some report in a legislative form, but it has come back with an argument, and a recommendation of the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky; and when the resolutions were adopted, would they not still be sent back to that committee for examination? Why had not the committee, who seemed to know so well what would be the opinion of the Senate, embodied that opinion in a legislative form? The gentleman from Massachusetts had stated, that, unless the bank should be re-chartered, the present public agitation, which every one must deplore, would necessarily continue. The Senator behind him [Mr. TYLER] had expressed his hope that there would be no shrinking on the question. He would answer that gentleman by saying, that, on the side of those who sustained the Secretary, there would be no shrinking. But was there any one so blind as not to see that the whole stress of the argument of gentlemen on the other side, was the distress which had been caused by the want of confidence throughout the country, arising from the knowledge that the bank was not to be re-chartered. It was not pretended that the removal of the deposits had affected the capability of the bank, but that it had affected the public confidence regarding it, and that, to remedy this evil, the bank must be re-chartered? So long as the question remained unsettled, and a hope was cherished that a majority of both Houses of Congress would re-charter the bank, the distress would continue, and would be felt in every nerve of the community. He would tell gentlemen that the bank was now trying to correct public judgment by producing public distress; to make the people feel misery, that they might be compelled to correct the errors of their judgment. He expressed the regret which he felt on seeing those with whom he had so long acted, with whom he had for many years been connected by the ties of friendship, taking a course which would tend to protract the evil. He was glad to find that the example of the President was so much in favor as to find gentlemen on the other side desirous to copy it. He did not himself desire to be considered as approving of any example which he did not copy. A word as to the prediction of the Senator from Maryland, that the opinion of the Senate would be found to sustain the report of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERS explained that he had not given any prediction, but only his individual opinion, and he gave that because he thought the Senator from Georgia seemed to give an opinion on the other side.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that, taken in the mass, he understood what was the opinion of the Senate. The President and the Secretary were to be condemned. This was to be done by the union of two parties, one of whom condemned the Executive for usurping, the other for abusing power. It had been the fortune of the President to be condemned, in all his measures, by this same union. He expected, no doubt, still to be condemned, and was prepared for it. He objected to the printing of this strong and able paper, which was marked with that ability which stamped every production of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN said it was an adroit movement which was made yesterday, to take this subject from before the Senate, and refer it to the Committee on Finance—an interlocutory proceeding—while the debate on the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky was pending. It should not, however, be permitted to influence his vote, that the chairman of the Committee on Finance was prepared, like the ancient oracles, which were always prepared with the responses before the interrogatories were put to them, with his report, before the movement was made. He would still vote in favor of the motion to print 6,000, and, if the gentleman wished for a larger number, he would vote for that number. But he should not take that course for the reasons which operated on other gentlemen: he would not withhold his vote for the printing, because he feared the effect of the report on the public mind. He did not think that it was calculated either to delude or deceive the people. It contained nothing which had not been already set forth and answered; there was nothing novel in it; nothing which had not been met and refuted on this floor. But if even the argument in the report had been of an overwhelming character, he would still have voted for the printing of a larger number; but he repeated, that he viewed all its positions as having been already overthrown. The gentleman from Virginia had quoted high authority to justify the rapidity of the response which had been made.

Mr. TYLER explained that he had merely referred to it as one cherished in the affections, and dear to the heart of the gentleman from Georgia, and which would bind him for ever; but he had no desire to give his approbation to the act of the Executive.

Mr. BROWN resumed. He was glad to find that the Secretary had found favor in this quarter. [Mr. TYLER: "No favor."] It appeared, however, that gentleman had outstripped their model—had out-Heroded Herod. The Secretary of the Treasury had taken three days after his initiation into office, and he did not write out a long argument. But, in this case, the subject was referred only last evening, and here was a long argument presented to the Senate this morning. This was an improvement on the course of the Secretary. He did not heed what was the effect which was intended by this argument: whether there was in it a mass of error, covered up with splendid sophistry, or whether it was intended to whitewash the glaring enormities of the bank, he would give every possible degree of light to the public mind. The people would weigh the arguments in the balance, and approve or reject according to their merit. The gentleman from Virginia had declared his determination to meet the matter face to face. He presumed that the gentlemen on this side were prepared so to meet the question, and to argue the broad view whether the people should be ground down by this institution, or whether the bank itself should be put down, in the war which it was now waging against the best interests, the liberty, and independence of the country. He trusted that the attempt to enslave the people would be defeated, and the principles of the Government would be triumphant, and that we should not be doomed to see all political power transferred to the hands of the bank. As to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he doubted not that he would be able to give a good account of himself.

Mr. WILKINS said, that he had a motion which had been laid upon the table for a considerable time, and to which allusion had been made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH.] He thought this would be a good opportunity, not to call it up, but to attain the object he had in view by making it. He (Mr. W.) hoped the motion of the honorable Senator from Maryland embraced also the printing of the second report of the Senate in relation to that of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was made in answer to the call of the Senator from Kentucky. They both related to the same subject, and were equally interesting to the people. If information was the object of the gentleman in making the motion, that reason was equally applicable to the object he (Mr. W.) had in view. He recollected that, at the time the motion was made, he was particularly opposed to the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, on the ground that the Secretary of the Treasury had answered the call of the Senate; that was, by-the-by, the great reason with him (Mr. W.) for wishing the paper to be printed. It was a respectful and pertinent argument and was relevant to the issue, and was a full answer to the call made upon him, furnishing the necessary matter to an elucidation of the matter under the investigation of the Senate. He, (Mr. W.), in conclusion, said he would move an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Maryland—that an equal number of copies be printed, of this report, as of that made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANGUM said, that the public, with all their supposed gullibility, were not so gullible as to permit gentlemen to change the true issue of this subject to one which some Senators would set up. As regarded himself, he would not suffer such a change to be made. The question is not, nor never was, "bank or no bank." The question was, emphatically, "law or no law—constitution or no constitution." Gentlemen were charged, whenever a movement was made calling in question the Executive acts, as standing by the bank, as supporting the bank, giving vigor to its arm against the blow levelled at it by the Executive. He (Mr. M.) repelled such an accusation; and would repeat, that that was not the question, but it was "law or no law."

With regard to the report of the Committee on Finance, it was unpretending in its character, touched nothing of the Executive power, but was simply confined to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury—the issue of which he has put before the public. In reference to that action, and the reasons that had been given, he (Mr. M.) was perfectly content that the people should judge. An attempt had been made by some Senators to turn the public mind from the real question before the Senate, in order that the weakness of their position might not be observed, and by proclaiming that this was a question of "bank or no bank." For himself, he repudiated the charge; and would observe, that when that question should come up, he would be found ready to act on it. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." It had been said, that the question here was—whether the bank has declared war against the Executive, and whether it should be allowed to go on with its high-handed course; and, on the other side, it was asked whether or not the Executive had declared war on the bank, without law or constitutional right—and were the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury sustained by law, and was his conduct to be upheld.

If it was true, as had been said, that the Bank of the United States had not been faithful to its trust—was a monster, and ought to be crushed—why, then, he would say, it deserved that fate. He was not, however, for disregarding all law on the subject, but was willing to give the bank fair play. Senators had been asked, whether the bank had instructed them to shield it, because they were its friends? Was that a proper course to be pursued by a Senator of the United States? Such language partook much of the calumny and abuse that was used by the public press towards those who were opposed to its views. It was lamentable to think that we had arrived at such a state of things; and he believed that the wisest and best men in the country regarded it as one of the most ill-omened signs of the times, that from a high place, a high quarter, we heard, instead of language addressed to the reason, justice, and patriotism of the people—harsh exclamations and tirades, calculated to inflame the passions of men and impose upon their credulity.

The question was not whether the bank shall, or shall not be rechartered; that subject was not touched upon in this report, which was altogether confined to an examination of the reasons given by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress in relation to the removal of the deposits. In regard to the report by the Committee on Finance, he would merely observe, that the language and reasons which it contained, were those of its honorable chairman [Mr. WEBSTER] and the committee had adopted it. It contained a fair and able exposition of the subject, and would no doubt have its just weight on the public mind.

He (Mr. M.) had no intention of saying a word on the subject; but he could not forbear rising to say, that so far as he was concerned, he would not suffer gentlemen to change the issue before the public. It was already before them. The honorable Senator from Georgia had informed the Senate that, in due season, he would examine the reasons set forth in the report. He (Mr. M.) hoped he would do so with all fairness and candor. He thought, however, that the reasons were too strong and conclusive to be overturned. With regard to the number of copies to be printed, he approved of the highest number.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the honorable Senator from Georgia had complained that the paper read to the Senate from the Committee on Finance, neither fairly stated, nor met the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury; and that, hereafter, he should enter into some detail on the subject, and present it in a fair light before the public. I shall wait, said Mr. W., for the gentleman's own time—and, when he chooses to try the strength of a lance in that field, it will be my duty not to refuse him an opportunity. The gentleman complained, also, of the mode of referring the Secretary's report. Had the gentleman come to the Senate this morning in his usual good humor, he would have been easily satisfied on that point. He would recollect that the subject now under discussion was deemed, by every body, to be peculiarly fitted for the consideration of the Committee on Finance; and that, three weeks ago, I had intimated my intention of moving for such a reference. I had, however, delayed the motion, from considerations of courtesy to other gentlemen, on all sides. But the general subject of the removal of the deposits, had been referred to the Committee on Finance, by reference of that part of the President's message; and various memorials, in relation to it, had also been referred. The subject has undergone an ample discussion in committee. I had been more than once instructed by the committee to move for the reference of the Secretary's letter, but the motion was postponed, from time to time, for the reasons I have before given. Had the gentleman from Georgia been in the Senate yesterday, he would have known that this particular mode of proceeding was adopted, as was then well understood, for the sole purpose of facilitating the business of the Senate, and of giving the committee an opportunity to express an opinion, the result of their consideration. If the gentleman had heard what had passed yesterday, when the reference was made, he would not have expressed surprise.

There is another thing, sir, to which the gentleman has objected. He would have preferred that some legislative recommendation should have accompanied the report—that some law, or joint resolution, should have been recommended. Sir, do we not see what the gentleman probably desires? If not, we must be green politicians. It was not my intention, at this stage of the business, to propose any law, or joint resolution. I do not, at present, know the opinions of the committee on this subject. On this question, at least, to use the gentleman's expression, I do not carry their opinions in my coat pocket. The question, when it arrives, will be a very grave one—one of deep and solemn import—and when the proper time for its discussion arrives, the gentleman from Georgia will have an opportunity to examine it. The first thing is, to ascertain the judgment of the Senate, on the Secretary's reasons for his act.

There has been one remark by the gentleman from Georgia, which it is important, I think, to repel; and which, as a member of this body, I am determined to repel and cast from me. The gentleman has said that the Senate will stand by the bank. This I deny, and throw from me. Sir, the Senate stands by the constitution, the laws, and the country; and, I believe it always will. Sir, is the country nothing? Are the laws and the constitution nothing, that the Senate are to be charged with standing by the bank only, because it is apprehended that it will not sanction the political conduct of those high in power? Cannot we differ with the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the interest and policy of the country, without being charged with standing by the bank, merely because the bank happens to have an interest in the question? Sir I deny the propriety of such an imputation. I deny its fitness, and repel it, as I doubt not every honorable member of the Senate will repel it, as unfounded and unjust. Sir, the law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, on the happening of a certain contingency, to remove the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; but the law also makes it his duty, if he does remove them, to make his report to Congress, in order that the propriety of his conduct may be examined into and decided on. Sir, the Secretary has removed the deposits, and he has made his report to Congress; and Congress, as it is its duty, are now examining into the reasons which he has given for that procedure. Sir, the gentleman from Georgia says that he sees that a majority of the Senate will stand by the bank. Sir, this is not a fair putting of the question. Are we, whom the law has expressly made the judges of the conduct of the Secretary, and are compelled, by our duty, to investigate it, to be taunted with the remark that we are taking the side of the bank? This, sir, is not the question presented in the paper read to the Senate, and the gentleman from Georgia shall not, with my consent, put it so. The question presented by the committee was one of public policy, of public convenience, the safety of the funds of the public, and the proper management of those funds. Because the bank is interested in, or connected with the question before them, had the gentleman no more charity than to say that this was exclusively a bank question? Sir, the private interests of the Bank of the United States, or any other private interest, are not matters of sufficient moment to be compared with the consequences likely to result from the measures which have been adopted by the Secretary. For one, I am free to admit that, in my opinion, a re-charter of the bank, or the creation of another, is necessary; that I see no other mode by which the agitation of the country can probably be quieted, its distresses relieved, and confidence restored; but I do not admit, still, that the interests of the bank are to be regarded as any important part of the question. The gentleman from Georgia may propose what issue he pleases; but he will not make me stir from my own position. I go, sir, for the country—for its constitution and its laws, and for relief from its present distress; and will not suffer myself to be turned aside from that great and paramount object.

With regard to the motion to print, I have nothing to say on that subject. I have risen to tell the gentleman from Georgia what is the true and great question before the Senate; and to say that I shall follow up that question and shall not be drawn into any new position.

Mr. FORSYTH assured the Senator from Massachusetts that, at a proper time, and with all the strength of voice which he could command, he would go into the examination of the report, and due notice should be given, that the gentleman might be prepared to stand on his defence. He must be permitted to say, that he would not suffer the gentleman to place him on the witnesses' stand, and examine him as to the places which he thought proper to visit, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts would also submit himself to a similar examination. On this occasion, however, he must say that he had not been to visit the President, as the gentleman insinuated, when he said, he had perhaps gone to the place where he gained his precedent.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had no reference to the President. The gentleman had gone to Georgia for his precedent, and he (Mr. W.) had Georgia, and not the President, in his mind, when he adverted to the matter.

Mr. FORSYTH explained, that he had mistaken the Senator from Massachusetts. In reference to what had been said about the ground on which he had put the question of the bank and the country, whether the gentleman would allow him or not, he should persist in putting it on the same ground. In doing this, he disclaimed any design to impute unworthy motives to any gentleman.

He should always exhibit as much charity to other gentlemen as he was accustomed to receive from them. He endeavored to treat every man fairly. How was the fact? What did the gentlemen on the other side tell the Senate? Did they not hold it to be indispensable that the bank, or a bank, should be re-chartered? Were they not told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the agitations throughout the country would continue until this preliminary question was determined? Yet they were now told that the question was not as to the bank, but that it was a question of public policy and political right. That was true—but it was the burden of every speech on the other side, that the bank must be upheld and re-chartered, and that the honor and interests of the country were involved in this issue. No Senator could be blind as to the consequences of this result on the distribution of the powers of the country. It is not a fiscal question, but one of political power. Let the bank be sustained in all its assumptions of power—and let it be shown that the conduct of the Executive is tyrannical and arbitrary, and what must be the consequence? The President could not be turned out; but, at the end of his present term of four years, he would go out, and the gentlemen who have put this weight on his back would come in, and the bank would be held up as having preserved the currency of the country from destruction. When he heard it charged against Senators on his side, that they were only actuated by a desire to sustain the Executive, was he to sit still and make no response? He was not more exempt from the influence of human passions than other gentlemen were. They mixed themselves up with all discussions, and even the interest of a debate could not be kept up without permitting these hateful passions to exhibit themselves.

It had been said that this question should have been long since sent to the financial committee, and he agreed that it should have been, but he differed as to the efficacy of the result of the reference. An act had been done by the Secretary of the Treasury which was said to require a remedy. The deposits were to be restored, and the bank was to be re-chartered. To obtain some legislation on this subject, a resolution for the restoration of the deposits, a bill to re-charter the bank, or to procure some wise laws which would meliorate the condition of the country, were the objects for which the subject ought to have been sent to the committee, and he was surprised that, instead of any thing of this sort, a report should have been made, showing that, in the opinion of the committee, no legislation was considered necessary. The Senate could just as well have decided on the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky without the recommendation of a committee, as with it. The gentleman from Massachusetts had intimated that he knew we wanted some legislation, and asked if we thought he did not understand us. We think that we understand him, and thus we seem to understand one another. How was it to be made apparent that the Secretary of the Treasury had acted erroneously in removing the deposits? By the adoption of a joint resolution ordering them to be restored. He was not quite sure, indeed, that such a resolution would be passed in the other branch; and, if not, the next course was to act upon the people by the adoption of a separate resolution. If both Houses were to agree in such a resolution, a prodigious weight of responsibility would be thrown on the Secretary: and there would be no legal obligation on him to restore the deposits unless a joint resolution were adopted, requiring him to do so. If that were done, the question would be presented to the world as Congress against the Executive. Congress would say to the Secretary, you have removed the deposits. You are required to present your reasons for the act to Congress: the reasons you have presented are unsatisfactory. The House of Re-representatives decides that they are unsatisfactory. The Senate decides that they are unsatisfactory. As you have done this act on your own responsibility, you must now put back the depositories. This would be a proper mode of presenting the question to the people. In this way the peremptory commands of Congress would be laid on the Secretary, and he must obey or disobey on his own responsibility. He considered this to be the only course which the constitution pointed out.

Mr. CLAY rose, and said, that he had felt no desire to take part in the discussion, nor should he have done so, had the debate been kept within the proper range of the question. But, as allusion had been made to the part which he had taken in the discussion of the conduct of the Secretary, he must be permitted to make a few observations. As to the report of the Secretary, in answer to the call which the Senate had made on him for certain papers, he could only say that it was a document of very different character from the report of the committee. The Secretary, in the early part of the session, had reported his reasons for the removal of the depositories, and 5,000 copies of his report had been ordered to be printed. Now it was proposed to print 5,000 or 6,000 copies of the answer of the Committee on Finance to those reasons. Both parties would stand on an equality, if 5,000 of each of the documents were printed; and he thought that was the proper number to be printed of this report. But the second report of the Secretary was merely an answer made to a call for certain documents, instead of sending which, the Secretary had sent a new set of reasons to sustain his first report. This was altogether an unjustifiable course. The gentleman from Georgia himself, in referring to the records, when General Hamilton did something a little like this, condemned that act, although not without some qualification.

Mr. FORSYTH explained that it was the irritating language which he had censured.

Mr. CLAY resumed. The Senate had called on the Secretary for documents, and he was bound to furnish those documents only; and the objection which he (Mr. C.) had made to the printing, was founded on what he deemed the impertinence of the officer, in sending to the Senate what he was not asked for. But extra copies of the reasons of the Secretary had been circulated, and the same course should be pursued in reference to this report.

But he should not have risen to give this explanation, had he not been induced to address the Senate by other reasons. After deliberation, and with the concurrence of his friends, he had introduced the resolutions which were under discussion. The one which declared the insufficiency of reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the depositories, was yesterday referred to the Committee on Finance, and had been this morning reported, with a recommendation that it be adopted. The other, which relates to the usurpation of power by the Executive, was still before the Senate. The gentleman from Georgia complained that the committee had omitted to report a resolution or bill for legislative action, and was under the impression that a joint resolution, declaring the reasons of the Secretary to be insufficient, would be inoperative on the Secretary, unless followed up by legislation. He differed with the gentleman on that point. Was it intended to be urged that the Secretary could have repealed the law, and that no vigor could be infused into it without a re-enactment, or a joint resolution directing the Secretary to restore the depositories? Was not the charter, in all its parts, in full force? Was not the act done under the 16th section of the charter? The reasons of the Secretary were directed to be reported, in order that Congress should decide as to their sufficiency. If they were declared to be insufficient, what would be the consequence? This act, this inchoate act, to which the ratification of Congress was necessary, without that ratification, and after a declaration of both branches disapproving of the measure, becomes nugatory; and it was proper for the Secretary to weigh well the consequences of a failure to comply with such declaration. It was not necessary now to go into the reasons which might operate upon him.

The Senate were now considering a subject which was brought before them in compliance with an existing statute, unrepealed, and unrepealable by the Secretary alone. They had looked at both the questions submitted in the resolutions—the usurpation of power, and the insufficiency of the reasons which had been assigned. And they had been told again and again by gentlemen on the other side, that it was not a question as to usurpation of power, or the insufficiency of reasons, but that it was a question of bank or no bank. With the Senators from North Carolina and Massachusetts, he protested against such an aspect being given to the question before the country. If the fate of ten thousand banks, with all their capital, was at stake, it would be a question much inferior in magnitude and importance to the real question under debate. The gentleman from Georgia had correctly stated what the real question was. It was a question of power, not as between the bank and the legislature, but as between the legislative power of the country and the Executive—a question of violated law; of an outraged constitution, of liberty or slavery—Whether the same hands should wield, at the same time, subject to no control but his own will, the public purse and the public force of the country. As to the bank, he should consider it an act of folly to consider the question of its re-charter, until the constitution was again placed securely on its pillars—until its authority was vindicated, the laws upheld, and the best rights of the country, which had been confided exclusively to the charge of Congress, should be regained. The question of the bank he regarded as an important one, and one which ought, at a proper time, to be well considered by Congress: but it was a question which, if his wishes could prevail, should follow, not merge in, the question of power. It might follow that question, even at this session, but not with his consent at this. When the balance of power was adjusted, and the constitution was vindicated, then, and not till then, it would become a question of immense importance, whether the currency of the country should be regulated by any other agency but that of Congress, through the instrumentality of a bank, or in some other satisfactory mode. The question presented by some gentlemen amounts to the exclusion of all paper by the substitution of a metallic currency, or a bank of the United States; for, in proportion as the minor banks are multiplied, will be the necessity for a bank to supply the whole currency, and the necessity of a bank is just as much more important now, as it was in 1816, as the difference is between 350 banks which are established now, and 100 which were then in existence. Whenever the constitution shall be again placed firmly on its pedestal, usurpation shall be rebuked, and the power of Congress shall be effectually asserted and sustained, there will be time to enter into this question.

What had the Senate been told, by a gentleman whose authority, when speaking of the designs of the Executive, was good on this floor, was to be done in the present condition of the country? Nothing! Nothing! The constitution had been violated, and the law trampled on: but when did we ever see unfeeling power loosen its grasp, usurpation own itself justly rebuked, or the plunderer voluntarily surrender his spoils! Leave the country as it is! That is the plan: and surprise had been felt by some that such should have been the scheme. He, however, was not surprised: for surprise involved an idea that there was some wisdom, forecast, statesmanship, sympathy in the public distresses, with those who practically administered the Executive Government. The purpose was to carry out all the designs of the Government to put down the bank. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would stretch his long arm across the Alleghany mountain, and would say to his agitated constituents—"All is well—there is no suffering amongst you." But, in spite of all this, the bank would be found by all subsequent, as it had been by all past experience, necessary for the regulation of the currency, and the business of the Government. The plan of the Secretary of the Treasury was, to adopt some forty or fifty banks, which were so much pressed at the moment as to require the aid of the Government to enable them to stand up; and these banks were to furnish a better currency to the country than any national bank, according to the pledge given by the Secretary of the Treasury. It would be out of their power to effect this; their paper was of limited circulation and credit, and was only received within a confined circle. What credit would the Metropolis Bank of this district have at a distance of one hundred miles, or even out of the ten miles square? If its notes were counterfeited, who was to punish the criminal? The States would be found unwilling to pass penal laws which would contract their own circulation. The currency must not be left dependent on the capriciousness of institutions of this character, but ought to be protected by law. The idea of uniting thirty or forty local banks for the establishment and security of an equal currency, could never be realized. As well might the crew of a national vessel be put on board thirty or forty bark canoes, tied together by a grape vine, and sent out into the troubled ocean, while the billows were rising mountains high, and the tempest was exhausting its rage on the foaming element, in the hope that they might weather the storm, and reach their distant destination in safety. The people would be content with no such fleet of bark canoes with admiral Taney in their command; they would be heard again calling out for Old Ironsides, which had never failed them in the hour of trial, whether amidst the ocean's storm, or in the hour of battle. The people would never permit the agency of the United States Bank to be superseded by that of thirty or forty local, disconnected, and incompetent institutions. But this was not the question before the Senate. He had no intention to present such question now. The true, the only question now was, to our violated laws—the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of the Executive—and the alternative of liberty or slavery to the people of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT, who next obtained the floor, took occasion to say, that, with regard to the reference made yesterday, he was not so unfortunate as his friend from Georgia, to be absent at the time, and he then, while the motion was pending, expressed his opinion that a reference at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, to be returned with a report at 12 the next day, would materially change the aspect of the case before the Senate. He was also of opinion, that the natural effect of sending this proposition to the Committee on Finance would be, to have it returned with a recommendation for some legislative action. In this, however, he had been disappointed; the proposition had been brought back to the Senate in the same form as sent to the committee, with the exception of the very able argument read that morning. The only question then before the Senate he understood to be the motion to print 6,000 additional copies of the report. Now, on this question, he would prefer the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee, suggested as an amendment, to print 5,000 copies instead of 6,000. The proposition of that gentleman seemed to be perfectly fair, for, as it was generally conceded that this report was in answer to that of the Secretary of the Treasury, which had been two months before them, and of which 5,000 additional copies had been printed, that number would be as many as necessary to send abroad of the report. He could not help here observing, that if this report was intended, as it seemed to be, in answer to that of the Secretary, it was paying a splendid compliment to the latter; and if the report of the Secretary was so strong as to require the printing of so large an additional number of copies from the answer of our opponents, it would imply a contradiction to that compliment, if gentlemen on his side of the House refused to accede to the motion. For these reasons, he would vote for the printing of 5,000 additional copies, and not 6,000, as contemplated by the motion before the Senate. It has been said by gentlemen on the other side of the House, (said Mr. W.) that we do not meet the question fairly. He begged leave to correct that misapprehension. We have not, said he, found it necessary to change the issue, and we have again and again supplicated gentlemen to let it remain unchanged.

Mr. SPRAGUE observed, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] that he would leave these two contradictory propositions to meet each other.—Whilst he was up, he hoped he might be permitted to express his surprise that a usual legislative proceeding had occasioned so much astonishment, he might almost say, of outcry, on one side of the question. Why, what had been done, that should create so tumultuous a debate on a subject which had been before the Committee on Finance, viz. the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and which was this morning reported to the Senate? This course of proceeding had been made not only a matter of astonishment, by the gentleman from Georgia, but also of denunciation. Now, if the gentleman from New York thought that this was a compliment to the Secretary of the Treasury, he was extremely welcome to it, but at the same time, he (Mr. S.) would have him to know, that they do not approve of the "reasons." But what, he would ask, were Senators to think of the effect of the report, when they saw what it had produced, what is an answer to every argument of law—every argument of constitutionality—a loud outcry of bank, bank? What had been the answer given to the report of the Committee on Finance? Had one word, in answer to it, been given? No. There had been several frivolous objections urged in relation to the report, one of which was as to the manner in which it had been presented so soon after the last meeting of the committee. The Senate had heard of the manner in which it came, and of the course of argument that had been adopted against it—gentlemen having coupled with it the bank—the bank.

Sir, (said Mr. S.) I recollect it was one of my earliest readings, and it made a strong impression on my mind,—the Roman historian says, that the most dangerous encroachments of power were made upon those objects that were either criminal, or unpopular, because they served to screen it against the enormity of the act—the criminal taking shelter under the unpopularity of the object, was screened by the grasp of power, from just denunciation. Sir, I have seen that early recollection from the Roman historian, carried out fully, daily, upon this very subject. Of what do we complain? We complain, as the gentleman from Georgia well knows, of the assumption of Executive power. And, what is the answer to that complaint? That it is an illegal assumption—that is, conduct which is unjustifiable, and which ought not to be imputed to the Chief Magistrate. Such has been the course to-day, as formerly, and such, in all probability, will be the case hereafter. He (Mr. S.) would protest against this change of the question, from an assumption of power—and of taunting those who resisted it with their unjust, unpopular, or unconstitutional object, if you please. They are distinct matters—would be seen as distinct—would be tried as distinct—and the judgments on both would be distinct.

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WILKINS said he did not rise for the purpose of replying to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] in relation to the important question of re-chartering the bank, but merely to reply to a personal allusion which that gentleman had made to him. He (Mr. W.) knew not whether his arm was long enough to reach across the Alleghany mountains among his constituents, but if it were, it would certainly not be for the purpose of oppressing them with it. His constituents knew him too well to suppose that he would extend his arm or raise his voice unless it was in their behalf. If the gentleman sought to make an opposite impression upon their minds, and to induce them to drive him (Mr. W.) from their confidence, it might perhaps be very gratifying to him—[Mr. CLAY said: Not at all, not at all.] Well, then, he would yield the point. Some of his constituents behind him said that his town was suffering. He must give up the point; they were, however, entirely unaware of the source from whence the suffering proceeded. His constituents were entirely heedless of the distinction, and he only begged them, if his voice ever did reach his own home, to recollect this distinction. They were not now suffering from the acts of those who administer the Government, as was notoriously said here, as well as by his constituents. The operations of the bank were hidden and secret; the wires of which, if touched in Philadelphia, made their vibrations instantaneously felt throughout all the country, and even to the Gulf of Mexico. But the hand that touches the strings is unseen—the people feel the pressure, and ascribe it to the public acts of the Government.

Now, he would tell his constituents that the removal of the deposits was not the cause of the present distress; he used the strongest phrase—there were intervening acts, intervening acts between the transfer of the deposits and the commencement of their sufferings, of which they seemed to be entirely unaware—the ramifications—the secret ramifications of the operations of the bank. His constituents talked of oppression; why, they could not be seriously or lastingly oppressed, for they possessed means within themselves that put them beyond the reach of the secret operations of the bank.

Let him (Mr. W.) disclose a fact, which was not disclosed by the directors of the bank, and if there should be an outcry at Pittsburg of suffering, and pressure, and commercial difficulty, he begged Senators to recollect that there was a Branch Bank of the United States there. But to show gentlemen how well his constituents could bear oppression, and how secret that oppression was which had been brought to bear on them, he would refer to the single statement he held in his hand. When the people attended the town meeting—the bank not having developed any facts, or spread its books before them—they expressed their wonder how it happened there was a scarcity of cash, and that their banking facilities were not as great now as before. [Mr. W. here went into an arithmetical detail for the purpose of showing the rate at which the bank contracted its discounts at different periods, and in order to account for the pressure which was afterwards felt by his constituents.] There was, however, no distress spoken of last November, when he left home; not a man out of doors was aware of the system of contraction, and within the period of a few months, half a million of dollars had been drawn in by the bank. Why had not his townsmen mentioned this fact, when they held their meeting on the subject of the distress? [Here the honorable Senator stated that the removal of the deposits took place on the first of October, and the Presidential election was held on the second Tuesday in that month. He then proceeded to show the rate at which the United States branch banks at Nashville, Natchez, &c., had contracted their discounts, and the effect of that course upon Pittsburg.]

VOL. X.—31

Now, these were facts which his constituents ought to have informed him of. It seemed, according to the declaration of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that the Secretary of the Treasury was at sea, on a wide and tempestuous ocean, and during the prevalence of a violent storm. He was not only at sea, but, during the raging of this storm, was in a bark canoe, with a grape-vine attached to it, instead of a chain cable. All that he had to say to the Senator from Kentucky was—that he (Mr. W.) took the figure; he is upon the tempestuous ocean, in a bark canoe, and with a grape-vine for a cable—but it grew neither in Massachusetts nor in Kentucky—it grew in the land of the Union, over which it extends its tendrils, and derives its sustenance from the whole earth. In addition to the care which is bestowed upon it by an overruling Providence, the people have one end of the vine, and by it they will pull the honorable Senator into a safe haven.

The Senator from Kentucky, taking up the course which had been adopted by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, had described his (Mr. W.'s) constituents as languishing under a very serious disease, and himself as the physician, at their bedside. He (Mr. W.) hoped that he should always be found there, when they stood in need of his aid; and he would tell the gentlemen that they would repel the attempt making to impose upon them foreign nostrums, which were calculated only to injure their constitutions. His constituents preferred his remedy to that of the gentlemen on the other side. He knew their constitutions better than those honorable Senators did, and he hoped they would allow him to cherish the hope that they would prefer his treatment to theirs.

The most important question for them to decide, was, not the physician who should prescribe for their complaint, and endeavor to relieve them; but it was necessary that they should ascertain from whence came the symptoms—from what source they emanated. He would tell them they were not occasioned by the acts of their own Government—of that administration—for it loved them, and rejoiced when their interests were flourishing and in a healthful condition. Could gentleman say as much of the bank? He might yet be involved in some difficulty with his constituents, for he had received several letters, some of which were anonymous, complaining of him. He had made an unfortunate expression a few days ago, in speaking of the town meeting from which the memorial he had presented to the Senate had emanated. He had been attacked relative to it; however, he repented, seriously repented, if any offensive expression had fallen from his lips; but he had no reason to repent the position he had assumed, nor to recall the declaration which he wished to reach his constituents—that the Government is not to blame—that the intervening operations of the bank had created the distress of which they complained. He gave full credit to the character of those who had imputed to him the uttering of an unpalatable expression. He had told the gentleman on his right, that of those who had signed the remonstrances there was a majority of his (Mr. W.'s) constituents; but, notwithstanding all he had heard, he saw nothing that would induce him to change the position in which he had placed himself.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had only a single remark to make, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He had proposed, on a former occasion, to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Pittsburg, but the time had not fully arrived. The gentleman had now retracted about one-half of what he had said on that occasion. He had repented of his precipitancy. Let the work of repentance go on, and he [Mr. WEBSTER] would probably, in a few days, be saved from the necessity of making any reply at all. The gentleman had said that his patient was sick, but that whether it was a broken leg, a broken arm, or a broken neck, the sufferer did not know. The time was perhaps not distant when the patient would teach the physician to understand his complaint better. By-and-by, if the gentleman should retract the rest of his speech, he (Mr. W.) might be disposed to call up the question, in order to remark on the residue of his arguments.

Mr. WILKINS said that he had only repented of expressions which had been deemed to be offensive by his constituents. The gentleman from Massachusetts would find, that, in reference to the question before the Senate, he was not to be intimidated from his course by the menace of a reply. He should perform his duty without shrinking. The gentleman from Massachusetts had once rebuked him for giving a vote without previously talking on the subject. It was now his intention to talk first, and to give his vote afterwards. He wished, however, to say, in all good humor, that he hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would not attempt to intimidate him just as he was on the point of coming out with a speech on the subject under discussion. Whenever the gentleman should reply to him, he would be prepared to defend himself.

The question was then taken on the motion to print 6,000 extra copies, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 27, noes not counted.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

After the reception and disposal of sundry memorials, reports, notices, &c., the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Special Order, [Mr. WILKINS having the floor,] being

THE REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose to ask if the bill on the subject of the French Spoliations had not, some weeks since, been made the special order for yesterday.

On receiving an answer in the affirmative,

Mr. CHAMBERS wished to take up the bill, for the purpose of making it the special order for the 19th inst.; but the motion being out of order,

Mr. WILKINS rose: He said, that more than forty years since, upon an occasion like the present, Mr. Madison had remarked, that deliberation such as that in which they were now engaged, should be conducted with candor and coolness. There had been no necessity for the tragic representations which they had so lately heard. Warmth and passion ought to have been excluded, and cool reason to have been suffered to exercise its influence. He should endeavor to profit by the advice given by the great statesman whose name he had just mentioned, and whose life Providence seemed to preserve, in order that he might witness the homage which was paid to his patriotism and worth by the American people. He (Mr. W.) had little hope that he should be able so to carry himself in the observations he was about to make, as to atone for his want of ability. What had been left of the discussion, had been so much enlarged upon by other and more skilful gleaners, that little remained for him to do. He declared that he threw himself into this discussion with reluctance; not that he shunned responsibility, but because he had an insurmountable dislike and disinclination to tax the patience of the Senate. For the truth of what he now stated, he might appeal to the fact, that since he had been a member of the Senate, he had always preferred to be a listener rather than a debater. He was aware of the vast amount of the stock of good feeling possessed by the body he addressed, but he was also conscious that his claims upon that capital were small; he should avoid drawing largely upon it and would also avoid a rapid curtailment; he hoped the Senate would accept his bills of exchange, and suffer the balance against him to remain until the pressure was removed.

During the 22d Congress he was instructed by his State to vote for the recharter of the bank, and being of opinion at that time that it had accommodated itself to the usage of Government, he had felt himself free to act in obedience to the directions of his legislature; and in all questions of expediency he would have no scruple in so doing. He voted, upon that occasion, in favor of the bank. Consistency was a matter of importance to every man of honor, and he did not think that he was about to pursue a course which could be termed inconsistent. It was every where admitted that the question of a national bank had been laid on the shelf, and that the present question had no reference to the rechartering of the bank. He might therefore, without fear of coming in collision with his State, freely express his opinions upon this occasion, and pursue his own course with regard to the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. Before he proceeded to those resolutions he would again deprecate the degree of warmth which had been displayed in connexion with the subject. On each side tragic pictures had been drawn of the state of the country. They had been told that they were in the midst of a revolution—that the constitution was lying prostrate and bleeding before them—that the rights of the people had been trampled on, and that, though blood had not yet been drawn, a civil war was fast approaching. They were told that the gloom of '76 and '77 was hovering over them. In the foreground of the picture was depicted an ambitious President, grasping at despotic power, and fast ascending to the despotic throne, with the purse in one hand and the sword in the other, a public robber of the rights and treasure of the people. All this was in the foreground of the picture; while in the background, out of sight, were to be found the real principles of the question. If gentlemen judged of political by physical phenomena, there might be some reason to suppose that the evils spoken of would come upon them. If it were true that a political storm was always preceded by a calm, gentlemen were right in the views they took of this subject. Until the present debate commenced, long after the removal of the deposits, there was an entire calm. The confidence in government was unparalleled. If any change took place in that confidence it was only known by its increase.

What were the materials out of which the picture to which he had just alluded, was worked? Nothing but the fact referred to in the second resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. That resolution, as well as the report yesterday presented by the Committee on Finance, admitted the power of the Secretary to remove the deposits, and neither of them alleged an infraction of the charter. The public money was all safe. The public purse was safe. It was tied by the same knot, and held by the same hand that it had ever been. What was then the matter? A matter of as little consequence as the color of the string which bound the purse. If to touch a hair of the head of this financial institution was to entail war upon the country, to embroil them in circumstances from which they could only be extricated by the sword, gentlemen would have to ponder a little when the question of the re-charter of the bank came under their consideration; they would have to pause ere they renewed the charter of a bank which could subject them to these evils. If the bank were rechartered, he hoped it would be under such restrictions as would prevent it from again putting the screws to the people, and producing a state of things from which it had been said the country was only to be extricated by the sword.

Mr. WEBSTER here inquired if the honorable Senator alluded to any thing which had been said by him.

On receiving a reply in the affirmative,

Mr. WEBSTER begged to deny having used any such language as that imputed to him.

FEB. 6, 1834.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WILKINS said he would give up the point, as the words were objected to and denied by the Senator from Massachusetts; but he had as distinct a recollection of their having been uttered, as he had of the Senator from New Jersey having said that blood was about to be drawn.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he had no recollection of having said any thing of the kind.

Mr. WILKINS said that these disclaimers only showed how little words uttered during the heat of a debate would bear after-consideration, and was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. WEBSTER again declared that he had never used such expressions as those which had been attributed to him, and could not suffer the Senator from Pennsylvania to go on under such circumstances. The gentleman ~~must~~ either admit that he had misunderstood him (Mr. W.) or the matter must be settled. If he could bring any other member of the Senate to support his assertion, he (Mr. W.) would acknowledge himself to be wrong.

Mr. WILKINS was unwilling to allow that he was in error. He had particularly noticed that part of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts to which he had alluded, and had taken a note of it at the time. [Mr. WILKINS then proceeded with his speech.] There was nothing in the removal of the depositories to justify the language which had been used.

Mr. WEBSTER. Am I, sir, to understand the Senator from Pennsylvania as persisting in attributing to me the language which he has mentioned?

Mr. WILKINS wished to say it was in his recollection that the Senator from Massachusetts had so spoken; he had taken notes at the time; and so understood him.

Mr. WEBSTER did not desire any argument upon the subject, or to know any thing about the gentleman's notes; he merely wished to know if the Senator persisted in the assertion he had made, notwithstanding his (Mr. W.'s) positive denial.

Mr. WILKINS made no reply, and was proceeding with his original remarks, when

Mr. WEBSTER rose to order.

Mr. CLAY said he was sorry to see two gentlemen who, he was certain, had the most perfect respect for each other, thus unpleasantly situated. He was sure the Senator from Pennsylvania did not wish to proceed upon language, the using of which the Senator from Massachusetts had disclaimed. He was quite sure the Senator from Pennsylvania did not mean to persevere in this matter, after what had been said by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHAIR here expressed an opinion that Mr. WILKINS was not out of order.

Mr. KING said he would like to know if the Senator from Massachusetts persisted in calling the Senator from Pennsylvania to order. If he did so, he must produce the objectionable words in writing, and suffer the Senate to decide upon the case.

Mr. WILKINS said there could be no doubt as to the nature of his feelings towards the Senator from Massachusetts. All he wished was to convince that Senator that he (Mr. W.) believed the words had been uttered, to which he had alluded. He still believed that he was right, but he also believed that the Senator from Massachusetts had lost all recollection of the words. He (Mr. W.) protested that he meant nothing otherwise to the Senator from Massachusetts, nor did he intend to give the words the signification which they would literally bear.

Mr. WEBSTER had no doubt that the Senator from Pennsylvania had misunderstood him, but he should expect the Senator to acknowledge that such had been the case.

Mr. WILKINS thought he could call to the recollection of the Senator from New Jersey the words which he had alluded to in that gentleman's speech.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he had the speech by him, which had been correctly reported, and he would read the part which had been referred to. The honorable Senator then read the following extract:

"What is despotism but the existence, in the hands of a single individual, of the power and right to say to all subordinate agents, You are to act on my responsibility and by my opinion? Can the Russian go further? Can the Turk? Are Senators prepared to sustain the principle? If they are, and it be sustained, we have had a revolution already—"hitherto bloodless," as the Senator from Kentucky has remarked—but it will not, in its continuance, be bloodless, when the people, amidst throes and convulsions, shall seek the restoration of their rights."

And now, sir, said Mr. S., if the Senator from Pennsylvania can make any thing of that, taken in connexion with the principal, he is at full liberty to do so.

Mr. WILKINS. A revolution "yet bloodless!" What did the honorable Senator mean by that? He (Mr. W.) would leave it to be settled by the people. He only wished to say that the picture which had been drawn was too highly colored. He thought that what had been said was uncalled for by any public act of the Government. When this subject was examined, and the very worst made of it, what did it do amount to? Simply that no emergency had occurred in the country to justify the removal of the depositories. Take the report of the Committee on Finance, and every thing which had been said and done upon the subject, and what did it amount to? That the Secretary had the power of removing the public money, but that his act was not justified by expediency. The law was with the Secretary, but he had not been governed by expediency. A mere mistake as to the extent of the emergency. And out of this simple fact had grown all the alarms which had been spread through the country. Senators had assembled in peace and quietness. The 1st of December, 1833, came round without any complaint—without even a whisper from the people. Let them look back. Where did the panic come from? On what day did it first make its appearance? On the day that the Senator from Kentucky made his address to the Senate. That voice, to which no man could listen without delight, was followed by this distress. He (Mr. W.) had travelled through his own State, and could say, that if the removal of the depositories had there effected any change, it was in favor of the man who made the removal. He (Mr. W.) had been going on, when he was interrupted, to say that he could have wished that a different course had been adopted by the bank. He could have wished that it had reasoned with the administration and Congress, and suspended, until the result was known, the oppressive measures which it had pursued. The bank, however, had thought proper to act differently. Although it was said to be the agent of Congress, it had never had one word with Congress. It had made war upon its principal and had also waged war upon an innocent and unoffending community. Liberty or restriction was in its power, and it chose the latter. He (Mr. W.) only asked that the bank would allow Congress the power of arresting it in the particular course which it had adopted. A different course would have been prudent, both as it related to the country and to the stockholders.

He would say one word on the subject of the union of the purse and the sword in the person of the President. There could be no such thing as a union of the purse and the sword as long as the constitution should exist, as long as the people remained free and enlightened. If it were intended to corrupt the people—if corruption were to take hold of the people, such as the conduct of the bank pointed out, then, indeed, a union of the purse and the sword might be talked of. What was the power of the sword, which was so much spoken of? The President was indeed, by the constitution, the commander-in-chief of the militia of the country. But what was that more than a nominal power? What could he do? He could not raise men; he could not clothe them; he could not pay them; he could not appoint a single officer without the consent of Congress. It was Congress that did all this, and not the Executive. Even the very subsistence of the President himself depended upon the will of Congress. The President could not make war or peace; those acts must also emanate from Congress; and if the President overstepped his powers, he was liable to be impeached, to be tried by the Senate, and to be buried from his office. With regard to the present action of the Executive, in removing the deposits, what power has the President assumed? In his cabinet paper of February, 1833, he cast from him all idea of uniting the purse and the Executive powers; he would have nothing to do with the deposits, but for strong facts respecting the conduct of the bank, which had recently come out. What did this prove? It proved that he had cast away from him the public purse, and that he disclaimed all idea of union between it and the sword.

Removal of the Deposits.

[FEB. 6, 1834.]

Suppose the Chief Magistrate, at the present period of his life, having risen, as he had, to an eminence which knew no parallel—suppose he were at this time to abandon the principles by which he was raised to that eminence—to abandon patriotism—to abandon the people who had bestowed that exalted station upon him, and to submit to a low, mean, grovelling desire for the power of gold, what would he have done? Where would he have gone? To the Bank of the United States. Would he have gone to the local banks? Not at all. He would have gone to the bank which had so much in its power, to the bank which rules the nation—to the bank which was capable of producing all the sensation, all the influence, which was now perceived in the country. Where he would have gone. He would have gone to that institution which had its powerful advocates in the Senate and in the other branch of the legislature; a power possessed of such influence in coin and in the mercantile transactions of the country, and possessing a power which even the people cannot control—to a power which could annihilate the State banks whenever it pleased. So much for the President's interference. If it proved any thing, it proved the high-mindedness and the disinterestedness of the President. No, said he to the Bank of the United States, Begone from me. I know your power in the country, I know your influence, but, begone from me. How easily he might have said, Your fate depends upon my will. There was argument, there was influence, to which he might have yielded if he had so far forgotten himself, or if he had entertained an idea of uniting the purse with the sword.

It would be observed that the Secretary of the Treasury had acted on two grounds: the first resting on the charter of the bank, and the other on the information which was received by him from the Government directors as to the conduct and movements of the bank. The Senator from South Carolina who last addressed the Senate, was right in his observation, because, if the grounds were false, the Secretary ought not to have adopted such a measure. This led him to speak of the public directors, properly so called, because they were placed there on the part of the public, in contradistinction to those directors who acted on the part of the stockholders. The President had pursued a rightful course to obtain information, and the directors had acted properly in giving it. He (Mr. W.) had turned his particular attention to the clause in the act instituting these five directors. The reason of their being instituted was, that the Government might have sentinels to watch over the conduct of the institution wherein the public money was deposited, and their institution was also opposed upon the same grounds. Then, taking the arguments offered by both sides, they come to the same conclusion; the one party opposed the institution of Government directors, because of the information which the Government was to derive from them; whilst the other sustained their appointment, upon the ground that Government had a right to take information of the concerns of the bank. He would undertake to show that the President resorted to the only mode of obtaining the necessary information within his reach. The fifth fundamental article makes a provision that sixty stockholders, holding among them not less than a thousand shares, may call a general meeting of the stockholders. That was a mode to which the President could not resort. The thirteenth provides, that every three years the directors shall lay before the stockholders, a statement of the affairs of the company. The fifteenth relates to the information which the Secretary has a right to require, and provides that the statements be made to the Secretary of the Treasury. All knew what a statement meant—that it meant a statement of the condition of the bank, and that information meant no farther than merely a statement of the condition of the affairs of the bank. If the President turned only to the fifteenth fundamental principle, he would have turned in vain, because that principle simply provided that restricted information which the cashier of the bank lays every day before the board. The twenty-third section placed a particular power in the House of Representatives. That branch of the legislature had authority to appoint a committee to examine the books of the bank, to examine into its proceedings, and to report whether the provisions of the charter had been violated or not. That examination, then, depended on the House, and not on the President, and could only be made when Congress was sitting. If a necessity for such an examination should occur during the recess of Congress, to what power was the President to apply? A meeting of the stockholders could not be procured without ten weeks' delay, even if it were practicable on account of the number of signatures and amount of stock required; he could not apply to a committee of the House of Representatives; he had to postpone his duty. But he preferred that mode of obtaining the requisite information which was enjoined by the charter itself. He could only apply to the public directors, otherwise the authority which was given was vain and nugatory.

What was the peculiar attitude of the bank, when the President applied to the public directors? It was in an act of hostility against the Government. He wrote a letter to the public directors, and declared the inquiry to be called for by circumstances. There was no secrecy enjoined. The first paragraph simply enjoined on the public directors not to pay any attention to rumors, or to newspaper accounts, but to let their information come from their own knowledge. He wished the information to be authentic. Such was the meaning of the letter, and those who construed it into an injunction of secrecy were mistaken. Mr. W. then referred to a letter of Mr. Crawford, dated the 3d of July, 1817, referring some matter to a committee, he presumed of the bank, in reply to some charges made against the bank, on the subject of internal exchanges. Mr. W. read the letter and resumed. In this, Mr. Crawford assumed to himself the right of applying to the Government directors for information, pointing them out as the proper sources. The President was right in making the call on the directors, and they were right in answering as they did, for he had a public duty to perform.

The President could appoint the public directors, and remove them. How had their duty been performed? Not secretly, but openly, in a manly style; a style which justified the Senate in confirming their appointment. They had not stated facts which were not proper to be laid before the public. He would suppose, for a moment, that the stockholders desired information; would not the directors be obliged to disclose similar information? If the directors elected by the stockholders thought that there was a breach of the charter, would it not be their duty to declare it? And what more had the public directors done? There were many things in the complaint of the public directors. The only thing important was, that they were excluded from participation in the actions of the board, if not from all knowledge of what was doing.

There was another fact to which he wished to refer—the refusal of the bank to transfer to the banks of deposit, the books and papers belonging to the officers and soldiers of the revolution. The bank said that the Executive had no authority to make such demand. This was setting up their own judgment against that of the Government. He only alluded to that circumstance, because it was one link in the chain of hostility which the bank had long adopted. Payment to the pensioners must be suspended until the books were obtained, or made at a great risk. The bank said, that the keeping of the money is of no importance to them, but they keep it that they may see the laws faithfully executed. This was taking upon themselves the province of the Executive of the United States. Was it right that they should tell the Government and pensioners, You must wait for the decision of a long law suit—you must wait. And payment to these meritorious men must be suspended. These pensions were formerly paid by the Secretary of War; but now by the Secretary of the Treasury. The application of the Secretary of the Treasury only sought the transfer of the funds to the banks selected to receive the deposits, that the payment might be made by the Secretary of War, to avoid transferring the funds from the local banks to the Bank of the United States, to make their payments. If there was not something determined, that the bank should rule, why not give up the books and papers at all events, in order that the payment should go on. And why not give up the money? They say they do not use it; but they hold it, until the result, it is to be feared, will be a law suit. Why, sir, this shows a disposition on the part of the bank which every man ought to resist; it will not spare the holy remnant of the officers and sires of the revolution; so sweeping and unsparing are they determined to make the distress, that even a solitary soldier of the revolution cannot escape. I would, therefore, call on the holy remnant of the revolution, to manifest now, the spirit that actuated them in their younger days, to gather their children and daughters around them, and say: We have in vain encountered the toils and dangers of the revolution—we have shed our blood in vain, when our brothers were falling around us; in vain have we overthrown our oppressive ruler; if we must now submit to an oligarchy, who would rule us in the very place where stands your Hall of Independence; in vain did the soldiers of the revolution achieve victories, and gain a prize beyond every other, if now they must submit to these rulers attempting to oppress them.

Mr. President, I will now take up the two resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and proceed to examine them. The first resolution involves the question of political power; but it charges no corruption on the President; it relates to his peculiar views as to Executive duties, and a power supposed to be assumed by him, which is not authorized by the constitution and laws of the country, and the removal of one man from office on account of his opinions. If even corruption could be proved, it would not restore the former Secretary of the Treasury, who is now precluded by his successor. I took it that the right of removal was admitted; that the Senate were inclined to acquiesce in universal usage; the Senate may, with propriety, acquiesce in the right to remove, when, almost every day, they are confirming or rejecting nominations made by the President, to fill the places of those officers that have been so removed. The resolution itself admits the right of removal in the President, and it charges him with assuming a right over the Treasury of the United States. Why, then, do we persevere in contradicting these authorities? Why have our arguments gone on denying the right of removal? Sir, I am at a loss to know. This resolution consists of two parts; one relates to the removal, and the other to a restoration. But the restoration of the late Secretary is wholly out of the question. No one can look at his conduct and opinions, but he would justify the President from personal considerations, without reference to the public measure. The Secretary came into office, holding towards the President unjust and unjustifiable sentiments: that General Jackson was the most unfit man in the country for our Chief Magistrate; that he was the victim of passion and arbitrary feeling; that he was guided, not by his own judgment, but by a secret cabal; that he never carried out, and never intended to carry out, any political opinion which he had professed. If all this was so, how was it possible to get along with such a Secretary, who was his adviser and counsellor, appointed to aid him, and at the same time held such secret opinions, and had no confidence in the man, or in his political opinions, and deemed them subject to corruption; how was it possible for them to pull together? But this is not all: the Secretary tells the President that the measure was insisted on, not from public considerations, but from vindictive and arbitrary motives; from no good principle; but from a vile, vindictive, and arbitrary feeling. These, sir, are his very epithets. Sir, how was it possible to get along? How was it possible for the President to proceed with a Secretary who, from his feelings and sentiments, could not co-operate with him? But even this is not all; when things became serious between the President and Secretary, the latter promised to resign, but he afterwards refused, for two reasons: because he had made a promise which he never expected to be called upon to fulfil, and in the second place, he determined to remain in office, that he might fix on the President the charge of interfering with an officer of Congress; and he retained his office against the wishes of the President, for no other object but for fixing this charge upon him. Sir, he ought to have been removed the very next moment; he was in the cabinet, and the President was right in removing him. His office was retained in violation of his promise, and with the purpose of overthrowing the President. But, sir, the President had constitutionally the right; he had the power by the constitution and laws, to remove; it was no assumption, and it was not dangerous to the liberties of the people, and it was imposed on the President, in whose opinion the removal was necessary to the public interests, and it was his duty to take the step which he did, in order to maintain that unity which the Executive branch of the Government required. The right of removal in the President is yielded and admitted on the principle that he is faithfully to see the respective execution of the laws. But it is argued that the Treasury is not an Executive Department, that it did not fall under the supervising power of that Department. I am sure that the Treasury has no other character given it, in our whole political history, but that of an Executive Department, subject to the control of the President. The Secretary holds his office by the consent of the President, he is a member of the Executive Council; he is a part of the cabinet; to be sure he has a general superintendence of the finances; he has the care of the public purse, and that purse is under the legislative control of Congress. But when Congress has exercised its power, and passed laws on the subject, they then pass to the power of the President. In the present case, Congress, in relation to the purse, had passed a law imposing the duty on the Secretary, and the performance of that duty is intrusted to the care of the President, to see that it is not neglected. In the law of 1789, creating the Treasury Department, the omission of the word Executive is wholly accidental. This is indeed apparent by turning to the very next law in the same volume, passed but a few days afterwards, by the same Congress, in which is fixed the salary of the Head of the Treasury as one of the Executive officers of Government. And in the 7th section of that act, we have the words, "when the Secretary of the Treasury shall be removed from office by the President of the United States." That very act from which it is argued that he may not remove, implies that he may remove; and you will find in all commentaries on the subject, that the Secretary of the Treasury is spoken of as one of the Executive officers of the Government. Mr. W. referred to the third volume of Story's Commentaries, to show that the power to remove existed in the President, so as not to subject himself to an impeachment. From the adoption of the constitution down to the present time, the Secretary of the Treasury was called the head of an Executive Department. General Washington so called General Hamilton. [Mr. W. here quoted a passage from Mr. Dallas.]

If, then, it was an Executive Department, the constitution gave it the power to see the laws executed properly, and at the proper time; and it became the duty of the President to watch over it as he did the other Executive Departments.

The third section of the second article of the constitution provided that the President should take care that the laws were properly executed. In reference to the execution of the civil law, indeed, the constitution was silent. What then was the meaning of the constitutional injunction? What was meant by the word care? Surely the power was not suspended until some open rebellion had broken out against the constitution. Surely this power was never absent. Surely in all cases it was a part of his duty to attend to the revenue and to the finances. Had he not a right to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire how the collecting officers were doing their duty? This general care was indispensable, and connected with the oath of his own office to defend, protect, and watch over the constitution. [Mr. W. here referred, for corroboration, to Kent's Commentaries.]

In the exercise of the authority which the President assumed, he interfered with no legislative action. The laws had passed from under the hands of the legislature and became his care. The law had given power to the Secretary to remove the depositories, but was silent as to the time and manner. And was it not the duty of the President to take care and watch for the fit time, and when he saw it, suggest it to the Secretary?

Suppose the second resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky ordered a restoration of the depositories, and, after the resolution had been adopted by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury refused to comply with the requisition, what was to be done with him? He might be impeached; but would it be wise to wait the result of the trial? The country would say, remove this refractory officer. Suppose it had been the universal opinion that the depositories ought to have been removed, and that universal censure would otherwise attend the administration had it refused to remove them according to the general wish, would it be justifiable to remove him? Take the Post Office, for instance: had not all the Presidents walked into that Department, and asked how the Postmaster exercised the power of appointment? And was it not well known that a Postmaster was removed because he had appointed a Postmaster in one of our large cities? The President was justified, morally and politically speaking, in removing officers and in appointing them. Mr. Taney was not appointed by the President because of his pliability of opinion. To the high personal and political character of Mr. Taney, there could be no objections.

But it was well known that a conviction of the necessity of the removal of the depositories was no sudden opinion of Mr. Taney's, adopted by him for the purpose of obtaining the situation which he now holds. As early as March last, he stated his opinion that the depositories ought to be removed, in order to give the bank time to wind up its concerns. In looking around, the President had a right to select an officer who would honestly and conscientiously discharge his duty. It was perfectly right in the President to select a man who coincided in opinion with himself. That was no assumption of power on the part of the President, which did not belong to him; and he (Mr. W.) would like to know when an officer was selected by the President, except on account of his political opinions. The selection, then, was no evidence of corruption on the part of the selector or on the part of the person selected.

[Here Mr. WILKINS gave way to a motion by Mr. WRIGHT to adjourn.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the resolutions of the Legislature of New York, presented by him some days since, on the subject of a removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States, were taken up, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial signed by a large and respectable number of mechanics, manufacturers, laborers, and others, of the second ward of the city of New York, without distinction of party, exhibiting the great state of embarrassment and distress under which they are suffering, ascribing it to the removal of the public depositories from the Bank of the United States, and the only remedy for which, they consider, is the speedy restoration of the depositories and the re-charter of the bank; adding, that in their opinion the President has no power over the bank other than by a scire facias, and that none other has been given by the constitution.

The memorial was read, and, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY observed that the paper just read spoke a voice which he was very glad to hear; it spoke the voice of freemen; of the laboring portion of the freemen of the country, and one that ought to be heard at Washington, and when heard, will produce a proper effect. Sir, in order that it may be diffused as widely as possible, I will make a motion that I am sure will be acquiesced in by the gentleman who has presented the memorial, and that is, that it be printed.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that on the subject which had been for some time under discussion in the Senate, one of great public interest had not been adverted to, on which he confessed his views were not very consolatory. For the purpose of bringing this subject before the Senate, he had prepared the resolution he held in his hand, and which he would then take the liberty of presenting. When it came up for consideration to-morrow, he would take occasion to make some explanations in relation to it.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the probable effect of the present state of commercial affairs on the revenue of the United States.

REVENUE BONDS.

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he had, some time since, submitted a resolution, arising out of the present state of the public distress, to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for the payment of revenue bonds.

FEB. 7, 1834.]

Revenue Bonds.

[SENATE.]

He now moved the Senate to take up this resolution and dispose of it in some way or other.

To this resolution, Mr. FORSYTH had moved an amendment, making the general inquiry as to the cause of the public distress, to which Mr. CLAY had moved an amendment, connecting the general inquiry with the specific object contained in the original resolution.

The question being on the amendment moved by Mr. CLAY—

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he did not intend to occupy much time on this subject. It would be within the recollection of the Senate, that the original resolution simply proposed an inquiry. The Senate could stand committed to nothing by making this inquiry; and certainly, when the accounts of the distress of the country were coming in from every quarter from those who were suffering, every possible investigation ought to be made which held out the probability of relieving that distress, in any shape. He thought it particularly desirable that the Senate at least should show a disposition to afford all the relief in their power.

When the resolution was originally presented, the fact of the existence of distress was denied on this floor. He believed that there was not a Senator who now would rise in his place, and make such denial. The distress had now spread to such an extent, that no man would be hardy enough to take that course. When this subject was up before the Senate on a former day, a Senator from Pennsylvania, who was not now in his place, [Mr. WILKINS,] had stated, as a fact, what, he had no doubt, that gentleman would now be willing to correct, if he were present. He had stated that he was surprised that the stock of the State of Ohio was selling at 112 and 115, while a similar stock of the State of Pennsylvania was only at 101 or 102. I, said Mr. C., was surprised myself at this statement, and could not account for it, but took it for granted that the gentleman was stating a fact correctly. On the assumption of the truth of this statement, the honorable member had gone on to state that this condition of things was owing to a combination between the United States Bank and the bankers of Pennsylvania, in order to produce an effect at Harrisburg, which he stated as debatable ground, which might be made to operate at Washington. What would be the surprise of the Senate when he stated that the honorable Senator was mistaken as to the facts. The stock of the State of Pennsylvania, which was selling at 101 or 102, bore an interest of 5 per cent., while the Ohio stock, selling at 115, bore an interest of 6 per cent. Every gentleman who would calculate the value of the stock, must perceive that, considering the difference of interest, the Ohio stock was lower at 115, than the Pennsylvania stock was at 101 or 102. Yet on this erroneous statement, the gentleman had gone on to throw out a severe insinuation against his own constituents. He owed it now to those constituents, as well as to truth and justice, to correct his error, and to redress, as far as possible, the injury which he had done. With regard to the distress which was now prevailing in his own city, there was scarcely a day when some statement of the distressed condition of the community did not reach us. He had himself received this morning a letter from a most respectable citizen of Pittsburg, from which he would now read an extract.

[Here Mr. CLAY read an extract describing the prostrated condition of the cotton manufacture, and the iron trade.]

This letter was from an individual, than whom none was more respectable, and few were more opulent.

The particular question now before the Senate was the amendment which he had offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. The original related to a specific inquiry on the subject of revenue bonds. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia changed the inquiry into the general causes of distress. To that amendment he [Mr. CLAY] had moved an amendment, connecting his first proposition with this general inquiry.

He hoped that the amendment he had offered would be adopted, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, as amended, would be agreed to.

Mr. KANE. The historian of Charles the Fifth of Spain, among the achievements of that eventful reign, has recorded the fact that that monarch made the Pope of Rome his prisoner, and whilst Charles held down upon him the screws of a rigid captivity, and at a moment when a wink of his eye or a shake of his finger would have given freedom to his captive, he coolly turned around, and directed all the priests of his extensive dominions to offer up their prayers to Heaven for the speedy restoration of the Holy Father to freedom. Such, said Mr. K. is the course of the Bank of the United States. The doctrines recently promulgated here, show us that the control of the currency is in the hands of that institution, that she may flood the country with her notes to any extent not forbidden by the charter, and that there is no power in the State to prevent her from withdrawing it as suddenly and as entirely as she pleases. The Government deposits may be restrained by the bank, for the purpose either of enabling it to enlarge its accommodations, or for the object of withdrawing so much of the currency from circulation, neither to be issued by itself nor any other bank. This is undoubtedly true, if the Secretary of the Treasury has no other power over the deposits than that allowed to it by the report of the Committee on Finance. If the deposits can be withdrawn by the Secretary only in cases where he deems them unsafe, or when the bank refuses to the Government the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds, how is the bank to be compelled to relieve the wants of the country to the extent which the deposits may authorize? Not by scire facias nor by any judicial process, because such refusal presents no violation of the terms of the charter. The Government cannot reach the conduct of that institution in any other mode than through the agency of courts and juries, and if the Secretary does not hold in his hands the corrective, the great and sovereign right to regulate the currency, so indispensable to the freedom of the country, and to the security of all private property, belongs to the bank, and the Government itself is made to contribute to the distresses of its own citizens, whenever the bank may choose to withhold from circulation the public deposits.

That some parts of the country are now in a condition of great embarrassment, I have no right to deny, because the evidences of it upon the table are numerous and conclusive. The withdrawal of the deposits cannot be the cause, unless by that operation the amount of the means of banking accommodations, both State and Federal, has been diminished. It may have been the means of exciting the bad passions of boards of directors, and thus of dissocializing the Federal and State banks. The correction for this evil is not within the jurisdiction of Congress, and the applications of our fellow-citizens for relief should be addressed to the directors and stockholders of the bank, to convince them that they consult their own interests by making peace.

Now, the course the administration felt themselves authorized to take, might be gleaned from what had been said by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) and that appeared to be, to do nothing on this subject. There was no relief to be expected from that quarter, because it was said that the question of restoring the deposits was connected with the question of the recharter of the present bank, or the establishment of another in its place. Here, then, was the course, as far as one side had laid it down—and what had been done by those Senators who had talked the most, the longest, and the loudest?

SENATE.]

Revenue Bonds.

The Senate had been six weeks in discussing a question which cannot, let it be decided one way or the other, effect any thing. It would settle nothing. The subject had been referred to the Committee on Finance, who had made a report on it; and what did it propose? Precisely what we have been talking about for the last six weeks: it stated that the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits were not sufficient. The report did not go into any reasons to show why the deposits should be restored, nor did it look into the effect of a restoration of the deposits. The committee had abstained from expressing an opinion as to whether a restoration would or would not effect relief. The Senate, then, had been discussing a subject which would eventuate in nothing—had been debating a mere abstract proposition. Gentlemen did not propose any relief, but took occasion to find fault with the administration. They said there is distress, but said nothing else. Mr. K. attributed a want of confidence on the part of the community, in a great degree, to the language that had been used by Senators in speaking of distress. To show that what was said in this body had made an impression on the public mind, he needed only to refer to the memorial which had been just presented by the gentleman from New York—it was almost a copy of the language that had been used here. If the people were to be told that the power of the Government had been usurped—that the President was a tyrant—that the sword and the purse were united in the same hand, and that dreadful consequences were likely to grow out of this single act of the Secretary of the Treasury—why, it would be most extraordinary indeed, if these expressions did not make some impression on the public mind.

Members of Congress must have had less weight in the community than they deserved, if somebody could not be found who would believe what they said. Here, said Mr. K., in this chamber, where the vestal lamp should be always lighted, where the oil should be pressed from the leaf of the olive and poured upon the troubled waters, is the volcano from whence is thrown, all over the country, the material which alarms our fellow-citizens. The remedy which had been proposed for the present distress by the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, was to extend credit to the merchants upon their duty bonds. This he considered as a partial relief, and it did not reach the whole object. It was a partial measure for the relief of one class of men, not only to the disregard of all others, but to the positive injury of all others. It was a question whether there should be any deposits at all in any bank. The importers having credit extended, will be relieved, and all other classes of men will be deprived of the advantages of the deposits in any banks, State or Federal. Would it be said that because relief was thus afforded, it would be extended in consequence to all others, tradesmen, farmers, and manufacturers? The answer to that suggestion is, that you relieve the importers by law and leave the rest of the community to be dealt with by them according to their tender mercies. Why should gentlemen select importers in preference to any other class? Because, Senators say, we do not know how it is in our power to relieve others. And has the constitution drawn this distinction? Have these men superior claim upon the public indulgence? Why, sir, were we not told over and over again, during the tariff discussions, that to a very great extent the importers were foreign agents, who could undersell the regular trader, and that auction sales, so much encouraged by them, were destructive to manufactures.

He was perfectly willing, for one, when any measure should be proposed which in his judgment would relieve all classes from the present state of embarrassment, to give it his support. But not by removing the deposits, by rechartering the bank, or by establishing a new bank.

It seemed, according to the views of some gentlemen, that there was no plan in the world that could be adopted to rid us of our difficulties, but by establishing a bank—there was no living without a bank of the United States. It had been said by one gentleman, that the people, after trying the State banks, which he called bark canoes, would call for Old Ironsides again. Old Ironsides, indeed! That was the nom de guerre of the constitution. Was it intended to be intimidated that the Bank of the United States was to be regarded as the Constitution, to which every thing was to be confided? And who, he asked, is Old Ironsides to be commanded by? the gallant Commodore who had spread her name and fame every where all over the world, or by the patriotic chief now at the head of our affairs? No, sir? She was to be commanded by N. Biddle, president of the Bank of the United States. Let the bank hold on to the motto, Ne vultor ultra crepidam, and let President-making alone. Let it lend all the money it can with safety, and make all the profit it can for the stockholders. That is its duty.

Mr. K. concluded by repeating his intention to vote for any measure that would have the effect of general relief.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, the Senator who had just taken his seat, [Mr. KANE,] objects to the resolution of inquiry submitted by his honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] because it is limited, in its object, to some measure of relief to the importing merchants. He wishes to enlarge the scope of the inquiry, and extend it to the community generally. I understand the motion in its present shape, said Mr. P., taken in connexion with the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORBES,] to cover the whole ground desired by the honorable Senator from Illinois: it instructs the Committee on Finance to investigate, as far as they can, the present distresses of the whole country, and the causes to which they may be justly ascribed. I am content to accept the proposition in its broadest sense; but I cannot indulge even the glimmerings of hope that any practical good will result from the action of either branch of Congress on this subject.
